Mr. Rachmaninoff, after delays caused by illness earlier in the present season, will appear at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18, in the triple capacity of composer, conductor and soloist. He will conduct the first performance in Boston of his new symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," inspired by the fantastic and impressive picture of that title by Arnold Böcklein. The canvas hangs in the Art Museum at Leipsic, but the picture is familiar through countless reproductions. The impression of Böcklein's powerful imagination and his departures from the old schools of painting have left their imprint on the art of the younger Germans. The force of his romanticism has been felt by Mr. Rachmaninoff, who, in common with the later Russian composer, has renounced the rigid adherence to national characteristics, and courted inspiration chiefly from the Germans. Nor has Mr. Rachmaninoff been alone in his musical tribute to Böcklein. During Mr. Gericke's conductorship Felix Weingartner's symphonic poem, "The Fields of the Blessed," drawn from another of Böcklein's canvases, was performed here, a Böcklein Symphony, with movements named for different pictures, has been written by Hans Huber, a Swiss composer, and current report in foreign papers tells of still another symphony based on his paintings. In the November trip of the Orchestra Mr. Rachmaninoff was the soloist for concerts in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York and Hartford. He will play in Boston, as at these concerts, his piano concerto in C minor. From the impression he made in his recital in Symphony Hall last month, this work will be awaited with considerable interest. The other numbers on the programme will be Brahms's "Tragic Overture" and Wagner's Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Dec. 16. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, and the programme will comprise Bantock's Comedy Overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute." Schumann's Symphony in C-Minor, Rubinstein's Concerto No. 4 in D-Minor for pianoforte and orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite.

TRAVELER,
DECEMBER 11, 1909.

The ninth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening promises to be of more than usual interest in that it will present Rachmaninoff in the triple capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. Rachmaninoff, it will be remembered, was scheduled to appear with the orchestra in October but having had to delay his sailing from the other side, it was necessary to postpone the engagement and the date has been set for the coming wek.

He will also conduct his new symphonic poem "The Island of the Dead." This had its first performance in America a fortnight ago in Chicago with the Theodore Thomas orchestra, Rachmaninoff conducting. Felix Weingartner's symphonic poem "The Fields of the Blessed" which was played here in Mr. Gericke's time. will also be played.

The other numbers on the programme are Braham's "Tragic Overture," and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SUNDAY GLOBE-
-DECEMBER 12.

Rachmaninoff This Week With Symphony Orchestra.

This week's Symphony program promises to be of more than usual interest, in that it will present Rachmaninoff in the triple capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. Rachmaninoff, it will be remembered, was scheduled to appear with the orchestra in October, but having had to delay his sailing from the other side it was necessary to postpone the engagement.

In the November southern trip of the orchestra Rachmaninoff was soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York and Hartford, playing his concerto in C minor, which he will play here.

He will also conduct his new symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead." This had its first performance in America a fortnight ago in Chicago with the Theodore Thomas orchestra, Rachmaninoff conducting. As the title of the poem implies the composer has drawn his inspiration from the picture of Arnold Bocklin, which hangs in the art museum at Leipsic.

Bocklin, with his romantic and at times fantastic imagination, not only inspired many of the younger painters, but his pictures have before now acted as a source of inspiration to composers.

Felix Weingartner's symphonic poem, "The Fields of the Blessed," was inspired by the picture of the same name which is in Berlin; Hans Huber, the Swiss composer, has written the Bocklin symphony, the different movements of which draw their titles from the different Bocklin pictures, and recently foreign papers have noted the performance of another symphony based on his pictures.

The other numbers on the program are Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

HERALD,
DECEMBER 18, 1909.

RACHMANINOFF AS CONDUCTOR

Appears Also as Pianist and Composer at Ninth Symphony Rehearsal Before an Unusually Enthusiastic Audience.

"ISLAND OF THE DEAD" AN IMPRESSIVE WORK

BY PHILIP HALE.

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Tragic overture.....Brahms
"The Island of the Dead," symphonic poem to A. Boecklin's picture.....Rachmaninoff
Second concerto for piano.....Rachmaninoff
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

Mr. Rachmaninoff appeared yesterday as composer, pianist and conductor. He is not your ordinary composer-pianist or composer-conductor; he is a pianist of marked ability and a conductor of unusual skill, authority and magnetism.

His symphonic poem and his concerto were played here for the first time. When Mr. Rachmaninoff gave a recital with a program of his own compositions a month ago, he did not make a marked impression. The sonata, which is of about the same age as the symphonic poem, was for the most part austere, melancholy, self-restrained; the themes had not a decided profile, and the structure, though scholarly, was not remarkable. Nevertheless, the music had a certain individuality. Some of his smaller piano pieces had this and showed more spontaneity and charm in the invention.

"The Island of the Dead," which was performed in Moscow last season, was suggested by the well known picture of Arnold Boecklin, a picture of which there are four or five variants. It is fair to assume that the music expresses the composer's thoughts suggested by the picture; that it is not merely an attempt to translate the picture into tones. The best commentary on this composition for a program-book would be an engraving or a half-tone of the painter's work. But if this composition were only a literal translation of Boecklin's picture, how would the middle sections with the emotional storm and stress and the climaxes, especially the one that is built on the third chief theme, be explained?

For Boecklin himself described his "Island of the Dead" as a dream picture. "It must produce such an effect of stillness," he said, "that any one would be frightened if he should hear a rapping on the door." The island is far from the strife and the din of the world. In its awful solemnity it insures unbroken rest and quiet for the dead. The waves are hushed. No voice is heard, no cry of wandering bird. It is as though no human being could endure the solitude; as though the island had been cursed with the curse of silence, as was the world and the wretched man by the demon in Poe's wild tale. The only visitors are for a moment, and they silently entomb those who are to be silent forever. The ferryman is no Charon demanding passage money or reviling the unprovided ghosts on the receding shore. And that white figure that stands by the coffin? Is it priest or mourner?

A literal translation of this picture into tones would necessarily be short, otherwise it would be monotonous in mood and in color. The first pages are admirable in the expression of the mood of the picture, as remembered by the hearer. After this mood is firmly established, the composer gives eloquent utterance to thoughts which he associates with Boecklin's painting. And to the hearer the composer seems, with his dexterous and effective use of the plain song "Dies Irae," and his own themes of lamentation and despair, to contrast the eternal silence of this cypress-tufted resting place and its inhabitants in their sepulchres with the emotions of those that must still live, strive, mourn. Thus does the composer give proportion and dramatic contrast to a work fundamentally sombre and nobly imaginative.

For this "Island of the Dead" is not merely pictorial; it contains lofty thoughts treated in an epic manner. The impressive effect is made not only by the character of the thoughts, but also by the arrangement of them and the orchestral expression. The poem is not episodic; there is unbroken continuity, as though one looking long at Boecklin's picture should meditate the eternal problems unanswerable in this world, realize the impotence of lamentation and protestation, and then accept the mystery and himself look forward to the last journey and the final resting place.

[65]

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 18, 1909.

SOCIETY TURNS OUT TO HEAR SYMPHONY

More Men Than Usual Attend the Friday Afternoon Rehearsal and Many Prominent Women Are Seen in the Large Audience.

There was a large crowd out yesterday for the Symphony rehearsal and more men than usual, among them Pepito Arriola, invited to hear the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who received an ovation.

Among society people present were Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mrs. Charles E. Inches and her bud daughter, Louise; Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Miss Cornelia Wolcott, Mrs. William Hadwin Ames, looking well in a raspberry cloth gown, sables and white turban with feathers to match the gown; Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. John L. Gardner in gray velvet and chinchilla fur cape, Mrs. Edmund Brainerd Cowles, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Emma Wethern, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mrs. Frederic L. W. Richardson (Anne Blake), richly attired in black velvet, ermine furs and odd shaped small hat of velvet and ermine; Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, with her father, Mr. Grew; Mr. Frederick P. Vinton, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, handsome in gray broadcloth; Mrs. T. James Bowlker, Miss Rosamond Dixey, Miss Mary Fay, Mrs. C. L. Wead, Mrs. Horace Clarke Jealous, Miss Katherine Fay in dark blue cloth and toque to match, Miss Rosamond Fay, Mrs. Thacher Loring and daughter, Margaret; Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss MacNicholl, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Edward Winslow, Mrs. Eben S. Draper and her daughter, Dorothy, gowned in blue with white furs; Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth and Maj. Henry L. Higginson.

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 18, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

A memorable concert took place yesterday afternoon when Sergei Rachmaninoff conducted his symphonic poem after Boecklin, "The Isle of the Dead," and played his piano concerto at the ninth public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The programme was completed by Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and the prelude to the Meistersingers.

Mr. Rachmaninoff, a tall gentleman in a frock coat, is a man of surprising, not easily explicable force and personality. In recent years Richard Strauss, Camille Saint-Saens, Vincent D'Indy have preceded him as visiting conductors. The first electrified his orchestra and his audience. The second received the reward of his achievements. The music of Mr. D'Indy did him more justice than his presence. With a lesser reputation Mr. Rachmaninoff surpassed all these, as far as an individual impression was concerned. When Mr. Fiedler brought him upon the stage he acknowledged a cordial greeting with a fine dignity and the self-possession of a man of wide experience, then he led the orchestra in a superb performance with extraordinary authority and magnetism.

Listening to the impressive music one was the more sensible of the vitalizing power of the man himself. It was not possible to put a finger on a theme and say: "That's Rachmaninoff," but one was immediately seized and absorbed by an overmastering mood expressed with consummate technical and esthetic mastery. That was Rachmaninoff. When he writes for the piano he is only occasionally successful in capturing a good idea. Either, for the most part, he does not write seriously, or else invention, which is not the strongest factor of his compositions, refuses to work for the mere sake of sound or tonal design. He would tax the piano as he taxes the orchestra. The orchestra can respond, and Mr. Rachmaninoff is aware of its resources as are few composers, even today.

There is hardly a composer so utterly and exclusively subjective when he sits down in earnest to express himself. Claude Debussy may frighten the bour-

TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 15, 1909

SERGE RACHMANINOFF

RUSSIAN COMPOSER, PIANIST AND CONDUCTOR

His Coming, This Week, in His Threefold Aspect to the Symphony Concerts—His Comparative Youth and His Career in Russia and Germany—The Piano and the Orchestral Music That He Has Written—His Ventures Into Opera—The Concerto and the New Tone-Poem to Be Played Here—Rachmaninoff's Indifference to Ultra-Modern Tendencies

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

For some weeks past Serge Rachmaninoff, the latest European composer to visit our shores, has been appearing as pianist and conductor in the concerts of our leading orchestras. Thus, he was soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its tour in November; he played his third concerto for a first performance anywhere with the New York Symphony Society; he conducted his latest orchestral work in Chicago, and he has played and conducted in Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Toronto. Received with enthusiasm everywhere as befits an honored guest, he has made the impression of a pianist of great if not supreme gifts, a conductor of marked ability, and a composer of indubitable talents who takes a serious and dignified attitude towards his art. Although he has already made his Boston début in recital, he will doubtless show his calibre as an artist still more effectively at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 17 and 18, when he will play his second concerto and conduct his latest orchestral work, "The Isle of the Dead." In consequence a review of his career comes as a justifiable preface to his appearances on Friday and Saturday.

The Record of His Career

Russia, forever seething with revolution politically, maintaining reactionary philosophical ideas, as in the writings of Tolstoi, affording a rich treasure to native composers, at least in the legendary poems of Lermontoff, Pushkin and Gogol, turns often, in spite of the intensely nationalistic composers of the "Invincible Band," Balakireff, Cui, Moussorgski, Borodine and Rimsky-Korsakoff, to the traditional in musical speech. Today the conservatives are headed by Glazounoff chiefly on account of his age and his prolific achievement. But close behind, and for many reasons of greater significance, are already two younger men, Scriabine and Rachmaninoff. Of these two, Rachmaninoff is the more consistent, and the more representative. His most striking qualities are his ready acceptance of traditional form and musical speech as represented by Tschaikowsky, and his solid versatility, which is entirely free from the reproach usually associated with expansive manifestation of ability. For he has made concert tours as pianist in Germany, to Vienna, Paris, London, besides his native Russia and the present trip to America. As a conductor he has confined his efforts chiefly to directing performances of his own works, although beginning in 1904 he acted as first conductor at the Imperial Opera House in Moscow for two years. In composition he has tried impartially orchestral music, piano music in large and small forms, chamber music, songs, the cantata and opera. Born in 1873, he was trained first at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, then at the similar institution in Moscow, where he studied the piano with his cousin, Alexander Siloti. Tanéieff and Arensky were his teachers in theory, and before he was twenty he had won a gold medal for composition. At present he holds the position of musical inspector throughout Russia by special appointment of the czar, the highest existing official musical position in his native country. Some estimation of the consideration in which he is held in Germany may be derived from the fact that he is engaged to conduct his second symphony Op. 27, and to play his second concerto, Op. 18, at a forthcoming festival in London directed by Hans Richter next October, to celebrate the centenary of Schumann's birth.

The Piano Music

Rachmaninoff was first known in this country as a composer of piano music, for Siloti played his famous prelude in C-sharp minor and the Waltz Op. 10 at his recitals in 1898-99. Characteristic short pieces are to be found in the sets Opp. 3, 6 and 10; and two suites for two pianos Op. 5 and Op. 17 are pieces for which the composer manifests an especial predilection. Among others of his piano pieces of more than ordinary interest are the Musical Moments Op. 16, a set of variations on Chopin's C-minor prelude, Op. 22, ten preludes Op. 23, and finally a sonata Op. 28, in D-minor. Rachmaninoff's piano style is not revolutionary, he does not attempt the subtle type of programme-music in which Debussy has treated subjects of fanciful delicacy and picturesqueness such as "An Evening in Grenada," "Gardens in the Rain," or "Goldfishes." It is wholesome and straightforward, frank in its musical message, admirably polished and fluent, but content withal with a traditional treatment of the piano. In short he is a believer in "absolute" music, in the impression resulting from the development of musical ideas apart from the extrinsic power of the imagination. Yet the idiom of his piano style is far removed from the commonplace. Within its limits, it is often difficult, but never ineffective. His prodigious ease and flexibility of resource testify alike to the thoroughness of the composer's training as well as to his faculty for invention. His technical figures are novel and varied, while his harmonic combinations are original without being bizarre. His most mature work for the piano is the sonata Op. 28, which actually has a programme back of it, although with characteristic reticence this does not appear in the published music. His inmost intention was to present the chief characters in Goetne's "Faust" in their individual traits as Liszt has done in his "Faust' symphony. With the clue that the separate movements might be entitled "Faust" "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," it is not difficult to discover dramatic characterization in the subdued and yearning themes of the first movement, the feminine gentleness of the second, and the sardonic and sinister picturings of the forces of evil in the finale.

Foremost in the list of his chamber music is the Elegiac Trio, op. 9 (1893), composed in memory of Tschaikowsky, whom Rachmaninoff reveres as artist and man. In this trio the mood of poignant and sincere elegy is maintained throughout, but there is a tendency on the part of the piano to assume the lion's share in giving out and developing the thematic material without due regard for the stringed instruments. In form, also, the work departs somewhat from the classic standpoint, but the felicitous return of the opening mood of plangent despair, suggests that the composer may have had Tschaikowsky's Trio in memory of Nicholas Rubinstein in mind, although the actual musical substance is far different.

As a pianist, Rachmaninoff has naturally written for his instrument in combination with the orchestra. His first concerto, op. 1 in F-sharp minor, dedicated to Siloti, was played by Carlo Buonamici at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec 17, 1904, and later in the same season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. It is frankly a virtuoso work, characterized by brilliant and effective passages for piano. In the second concerto, op. 18, in C minor, which he will play here on Friday and Saturday, the composer has sought to equalize the balance between the piano and orchestra. In the first movement the piano frequently plays accompaniment passages while the orchestra gives out the themes and overdevelops them. In the slow movement, the flute, clarinet and bassoons have frequent solos, in which the piano is chief accompanist, and only occasionally rises to assert its rights as melodic interpreter. In the finale, the interest is about evenly divided, although the piano comes to the fore with brilliant passages and a striking cadenza towards the close. The second concerto, which has already been played here by Gabrilowitsch and Miss Tina Lerner, is conspicuous for its solidity of structure, its musical lifeness, and for its notable originality and force, although on conservative lines. Of the third concerto, which received its initial performance with the composer as soloist at a concert of the New York Symphony Society, Nov. 28, reports would indicate that it is similar in style to the second concerto, although more melancholy and subdued in mood. The customary slow movement is replaced by a lighter intermezzo, as in Schumann's piano concerto. The prevailing impression appears to be that the third concerto is a work of technical and expressive maturity, if somewhat austere.

Songs and Operas

If Rachmaninoff has a surprising number of instrumental works to his credit, considering his relative youth, he has also devoted himself markedly to vocal music. Among pieces of this class are six choruses for women's voices Op. 15; a humorous chorus for mixed voices; two cantatas "Spring" for chorus, baritone solo and orchestra Op. 15; and "The Avaricious Knight," Op. 20, words by Pushkin. He has also composed upwards of fifty songs (Opp. 4, 8, 14, 21 and 26), which show to a marked degree his ability to create and differentiate genuinely lyric words. Of these, the song Op. 14, No. 11, entitled "Spring Approaches," is worthy of more attention from singers on account of its spontaneous enthusiasm. In Op. 14 and 21 are at least ten songs which would repay study and performance by those interested in Russian music. The song Op. 21, No. 1, entitled "Fate," is ingenious in that it employs with various rhythmic and harmonic devices the opening theme of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of which Beethoven himself said, "Thus Fate knocks at the door."

Rachmaninoff has also attempted the dramatic forms. His opera, "Aleko," after Puskin, was sung at the Imperial Opera House in Moscow as early as 1892. Another opera by him, with a subject of unusual romantic tinge, is "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 25, founded on episodes in Dante's "Inferno," the words by Modest Tschaikowsky, whose biography of his brother is a classic in Mrs. Newmarch's edition. In "Francesca da Rimini," to judge by the piano score, we find a style of a definitely romantic type, dramatic within somewhat conventional limits, yet attaining a conspicuous individuality, notwithstanding a noteworthy innovation is the use of choruses behind the scenes, singing with closed lips. This is perhaps a familiar effect upon the concert stage, but heard from behind the scenes it serves to deepen the mystery and tragedy of the story of these historic lovers. In the second act of "Madama Butterfly," Puccini has used similar means to similar ends.

The Orchestral Pieces

If Rachmaninoff's contributions to orchestral literature have not been many, most of them are representative of his music at its best. First of all comes the Fantasie "The Cliff," after Lermontoff, performed by the Russian Symphony Society in New York, Jan. 28, 1904, and again March 11, 1905. It was greeted with acclaim by certain New York critics, and justly so, for while relatively simple as orchestral works go nowadays, it has conspicuously imagination, picturesque suggestion and poetic color in its orchestral style, besides an intrinsic musical interest It attracts alike by its unobtrusive yet rare workmanship, and the beauty and significance of its ideas. A "Gypsy Caprice," Op. 12, pleases more by the vitality and piquancy of its rhythms than by the incisive melodic character or treatment of its themes. The first symphony, Op. 13 (1895) is apparently unobtainable in this country. The second symphony, performed for the first time in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra Nov. 26, 1909, is a work of dignity and ample proportions. An impressive introduction developed with considerable sense of reserve power, leads to an allegro in which the themes are not of great significance, but in which the workmanship is firm, the structure logical and the orchestration brilliant if somewhat conventionally so. A long scherzo follows, full of picturesque orchestral effects, inimitable drollery and capricious humor, spontaneously ingenious in treatment. The slow movement impresses at first chiefly by its solidity and seriousness in the long-sustained breath of its melodies. The finale is unflagging in its brilliancy and variety of thematic manipulation; an episode appearing first in the wood-wind is later transferred to trumpets, trombones and tuba with brilliant effect. The second theme returns in a sort of peroration in combination with the rhythm of the first theme, and the symphony ends in a dazzling and vigorous climax. It is not a work or poetry or delicate sentiment, but the mastery of abstract symphonic style is exceptional in its surety and force; it is full of individual and sober conviction.

It seems reasonable to expect that Rachmaninoff's most significant orchestral work is the symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," after the picture by Boecklin, played for the first time in this country under the composer's direction at a concert of the Chicago Orchestra Dec. 3, 1909, and to be repeated here this week. Pictures of Boecklin have already stirred the inspiration of Hans Huber, the Swiss composer, to compose a symphony, and suggested "The Elysian Fields" ("The Fields of the Blessed?") to Felix Weingartner. Nor is this surprising, for these pictures are full of sentiment, imaginative fancy and instinctively offer subjects for musical treatment by the receptive. From reports of the Chicago performance it would seem as if Rachmininoff had translated with singular felicity the sudden swell and irresistible rhythm of the sea around the "Isle of the Dead" as Boecklin has pictured it, the brooding mystery and the varied tender thoughts of the departed hovering over their abode. Furthermore, it would seem as if he had united the structural strength and general technical mastery of the second symphony to the imagination and poetic fancy of "The Cliff" and to have crowned these qualities with a maturity of expression and a human touch which betokens the ripened artist.

[66]

TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 18. 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. RACHMANINOFF FOR UNIQUE IMPRESSION

His Fine Poise and Grave Sincerity—His Double Function as Conductor and Pianist—The Musician That Was Uppermost in Both—His Concerto and His Playing of It—His Tone-Poem of "The Isle of the Dead"—Its Pictorial Atmosphere and Poignant Suggestion — The Suggestion in the Man of His Music

For the first time, yesterday afternoon, since Mr. d'Indy paid his visit to Boston four years ago, a conductor other than its own and outside its own ranks led the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hess and Mr. Wendling had their turn when Dr. Muck fell ill, and Mr. Strube has conducted in his own pieces. Otherwise, until Mr. Rachmaninoff came yesterday, no leader has stood for the moment in Dr. Muck's or Mr. Fiedler's place. Mr. Rachmaninoff is a composer, but he does not conduct in most composers' blind and errant fashion. He has had, it seems, his experience in Russian opera houses and in orchestral concerts in Germany, too. Still less does he conduct like a virtuoso conductor, expressly summoned to exhibit his methods, his "readings" and his temperament. Mr. Rachmaninoff's pose was quiet and self-contained; his gestures were sparing and unemphatic; they tempered oftener than they enforced; there was nothing graphic in his ways; but he clearly imposed his will upon his band. And it was the will of an expert, discerning, imaginative, unobtrusively commanding musician. From their first encounter with him, the men had respected Mr. Rachmaninoff's abilities; quickly they came to like him; they did their best for him and his music; and he, like Mr. d'Indy before him, will probably go back to Germany and Russia to tell how expert and responsive instrument the Boston orchestra can be. He impressed his audience as favorably. Since Mr. Rachmaninoff is a Russian by race, if a German by residence in recent years, some in it expected an exotic presence. They saw instead a very tall figure, long of leg, neither slender nor thick of body, with slightly stooping shoulders, a largish head, a smooth, oval face, grave of expression and lighted by gravely contemplative eyes—a figure that might have come almost as plausibly out of New England as out of Russia.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's bearing had not an "effect" in it. He seemed wholly sincere in his unconsciousness of himself, in his quiet absorption in the work before him. He came, with equal poise, to conduct in his own tone-poem and to play the piano part in his own concerto. With equal gravity, he acknowledged welcoming and rewarding applause. The whole impression was of a rare personal reticence, of a man sincere with himself and with all men and things else. There was need only of the quick-coming spur of the music to divine the fine intellectual and imaginative fibre underneath. The gravity of Mr. Rachmaninoff's music is in his presence; its quiet accomplishment of its deliberate ends speaks in his bearing. The quiet of its coloring, the reflection that shapes it, the deep but unemphatic moods of it are in his personal presence. It is as sincere as he. It is long since so static a personality has so impressed an audience at the Symphony concerts. That it should do so was finely creditable to its instinctive discernment, and the unusually hearty and reiterated applause that followed the end of the tone-poem and the end of the concerto was surely for the man as well as for the composer, the conductor, and the virtuoso. If a few in the second balcony were clamoring vainly for his hackneyed prelude, no one else thought of it in the newer and the larger aspects of the composer.

The concerto in which Mr. Rachmaninoff palyed the pian part was his own in C minor, the tone-poem, in which he conducted was his own "Isle of the Dead" to —as the title runs—Boecklin's like-named picture. The concerto, though it his been played elsewhere in America and with the Symphony Orchestra was new to Boston, and only Chicago of other American cities, had previously heard "The Isle of the Dead." Of Mr. Rachmaninoff as a conductor enough, for the time, has been said. He was no less the musician when he turned pianist. A virtuoso he surely is by right of technical resource and the expert employment of it; but in all else he is the antipodes of a virtuoso. He left his hearers without thought of such skill for the skill's sake or rather for the sake of display of it. He did not bid the audience heed the individuality and the temperament of his reading. Still less was he the composer displaying himself, and making double effect since he was a conductor withal. He was the musician who sank himself in the playing of the music before him—music that he understood the better and the expressive each of which he gained the more fully and pervasively because he himself had written it Always his tone had an exceeding felicity, whether it marched in broad progressiveness, sang inmusing and melancholy wise, figured a cadenza in the mood of quiet and contemplative play with tonal fancier, whether it became as one with the softer voices of the orchestra or marshalled the whole choir with its own It was tone that never turned strident, nor hot nor brilliant It kept always its crystalline quality, its fine, clear, cool shadings its intimate suggestion even with a great orchestra in a great concert-room.

It is already the custom to speak of Mr. Rachmainoff's concerts as virtuoso pieces, because he was a practicing pianist before he was a composer. Other pianists may indeed make them such. As he himself played this second concerto, it seemed rather a piece of gravely meditated and reflectively written music for its own sake in which the piano had its place, not for the display of itself or of the pianist, but for fitter voice to his ideas and imaginings. Rather, it is absolute music in the true sense of the words, because the musical ideas whence it springs touch the imagination in themselves and being esthetic pleasure, while in the evolution and the play of them there is continuing resource, continuously, invention and fancy. Mr. Rachmainoff accomplishes these things indeed reflectively, but with reflection that in its sober depth of mood becomes emotion. His melodic ideas are not of a dried and evaporated Brahms, as some of his detractors will have it, but of the true vein of the contemplative and melancholy Slav. His own moods and moods and their own suggestions play upon them to give them more large and telling but always composed force, to turn them soberly songful, to touch them here and there with a quick fight fire. The listener hears for the pleasure and the beauty of sound, now tinted with thought, now vigorous with power, now warm and supple with emotion. He hears and enjoys as gravely, as sincerely as Mr. Rachmainoff wrote. It is music of a temperament that is rare in the strenuous fashion and impulses of music nowadays. It has caught an impulseTHT HA days. It has caught the action, the detachment of Brahms and added to them the Slav intensity of feeling even when the particular Slav has masked and tempered it.

"The Isle of the Dead," at a single hearing at once baffled, interested and impressed. Mr. Rachmaninoff has worked long upon it; he is not sure even now that he imparts the moods that Böcklin's picture kindled in him and the suggestions that it brought to his imagination. The length and the minuteness of his labors upon it has made it music of very fine and adroit shadings and often of very finely subdued and poignant voice. The little waves of a still sea lap the low rocks on the steep, bare cliffs of "Böcklin's isle. A faint, still wind stirs in the tops of his thick sypresses. The air all about the isle is still, yet when it stirs plaintive voices or the phantoms of voice sound faintly in it. These sounds, this air make the atmosphere of Böcklin's picture; they were perhaps the essence of its grave suggestion to Mr. Rachmaninoff's grave spirit. He has sought in his music to give these sounds their shadowed, their phantom, their iterated quality. He holds the voices of his orchestra low; the music moves to subdued rhythms; the harmonic background is oftenest wan; the voice of the music seems very faint and far. Yet the lip of still sea and the rustle of the cypresses is not quite changeless, and the plaintive voice of what Prospero would have called the spirits of the isle stirs out of changeful shadows among them. The voice is oftenest the poignant voice of longing, a plaint as of souls that are restless—that know not either the joys of Elysian fields nor yet the pains of an under and torturing world.

They are in the ish of the dead, yet the memory of the life behind, of the pleasures and pangs still haunts them. The old existence, in phantoms as shadowy as themselves still vexes them. Perhaps it is out of such imaginative scheme that Mr. Rachmaninoff has wrought his tone-poem. The beginning is surely of the isle, the sea, the cypresses, the stillness. The plaintive phantom voices stir in the pale air and light; they turn poignant with the memories of earth, with the pleasure and the pain behind, the state of things remembered that were dear though they hurt. The voices rise an outcry. Yet here grief and longing must turn slowly. The voices fall and are still, and again the sea laps the cliffs and the cypresses quiver, and there is footfall of new souls at the gates, and in the wan and changeless light, the wan and the changeless air, the music end. Perhaps it is idle and futile fancy so to make Mr. Rachmaninoff a "programme" for a tone-poem in which he has been content with a title. Yet, time again yesterday, his own music, and in its substance and its mood and above all in its intsrumental coloring seemed to infuse it. As we wrote in absorbed and deeply touched mood to fine issues, so may his hearers dare and try to listen to him..

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 1, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT

There was uncommon enthusiasm yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall when the 20th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this season took place. Programme: Symphony No. 2, Sibelius; scene and aria, "Ah! Perfido," Beethoven; Menuetto from Serenade in D, op. 65, Brahms; three songs with orchestra—"Hymnus," Strauss; "The Tambourine Player," Max Fiedler; "Er Ists," Hugo Wolf; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Tilly Koenen, the Dutch singer who made her first Boston appearance in recital earlier this season, was soloist. A composition by Mr. Fiedler figured for the first time on a symphony programme.

THE BOSTON GLOBE
DECEMBER 18. 1909.

RACHMANINOFF IN TRIPLE ROLE

As Conductor, Pianist and Composer.

Symphonic Poem and Concerto Heard for First Time.

Cordially Received at Symphony Hall.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian musician, appeared at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon in the triple capacity of composer, pianist and conductor in the larger forms.

At his recent recital in this city Mr Rachmaninoff was found, in a program of his pianoforte compositions, to tend toward serious introspection in his mode of thought, both as composer and as interpreter.

With the wider scope and larger eloquence both of his symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and his second concerto for pianoforte, and the more complete means for expression which he had yesterday in our orchestra, Mr Rachmaninoff again disclosed the same tendency to introspective thought magnified to the scale which his present resources could now reveal in his work.

Inasmuch as Rachmaninoff, the composer of his symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," must be largely estimated in terms of Rachmaninoff, the conductor of its first performance here, the work must necessarily be known chiefly through his reading.

As Composer.

It is as composer, in this instance, that Mr Rachmaninoff interests most. As such let him first be considered.

He offers no "program" for this tonal poem other than the fact that his inspiration sprang from the painting, "Island of the Dead," by Arnold Bocklin.

The solemn grandeur of solitude, vast, still, eternal, all-pervading, broods over the picture. The stately cypress trees enforce the mood. The noiselessly approaching boat, its spectral cargo of mourner and coffin deeply confirm it. This is the abode of death. The temporal, the trite, the inconsequential vanities of men and the passing hour have no place here. It is a theme of awe and primal bigness. To suggest it through the tones of an orchestra is to declare oneself a creative mind in music of deep insight and of great resource in expression.

As heard yesterday afternoon, the work was happy in the choice of themes, clear and logical in their development, rich in polyphony and appealing in the employment of color. In symmetry and plan of structure, it was admirable. In searching, trenchant delineation of the mood it was masterly.

The work began with repeated figure in double basses and tympani; quiet, remote, intagible, like the incessant beat of a distant sea. The movement then continued in unbroken, undulating waves of tone. There was no obvious, protruding lines; nor was there contrasting nor diverting episode or excursion into some new realm of fancy, as though the visual wonders of the island were the theme. A portent, strangely dissimilar to the world of sense clings to each bar and deepens as the work progresses.

Notwithstanding its flavor of mysticism, this music is not morbid, nor it is melancholy. It is contemplative. It has breadth of vision. It speaks of solitude and infinity.

Dignified Conductor.

It is quite extraordinary how Mr Rachmaninoff has kept his score above intruding or compromising irrelevancy. Its aloofness grows and intensifies. A memorable instance of this sustained cumulative power came in the development of the theme first given out by the horn. It was worked over by the enlarging resources of the orchestra through constant and accelerated repetition until the whole instrumental body is carried by it to a climax of superb puissance.

The weird mysticism which the composer gains by the simple device of the theme with the minor third persisting in the clarinets through many measures, and then repeated by the solo violin, gives impressiveness to the latter part. The concluding measures are quietly reminiscent of the opening figures. So it passes like a dream tempered by the supernatural.

Men who conduct with a supreme and unmistakable stamp of authority are seldom players upon an instrument. Mr Rachmaninoff is not such a conductor. He stood with dignity before the band and guided them through the work with an ease born of acquaintance with it. His beat upon the strategic first count of the bar is clear, but not strikingly incisive. The palm of the left hand when used at all was oftenest closed, save when the conductor extended the hand to diminish the tone.

Mr Rachmaninoff does not depart from his self-contained and reserved aloofness, even for the flood of tone which the climatic points require. Here again is the introspective rather than the actively executive mind.

As Pianist.

As an interpreter through the piano, however, and not as a player upon men, Mr Rachmaninoff was more convincing. His second concerto for pianoforte was heard for the first time in Boston.

While he was admirable as an artist who takes the piano into his confidence, rather than as a virtuoso who performs feats of violence upon it, Mr Rachmaninoff must again seem the greater as composer.

He has transcended the confines of the piano in this concerto. He has written music which gives the solo instrument an individual scheme of beautiful color and design in the pattern of the work until it proves too restricted for the breadth of thought which he would express.

Then, by permitting the greater resources of the orchestra to assist, and for the time, by making the piano an embellishing or accompanying instrument, he proves himself the composer first and the pianist afterward.

In the concerto, as in the symphonic poem, the composer shows his fondness for themes whose tones progress diatonically, or nearly so. In the first movements a subject of this character is given out by the piano and developed later with great beauty and effectiveness by the violins against embellishment in the solo instrument.

By this constant employ of the orchestra in supplementing his piano, Mr Rachmaninoff has given his concerto a freshness and unfailing variety. The themes are uniformly melodious and amenable to picturesque development. Contrast in means of treatment abounds.

The adagio is serenely contemplative, and offered the artist, as pianist, the opportunity for that curious, searching style of melody playing which under his fingers gives each minute figure significance.

The closing movement, allegro scherzando, secures animation easily by a clever use of staccato accompaniment of suppressed intensity in the orchestra.

It offers, too, one of the most beautiful themes of the work, which is given to the clarinet and is made particularly conspicuous.

Sincerity of Workmanship.

While Mr Rachmaninoff has supplied a cadenza for the piano, it seems, when not mere embellishment to the orchestra, as a form of individual speech, too intense to be trammeled by formal accompaniment, and not as a vehicle for mere display.

This sincerity of workmanship is stamped upon the two compositions throughout. It may be that which gives them the remarkable evenness of worth. There are not spots where the composer has seemed to fail of inspiration. He invariably has something to say.

As a pianist Mr Rachmaninoff gave a memorable demonstration of what the subservience of technic to interpretation may do in piano playing. Runs, skips, velocity and all the horde of agile tricks which habit gives to fingers were present when needed. These things were automatic servants of a mind which planned the effect, and of an emotion which enlivened and projected it. This is not necessarily brilliant pianism, but it is admirable art.

The distinguished guest was called to the stage many times after his concerto. He shook hands in evidently grateful appreciation with Mr Fiedler and Willy Hess, but even the ardent and long-enduring applause brought but the scant suspicion of a smile to the strong lines of the face, which in its aloof absorbtion, its fine asceticism, mirrors much of the spirit of his music.

Brahm's "Tragic" overture began the concert. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" ended it.

MONITOR
JANUARY 1, 1910.

Miss Tilly Koenen, the Dutch contralto, will sing this evening with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the eleventh concert, the program of which will be:

Sibelius, Symphony in D major, No. 2; Beethoven, Scena and aria, "Ah, perfido"; Brahms, Minuet from Serenade in D major, op. 11; three songs with orchestra; Richard Strauss, "Hymnus"; Max Fiedler, "Die Musikantin"; Hugo Wolf, "Er ist's"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes, op. 34.

Mischa Elman will make his first public appearance of the season at the twelfth public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 7 and 8. He will play the Brahms concerto, which is said to be one of the best things he does.

Mr. Fiedler has decided to put on this program the Elgar Symphony, which had so much success a year ago. It created much interest at that time and many requests have been made to him this season to repeat it. The other number will be Ch. M. Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle" which has not been played here for several seasons.

* * *

ADVERTISER,
DECEMBER 18, 1909

RACHMANINOFF AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GREAT RUSSIAN MAKES TRIPARTITE SUCCESS

As Conductor, Composer and Pianist He Was the Central Figure of the Afternoon.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Tragic Overture.
Rachmaninoff. "Toteninsel" Symphonic Poem.
Rachmaninoff. Second Concerto for Piano.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.
Wagner. Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

An earnest programme from first to last, yet, in spite of the foreboding titles, not solemn enough to become oppressive. Of course the eminent Russian was the central point of this concert and he exhibited his versatility by appearing as conductor, composer and pianist Let us therefore clear the stage for him by speaking of the two non-Russian works first.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" is by no means as vehemently emotional as the tragic work by Reger which was recently heard at these concerts. It has something of the lofty, superhuman character of the Greek tragedy, where Destiny rules remorselessly and men bow to its decrees with dignity if with sorrow. There are few woman's tears here; few sobs or wails of anguish. There is nobility amid all the darkness and gloom. The reading and the performance brought out this point majestically.

A tiptoeing pizzicato, a few wails of the oboe, a martial theme, spoke of events such as one might easily associate with "Macbeth," if Brahms had only given warrant to dilate with this particular emotion, but, as he did not, we prefer to regard the work as subjective rather than objective, as a picture of emotions rather than of definite events. And even in this it was more on the masculine than the feminine side.

All of our musical readers are aware of Mr. Fiedler's strength in Wagner scores. We need only add that the sudden contrasts of the "Mastersinger" Prelude were sharply drawn and the interweaving of the "Prize-song" was beautiful and impressive. After all, none of the moderns who are striving so hard for originality, complexity and tone-coloring manage to evolve anything so fitting to its subject as this Vorspiel, to say nothing of the intrinsic beauty of the piece.

And now enters, long, lank and very earnest, Serge Rachmaninoff. We are grateful that this Russian does not go into the field of crabbed ugliness, as so many moderns have done. He has evidently followed the lead of his teacher, Tschaikowsky, and believes that most of the human emotions can be expressed without setting the auditor's teeth on edge. He believes, with Liszt, that even a "Symphonic Poem," may remain quite intelligible. Therefore, even at a first hearing, one can form a pretty good judgment regarding the "Toteninsel."

Boecklin, the painter, is one of those who, while outside of music, exert a great influence upon the workers within the Art, Heine was the cause of more songs than any single musician ever composed. His "Du bist wie eine Blume" alone caused 400 compositions, or more. Shakespeare evolved more operas than Verdi, and Boecklin has caused symphonies and symphonic poems to spring up in the minds of great composers by his impressive pictures.

Huber set a whole gallery of his paintings to music in a symphony; Weingartner made a symphonic poem about his "Elysian Fields;" and other German composers have transmuted his paintings into tones. This desolate island that is pictured so graphically, where is it? It is not Coney Island, which is a dissolute island, nor, in spite of its extended character, is it Long Island. It is a picture of an isle off the coast of Italy. Put the island off the coast of Scotland and we have a modernized version of "The Hebrides" overture.

Like Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff has a wave-figure, chiefly upon the violoncellos, which is intended to depict the ocean and the lonely character of the island. As with Mendelssohn, this figure is reiterated many times and comes back at the end to picture solitude once more.

But there the resemblance ends. The lonely, quiet island is very fully scored, for a modern composer requires a very large orchestra to portray silence, and makes a great deal of sound in picturing solitude. A few baleful tones upon the brasses (muted) spoke of evil, and some impressive pizzicati upon the contrabasses gave a mysterious touch to portions of the work.

The picturesque monotony of the Coda with a long-drawn-out organ point, made a most impressive ending. We cannot rate so highly the effects which deal with loneliness or with the endless voice of the waves so well-attained as with Mendelssohn in his masterpiece, but the tragic element is much more in the foreground in this modern work and Mendelssohn's storm, or touches of Giannish war, are distanced by the picture of tragedy or death which forms the middle section of this work.

It was intelligible and dignified, if not always directly beautiful.

As a conductor Mr. Rachmaninoff was successful. He is very reserved in gestures, but his beat is decisive and easily followed. We do not rank him with the star conductors with which Boston has been pampered, but he is a leader of prominence none the less. Spite of the fact that putting "The Island of Death" after the "Tragic Overture" was placing black after gray, the work and the conductor made a very great success and two ardent recalls followed. A well-deserved tribute.

Exit Rachmaninoff, the conductor, and enter Rachmaninoff, the pianist. But the composer must again be spoken of first. Again we found coherency and even symmetry in the concerto, which is, after all, the freest expression of the sonata-form. Good themes were there from the beginning, and the concerto made a much higher impression than the sonata (in D minor, Op. 28), with which Mr. Rachmaninoff made his debut in Boston, a short time ago. That work was disjointed, while this was well-knit and homogeneous.

The piano entered at once with an impressive introduction, but the material of this introduction was used effectively later on. The chief theme, which entered with full orchestra, was powerful and masculine, and it contrasted well with the subordinate theme which came upon the piano directly after. The development was not entirely drawn from these two, but presented some new subject matter which was finely worked-up against the chief theme. In the return of the themes there was no real cadenza, for Rachmaninoff, like Beethoven and Brahms in their most earnest concertos, believed that the personal display in the technique of the cadenza does not add to the poetry of the work. The composer played the movement with commendable power and the enthusiasm began to grow apace.

The adagio was quite simple in its architecture, and appealing in its tunes, for this Russian, like many of his race, is getting ahead of the modern Germans and Frenchmen by restoring melody to classical music. The giving of the chief theme in the orchestra against the piano, and then transferring it to the piano against embroidery in the orchestra, is an old device, but always agreeable to listen to. The Coda of this slow movement is very beautiful. Here Rachmaninoff played with much expression and great freedom of tempo, which Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra seconded with commendable elasticity. Great applause followed this movement which is the gem of the work.

The finale, an "Allegro Scherzando," gives much arpeggio-work to the piano, and the chief theme also entered upon that instrument. The piano is kept pretty well in the foreground during all of this movement, for the intermediate theme also is chiefly given to it. But the best development of the Finale is made, not from the chief theme, but from the subordinate, which is grandly worked up. Nevertheless the fugal treatment of the chief theme, between piano and orchestra, in the development section, must not go unrecorded. Every composer loves to flavor his dish with contrapuntal dressing, therefore one may not deny this privilege to Rachmaninoff, yet we like the treatment of the subordinate theme better. There is the regular shape here, and the themes come back at the end in an orthodox manner, and this time there is cadenza-work which the pianist played with abundant technical display.

And that reminds us to speak of Rachmaninoff, the pianist. Gifted by nature with phenomenal hands which can stretch to unheard-of intervals, he was naturally inclined to put some wide chords in his concerto, and he yielded somewhat to the temptation which beset Liszt, Rubinstein, Chopin and other pianist-composers, to sometimes make the solo instrument unduly prominent. His concerto, however, was often, what a concerto ought to be, a symphonic work with a thread of solo woven through it.

Intelligence, of course, this pianist has an abundance of, but this does not overshadow his impetuous temperament. He does not play for popular applause, like some of the great pianists we wot of. In this evident immersion in his task he reminds of Rubinstein, although his quiet and retiring manner is almost the opposite of that lion of the keyboard. He was recalled again and again at the end of the concerto. We have seldom seen such great and continued enthusiasm displayed at the afternoon concerts.

SUNDAY POST,
DECEMBER 19, 1909

Rachmaninoff's Personality

Sergei Rachmaninoff made no especial sensation when he played some of his piano compositions last month in Symphony Hall, but after the Symphony rehearsal of last Friday afternoon he might be said, as far as this little corner of the universe is concerned, to have awakened famous.

The tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and, in a lesser degree, the piano concerto, of which he gave such a sweeping performance, stamped him at once as a very exceptional figure among contemporaneous composers. It is questionable, indeed, whether any of the Russians of today can point to such a profound and superbly constructed work as an emblem of national achievement in the subtlest of all arts. We consider that this tone-poem alone is sufficient to place its author in the front rank of the men who are creating today.

In conversation Mr. Rachmaninoff retains the singular poise and magnetism which are his on the concert platform. It is not frequently that such inner richness and refinement are met in a man so well equipped for the everyday experiences of life. He rose rather wearily, with the slight stoop of the shoulders which, like everything else about him, seems his particular characteristic. His greeting savored equally of impersonal cordiality and a sort of "So be it," not foreign to the mood of "The Isle of the Dead."

A Picture of Enthusiasm

From so highly developed a personality it was the more pleasing to meet with the most genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm; to see the eyes sparkle as he leaned forward in an earnest moment; to note the slight quiver of the curving lips when he became excited. The fine forehead and the strong nose are in this instance infallible marks of character and intellect. The eyes are unspoiled; they are still frank and kindly, and most of the time they are fixed upon you. The lips are sensuous and very sensitive, as are the long, nervous hands.

Mr. Rachmaninoff is as cosmopolitan in his ideals as in his music, which is only national, inasmuch as certain inherited qualities of temperament find expression in a characteristically racial manner. He considers that since the death of Cesar Cui and Rimsky-Korsakoff there are no great nationalists among the Russians who write music today. Was this deplorable, we asked, or the reverse. He responded, if the music was bad, it was deplorable; if good, the reverse, and thus a debatable matter was immediately disposed of.

"For myself, when I was in Paris and some of my music was heard there, the critics considered my style was peculiarly Russian, and they urged me to continue so. But I remember that one of the New York papers—I do not recall what one—discovered that my third piano concerto depends entirely upon national themes. This is not so. I could not do that, even if I wished it. That remarkable master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, could take a folk-tune of his people and weave a symphony from it. That is beyond me!

"I do not know what the musical future of Russia will be. There are many young and promising men, entirely cosmopolitan in their leanings, who have surprising technic, and who write a great deal. At this time Scriabine, for some years a colleague of mine at the Imperial Conservatory, is the most discussed. I cannot say that his later compositions are sympathetic to me. In former years he wrote music that had great promise and originality of style. I feel that he has imitated Strauss. The early works of the German are full of beauty and imagination. For those recently published I can only say that they seem to me unnatural and extravagant. 'Don Juan,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' 'Till Eulenspiegel' —wonderful! There are beautiful pages in 'Salome,' but 'Electra,' for instance, is totally impossible. I cannot endure a single measure.

Debussy Too Artificial

"What direction musical development will take it is utterly impossible to foretell. They say that the advance guard is from France. That may be so, but I do not understand such compositions. I do not like Debussy at all. His style appears artificial to me. 'D'Indy?' No! 'Ravel?' No! If you wish to know whom I consider the greatest of the Frenchmen, it is Saint-Saens! These things after all must remain to a great extent matters of taste. We can only realize what we can appreciate. Now, the composer of all composers who means most to me, whose works I know by heart, is Tschaikowsky. He is neither a Russian nor a cosmopolitan. He is Tschaikowsky, and there is nothing that I cannot find in his scores."

"There is a branch of composition in which Russians have excelled, and in which I think there is a great field for them in years to come. I mean opera. Rimsky-Korsakoff has written works that are positively marvellous in their atmosphere, the instrumentation and the employment of the chorus. Those works are unique. Opera has been almost from the beginning a genuine outpouring of the spirit of the people, while symphonic composition has been an acquired art. The result of a performance of one of these operas in America would interest me. I have no idea how they would impress this public.

"The Isle of Death? Of course I have known the picture for many years, but it was not until two years ago, in Germany, that I thought of writing music to it. Bocklin created an epoch in art, and he nourished a generation of artists. The impression of the silent picture had been mine for so long that musical ideas seemed already formed when I looked for them, though the scoring took a good deal of time. Such pictures had to be painted, and, 'with a smile,' for at least one of them 'music had to be written.'"

MONITOR,
DECEMBER 20, 1909.

Max Fiedler in one number of the program of the ninth Symphony concert in Smphony hall Saturday night, gave up his baton to the Russian composer Sergei Rachmaninoff, who conducted the first performance in Boston of a new symphonic poem of his own.

The music of Rachmaninoff could have been interpreted just as well by Mr. Fiedler, and for the best results perhaps should have been, but Mr. Rachmaninoff's control of the Symphony men was sure and his ideas found very adequate expression.

The new work contains two distinct styles of orchestral composition, both of them distinctly modern. The first half of it, or a little more than the first half, strives in the manner of Debussy to maintain a uniform effect of color with varying orchestration; it avoids the use of the solo principle, and consequently keeps the direct expression which comes through melody as far as possible in a subordinate relation.

The latter part of the poem is more in the manner of Richard Strauss, with its direct melodic outbursts and with its individualizing of the solo violin.

The greater originality of treatment was in the early part of the work, and it was this part, perhaps, that Mr. Rachmaninoff felt was safer in his own hands than in the hands of Mr. Fiedler. Whatever else Mr. Rachmaninoff is, he is modern and he is working out new types of orchestral expression hand in hand with the great living composers of Europe. With him music is an expression of the general purposes of the times rather than an expression of a narrow individuality. He could never be a mere national composer of the Russians. He is in no way self-centered. He does not look into his heart and write, but he looks out on the world and writes. Wherever he sees an indication of men's best thoughts he hastens to formulate it in music.

The ninth Symphony program contained a second work by Mr. Rachmaninoff, a piano concerto new to Boston. Mr. Fiedler conducted this work and Mr. Rachmaninoff was soloist. The whole program of the concert was as follows:

Brahms, tragic overture, op. 81; Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," symphonic poem for full orchestra, to the picture by A. Bocklin; Rachmaninoff, second concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, op. 18; Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

BOSTON JOURNAL—
JANUARY 22, 1910.

A seventy-seven-year-old overture by Hector Berlioz, called "Rob Roy," had its first performance in Boston at yesterday's Symphony matinee. It proved to have a deep Caledonian complexion. Berlioz himself has referred to the overture as being "long and diffuse" and it might well have been allowed to rest in peace. The applause for it yesterday was indeed perfunctory.

The solo number was remarkable for its duet form—the concerto in A minor, by Brahms, for violin and 'cello, with Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the former leader of the orchestra's 'cello wing, as soloists. Mr. Schroeder was also one of the soloists when the concerto was performed here before, in 1893, in 1897 and again in 1902. It is a thoroughly delightful work and it had on this occasion a worthy performance. The playing of the soloists was praiseworthy not alone for its technical but for its sympathetic quality. The orchestral support was excellent and the result was a rare pleasure that prompted the audience to start the applause even before Mr. Fiedler had stopped swinging his baton.

But all this was mere pleasantry compared with what followed—the performance of the Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The piece is also called a symphonic poem, but Strauss is said to prefer the other appellation. He would have the music speak for itself, independently of a program. For the most part it does speak for itself, so that the title of the piece might well be, not "Thus Spake Nietzsche," as has been suggested, but rather "Thus Spake Strauss." No doubt the composer was under the spell of the extraordinary philosopher who began by praising Wagner and ended by roasting him on both sides. The poem was played here last year and Mr. Fiedler's success as a Strauss conductor fully justified this comparatively quick repetition. The performance yesterday was very impressive.

There will be no soloist next week. Beethoven's "Grand Fugue for String Orchestra" will be performed by the orchestra for the first time. A symphonic poem by Sibelius, "Night-Ride and Sunrise," will be another novelty. The symphony will be Franck's in D minor. The prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" will complete the program.

The report that Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer and conductor, is to succeed Mr. Fiedler at the end of the present season, was authoritatively denied yesterday.

THE BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 1. 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Rehearsal Devoted to Scattered Miscellany.

Sibelius Supplies the Music, Miss Tilly Koenen is Soloist.

The afternoon at the symphony rehearsal was one of scattered miscellany. Sibelius furnished the symphony—his second, in D major—and Tilly Koenen, contralto, was the soloist. No feature or personality predominated, either of composer or soloist.

Sibelius, in this symphony, appears to be obsessed of a series of startling, shuddering episodes which he projects from time to time with grim and inexorable insistence. He frequently calls upon the brass for loud and hysterical proclamation of them. When he would be squeamishly uncanny, he sets the bassoons in hollow octaves to playing blind man's buff, with the 'cellos stealthily picking their way through a miasma of pizzicato notes, as in the opening theme of the andante.

According to Mr Sibelius, pastoral naivete in Finland savors of the eerie frolics of imps, elves and chattering goblins. When he would bid a member of the wood-wind choir to speak with any individual prominence it was invariably a grewsome, sour or neurotic reply which he received—with one exception; the theme for oboe in the lento of the third movement had beauty and character.

This tendency to episode pointed either with noise or with unexpressive gloom would not be insignificant in itself were it not for the tedious transitional passages which intervene.

The first two movements are the most logical and sustained in interest. Most welcome is the cantabile second theme of the andante, which was beautifully played by the strings.

In the last two movements the composer appears to suffer a dearth of ideas. He is given to long and vapid sequences. He has high-sounding pages upon which all choirs, and notably the brass, become zealous in the upheaval. There is no engaging conflict of dramatic forces, nor is the bombastic apotheosis a convincing resolution of the struggle.

In spite of the virtuosity of this orchestra and the discriminating sense of every available value with which Mr Fiedler read the score, this work appeared of less interest than any modern piece of the season thus far.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish themes was a series of tonal pictures of exhilarating, exuberant rhythms and brilliant orchestral color. Mr Fiedler's keen sense of rhythm and the incisive eloquence and swift vitality which it alone can impart to music of strong pulse, gives to such a number an imperious virility—just as it did yesterday.

Miss Koenen sang first Beethoven's recitative and aria "Ah! Perfido," and after Brahms' Menuetto from his Serenade, No. 1, by the orchestra, she added three songs with orchestral accompaniment.

Miss Koenen sings with sincerity and an apparent conviction. Obviously she has abundance of temperament, and the eagerness to communicate the idea in its entirety as it actuates her.

This singer appears to be of that type of contraltos who sacrifice natural beauty of voice in striving for a big tone. Brightness and poise give way to a smothered, sepulchral quality which leaves an inaudible pianissimo, and a labored execution in florid passages.

Her medium voice when used with moderate power shows this defect the least. The sweep of Strauss' melodic line in his "Hymnus" was quite beyond her. Mr Fiedler's delightful "Die Musikantin," a song requiring much color of voice and quick sense of rhythm, found Miss Koonen animated, as did Wolf's "Erists."

JOURNAL

JANUARY 1, 1910.

Tilly Koenen, the Dutch Contralto, Gives Especial Pleasure.

By appearing yesterday at the Symphony rehearsal and tonight at the Symphony concert, Tilly Koenen, the Dutch contralto, will have the distinction of being the last Symphony soloist for 1909 and the first for 1910.

Miss Koenen gave the most satisfaction yesterday with a trio of songs that included Mr. Fiedler's "Tambourine Player." This was performed so well, by both soloist and orchestra, that the applause treaded close to the encore ground. The song represents the youthful work of the distinguished conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. It showed grace and vigor. The sentiment of the poem was perfectly translated in the music. Miss Koenen also sang Richard Strauss' "Hymnus." Wolf's "'Tis Spring," and Beethoven's Italian scene and aria, "Ah! Perfido."

The orchestra played the Sibelius symphony in D major for the second time—or for the first time since 1904—and the audience, to judge by the applause, found much to enjoy in the work. There was an exceedingly graceful performance of the menuetto from the Brahms serenade in D major. The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," a brimming cup of musical allspice, came last, to make the return to the cold blasts and iced sidewalks outside all the more unexciting.

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be next week's soloist. He will play the Brahms concerto in D major. Elman's symphony board for the first [illegible]

M. Loeffler [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 20.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT AND MR. RACHMANINOFF

More Admiration for Him on Saturday Night—"The Isle of the Dead" for a Second Hearing—Its Rare Traits in Contemporary Music—The Christmas "Messiah"—Miss Alda for a New Marguerite and Mr. Kolumbin for a New Tenor—Mr. Russell's Own View of the Season Thus Far—Mischa Elman's Concerts Here—The Double Bass as a Solo Instrument—Mme. Fremstad as Elsa

Mr. Rachmaninoff was as eagerly received and as warmly applauded, alike as composer, conductor and pianist, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday night as he had been on that of Friday afternoon. His grave and sincere presence once more commended him to his audience; it quickly discovered the quiet power and the static personal force in his conducting that made the band responsive to his will; and it heard in the concerto a musician, who was also a pianist and who chose at moments on Saturday night to suggest that it was a brilliant virtuoso whom he had thus subdued with rare artistic resolution, to the interpretative musician. The repetition of Mr. Rachmaninoff's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," confirmed every impression that it had made on Friday and brought others as illuminating.

In recent years, tone-poems have come thick and fast at the Symphony Concerts, and the problem that has beset the composers of every one of them is the adjustment of their musical structure and content, with their poetic structure and content. A true tone-poem should be symphonic—that is to say it should state its musical ideas and then develop and relate them in orderly fashion. The composer should work out his musical thoughts, so that musical paragraph should spring from musical paragraph; he should make his original material fertile before he adds new to it; his whole piece should be continuous musically, an organic musical whole, and not a mere succession of disjointed and scanty or prolix episodes. At the same time, the music should unfold the pictorial, the poetic, the characterizing ideas, moods, impressions that the composer would have it suggest, and a tone-poem becomes a true tone-poem in the strict and almost the ideal sense, only when it simultaneously and unitedly attains both these ends, so that the development of the musical structure and of the poetic or the pictorial images becomes as an integral thing.

Strauss has attained this unity in "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration;" Mr. Loeffler matches him in "A Pagan Poem;" and now Mr. Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," seems coequal with them. The pictorial and the poetic imagery of the piece, as the music disclosed it on Friday afternoon, surpassed every other impression. On Saturday night, it was as impressive even while the ear and the intelligence were following the purely symphonic structure of the music. The tone-poem is not episodic, but continuous; its fundamental musical ideas are developed and elaborated; new ideas spring from them, the severest purist, unless he denied tone-poems in general the right to exist, cannot quarrel with it as an organic musical whole. Yet it is as completely the tonal poetry, the tonal picturing, and in a very particular and vivid fashion that Mr. Rachmaninoff would have it. Often in private talk, he deplores the excesses of "ultra-modern" music. He believes it possible to accomplish its delineative ends with more musical respect, in the narrow sense, to the means. In "The Isle of the Dead," he has practised his faith and justified it.

Ultra-modern composers, when they write tone-poems, or, indeed, anything else, are fain to be as emphatic as they can. If they sing, it must be ofteness in the broadest of cantilena; if they are agitated, tempests swirl through their music; if they despair, the lowest range of the sarrusophone, to say nothing of the double bassoon, may hardly compass the gloom of their imaging; if they are elate, they whirl like dervishes; if they would characterize, black indeed are the black lines and sharp the contrasts; if they have new harmonic systems, they make them cut. They are not a reticent breed; they would express all that is in them up to the hilt and, oftenest, in the full glare of the world. Austerity is not their characteristic virtue; serenity they count oftenest boredom; and as for an emotion or a poetic image that has too deep for the fullest expression that they can give it, they have none such Mr. Rachinaninoff, in "The Isle of the Dead" stands apart from them. The music even when the loud stress is greatest as in the passages of lamentation and torture, is austere, exalted, remote music of noble idea, of large emotion, of continent spirit, and not of mere nervous and changing excitements. The passion of it is grave.

Again, the beginning and the end, in the picturing of the isle and in the wearing of its atmosphere, is music of a rare and detached serenity, poetic imagery expressed in tones, with a reticence that only deepens the colors of the picture and with a sustained exaltation that the more freer than from any cumbrus or common dis-rich. There is intense feeling in it; and Mr. Rachmaninoff's tones sometimes serve Böchlin's vision better than did the painters own colors; but that feeling only makes the half-lights and the shadowy gradations of the music the more illusive and poignant. Deliberately Mr. Rachmaninoff has chosen an instrumental palette as subdued and smooth as Böcklin's, but his variety of tint within that smooth texture is ampler and his lines run more finely. Time and again, in the hearing of the music, it was easy to think of the shadowed beauty, the noble detachment, the calm of large emotion, the exaltation that was serene rather than hard of Brahms when deep feeling gravely possessed him and spoke in his finest music. Had Brahms ever written tone-poems, he might have written them structurally and expressively in Mr. Rachmaninoff's way.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 27, 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S PIANO CONCERTO AND MME. CARRENO

Old Bottles but New Wine at the Symphony Concert—Distinctive Qualities of the Work as They Were Revealed in the Playing—The Concerto as a Building of One Architecture, Entered by a Portico of Another Style—"1915," at the Castle Square Theatre, an Amusing Travesty of Local Traits with Sprightly Acting and Tangled Geography—"Carmen" Again at the Boston Opera House and Mr. Bourrillon's "Jose"

Again on Saturday evening at Symphony Hall a grand piano stood on the platform and Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor concerto on the programme; Mme. Carreño was elected to thunder its opening declamations as successor to Mr. Gabrilowitch, who played it last at these concerts a year ago; and again the programme notes reviewed the coolness between the composer and Nicholas Rubinstein, which followed that initial performance of the work in the St. Petersburg class room. Certain circumstances of this peformance gave a new emphasis to the concerto, and that episode. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, it will be remembered, played the work as one Russian appreciating another. His ardor and his brilliancy had a national flavor to them. The impression of the work as a piano concerto was somewhat swamped in sympathy for the player's patriotic glow. Mme. Carreño, while she wanted nothing of the warmth, abated much of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's partisanship. A more calm-eyed survey of the concerto was the result; also, a measure of sympathy with some of the dissent aroused at that early first performance. The work is so large-boned; its thunders so lend themselves to virtuosity at its best—and also at its worst—as to slide over many elements of challenge. What, for instance, becomes of the magnificent theme of the introduction, after it has served the purpose of the introduction? Why, then, were we invited into a noble pile through an Ionic portico to find the whole interior Romanesque? Again, as the piece built up its structural splendors, came the question if the architect had not too promptly embodied his vision in reality. This concerto has been the garment of many a player; of enough to have revealed its pattern thoroughly; not to have worn it threadbare, perhaps, but to have shown here and there a wrinkle.

[illegible] here and there a seam showed in the work itself, in its playing there was the utmost skill of workmanship. Mme. Carreño had chosen a medium which allows her to do what she is peculiarly qualified to do with the instrument in these tempests. As her hands swept the keyboard of its double fist-fulls of chords in the opening measures, and subdividing into the sharp figure of the theme's second episode, her tone was so far from the ordinary clamors of virtuosity as to have caught a smooth, rich resonance which sang like an undertone from moment to moment. The player was achieving subtlety of tone coloring in the thunders of her fortissimo; she was bringing an art of exquisite shades to a canvas of heroic size. And it was here more than in the legato passages, more than even in the poesy of the slow movement which chimes a pianoforte accompaniment to a half-solo 'cello, that Mme. Carreño's individual values were felt. In the opening movement and again in the finale, the orchestra frequently overbalanced the solo instrument. In a passage of rushing octaves, or crashing chords, the soloist might be counted upon to dominate any tumult of the band, but in the weaving of the pianoforte arpeggii with which Tschaikowsky delights to festoon the beginning of his themes by woodwind and strings, the contest—and it became definitely so—was unequal. There was even a hint, in the execution of these long arabesques, terribly fleet, that the soloist, too, was a little scant of breath.

For the other numbers of the programme, Bizet's Suite from the music for "L'Arlésienne" came with unexpected vigor and melody—particularly the Adagietto which has the intimacy of measures to accompany the spoken word with much greater richness of tone than mere "incidental" music; Beethoven's fourth symphony Mr. Fiedler caused to walk the accustomed stately paces of its slow movements with a polish of phrasing, while, for the allegros, especially of the first moyement and the third, the rhythms were lashed into an impetuosity that approached violence. The closing measures were a gust, or as the Elizabethans would have said, a "flaw" of sudden sound. Quite apart from its seasonable subject, however, Bach's Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio" came with the most distinction both of Mr. Fiedler's leading and the band's following. Its stately weaving of polyphony, the alternations of its quaint pipings, the beautifully contrasted timbres of the instruments and the reserved comment of the organ may all have been a slightly amplified Bach, as regarded actual proportions of sounds, but it seemed just to suppose that it was an enlargement by which Bach was the gainer. Its proportions and its repose, as of the meditative calm of Eastern hillsides under clear night skies, were sounded by the orchestra in a bit of its smoothest playin and by its leader in his utmost skill phrase.

L. [illegible]

MONITOR,

JANUARY 10, 1910.

LAST summer Mischa Elman spent his three months vacation at the seashore in Holland, learning new music for his concert tours this season. He took especial pains to prepare as far as he could a fresh American repertory, because he knew that his American audiences would not like to have him ask for their applause in the same music that he presented last year.

Mr. Elman has played much since the season began; he gave 50 concerts in Germany alone in October, November and December.

The Dvorak concerto, which was his number on the Symphony program Saturday night, he first played last summer in a concert given by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra at Scheveningen. He has performed this work at regular concerts of the present musical season in Berlin, Paris, Leipsic and London.

Elman's Stradivarius violin, men in the Symphony orchestra say, has changed its tone since a year ago. And without doubt it has, for Elman could not have spent a summer of study on a new repertory without thinking out new ideas of expression and making his Stradivarius give out tones corresponding to those ideas. He seems to prefer a less highly accented rhythm than pleased him formerly; in his phrasing he shows a tendency to subdue the sharper, more obvious outlines of his melody. His tone and his playing altogether in the Dvorak concerts is more subjective than it was in the pieces he gave in his first concerts here.

The Elgar symphony, which appeared on Mr. Fiedler's twelfth program was interpreted in the serious manner which becomes the work and was given such applause as the Saturday audience has only for Mr. Fiedler's best efforts. The program of the concert was as follows: Elgar, symphony in A-flat major, op. 55: Dvorak, concerto in A minor for violin, op. 53; soloist, Mischa Elman; fantasia for orchestra and organ, op. 9; organist, Mr. Marshall.

[69]

TRANSCRIPT
JANUARY 1, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SIBELIUS, RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF AND MILESTONES

Mr. Fiedler for the First Time as a Composer at These Concerts—His "Tambourine Player" and the Singing of Miss Koenen—A Nearer View of Sibelius's Second Symphony and a Perspective on the "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff—The Old and the New in Russian Music, with Remote Echoes of Rachmaninoff's "Todteninsel"

Dr. Holmes makes somewhere the heartless remark that it is profitable to drop an old acquaintance overboard now and then just to see how fast we are travelling. This remark is not exactly adduced to apply to the second Symphony of Sibelius, but in the five years which have passed since it was last performed here, there has been a degree of progress which it helps, in a measure to record. It excited admiration yesterday afternoon; it excited little wonder; and, even where it tempted cacophony, little curiosity on that score. Again its terseness was noted—the conciseness by which it may be said to abbreviate symphonic structure. Its movements contain plenty of passages of free fantasia, but Sibelius does not linger over them for their own sake. The symphony is prodigiously boiled down. It is full of phrases which would expand into sentences, and sentences which might—and under the pen of almost any other composer would—be amplified into paragraphs. With all his northern ferocities, Sibelius has the sure sense of form. It is not that he would not like to linger, but that he is more interested in getting on. This sternness with himself, however, while it sets him a time and space limit, does not prevent him from demanding of his orchestra the utmost resources of its instrumental color. As it happened, a later number on the programme was to bring another season of vivid hues. Rimsky-Korsakoff's black-and-yellow "Caprice on Spanish Themes" is close of kin in this respect at least. The resemblance and the difference may be stated in some such way as this: Sibelius ransacks his color box for combinations within the limitations of a certain scheme. Heartily as we are bound to admire the vigor and energy of the Russian's work, its pictorial value is much as if the proverbial painter had stood up and hurled his proverbial pallette at the proverbial canvas, with this reservation—that it was, on the whole, an uncommonly lucky throw.

The deft interrelation of parts in this shaggy symphony of Sibelius, its conformity to just proportions, has a rightness which suggests the splendid limbs and torso of a Norseman revealing their accurate contours through his rough dress of skins. The first movement, especially, rises with the symmetry of a pyramid, built broad on the base of things. Its line rises to the peak of climax, and descends again. It begins with a curiously vibrant undertone of chanting strings, over which, in turn, mount its stridencies. It abates; again to the vibrant undertone of chanting strings. Mr. Fiedler found a congenial task in building up its phrases block upon block, and neither did his skill with the details dim his sense of the proportions. He made them, on the contrary, express the proportions, as in the transition passage which links the third movement—built on a much less ample scale—to the Finale. It is necessary to get from something in the proportions of an ordinary scherzo directly into the heroics of the last movement. Sibelius simply climbs a slope from his pleasant valley to his rugged tableland. And the boldness of Mr. Fiedler's leadership up that instrumental slope not only made the relations of the two movements instantly clear; it made one of the most effective single moments of the afternoon.

Since this symphony first came to fruition not only his brethren but Sibelius himself has had much to say. Perhaps its daring has come to sound a little timid. Today it impresses as a work undoubtedly with flashes of inspiration, but flashes; undeniably earnest in its thinking, and with that thinking at times somewhat mathematical; and splendidly pictorial of the rugged grandeur of the north under its leaden skies.

Beethoven's scene and aria, "Ah! Perfido," was aptly chosen by Miss Koenen. The largeness of the music and the sombre tones which it employs are suited to a voice of just such heavy and sober colorings as hers. Such a voice is rarely flexible, and where the aria requires vocal agility, there was lack of clarity in her tones. To the interpretative part of her task, nevertheless, she brought a appreciation which did not allow the large outlines of the work to contract and at length, when caught in the sweep of one of Beethoven's irresistible rhythms urged mightily by the simplest figure of stalking bass, her voice transcended any limitations of quality and rose over the tumult of orchestra in the majesty required of it. She was more less expressive in Strauss's music Schiller's "Hymnus"—as to which a wit architect was heard to remark that it was as if he had tried to copy a Madonna with compass and T square—and she was correspondingly more so in Hugo Wolf's brief and impassioned little lyric to Spring, "Er Ist's." The novelty of the afternoon, and one of its delights was Mr. Fiedler's song with orchestral accompaniment, "The Tambourine Player." It is rich, both in melody and instrumentation, and the former is ever shared by voice and orchestra. A brilliant phrase to the musical clatter of the tambourine establishes the mood of the piece on the instant; the intrusion of gloomy minors on its lilting rhythm maintains that mood; and for a completeness of impression, it concludes with the opening phrase and whirr of the tambourine. It is a song admirably attuned to its theme and perfectly clear Exactly a fortnight ago Boston was listening to a tone poem by one of the group of younger Russian composers. The performance of Mr. Rachmaninoff's "Todteninsel" brought forth many comments on the divergence of the younger men from the old nationalist school of which Rimsky-Korsakoff was an exponent. Yesterday afternoon, remembering the skill with which Mr. Rachmaninoff governed his imaginative music to union with symphonic form, it was possible, while listening to the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" of the elder composer, to guess at the length of road which lies between. Allowing for all the differences of form and intention in the two works, it is noticeable how that of Rimsky-Korsakoff has all the fitfulness, the disinclination, shall we say, to develop a theme except by giving it to a different set of instruments, as well as the exuberance of imagination which he shared with his brethren. The caprice, even more than its name implies, is brilliant, and it is as erratic. It brought a grateful interlude of virtuosity to Mr. Hess, who flung back its shimmer with a bow which never errs in such matters; it caused the brass to snarl and the strings to show their teeth like an angry Carmen; it was voluptuous, or riotous, or stentorian, and it was always epi-sodic.

L. P.

HERALD, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 1, 1910.

SYMPHONY PLAYS MELANCHOLY WORK

Sibelius' Sombre Second Symphony Practically a Novelty to Audience at the 11th Public Rehearsal.

MISS KOENEN ORCHESTRA SOLOIST FOR FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Tilly Koenen was the singer. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, D major.....Sibelius
Scene and aria, "Ah! perfido".....Beethoven
Menuetto from Senerade No. 1.Brahms
Three songs with orchestra—
Hymnus .....R. Strauss
The Tambourine Player.....Fiedler
'Tis Spring. .....Wolf
Caprice on Spanish Themes.....Rimsky-Korsakoff

The compositions by Sibelius and Rimsky-Korsakoff were practically novelties to the great majority of the audience, for the symphony had been played only once before, early in 1904, and the Caprice had been played at these concerts only once.

When Mr. Gericke produced the symphony, the work was caviare to the general and even to many receptive musicians. It was the first composition by the Finn that was played here, and little was known about the composer and still less about his habit of thought and form of expression. When the second symphony was produced by Dr. Muck, it made a deep impression, as did the violin concerto played superbly by Maud Powell. Last season Mr. Fiedler brought out "A Song of Spring" and "Finland."

Sibelius had his revenge yesterday, for the second symphony was better understood and appreciated. It is strongly individual, aggressively so, and unflinching individuality in art is generally disconcerting. The dominating mood of music is one of stern, almost savage, melancholy, a melancholy that is epic, not lyrical. The first movement is as the rhapsody of a bard, and this movement is perhaps the most perplexing of the four to one that wishes conventional thematic exposition and smug development.

The themes throughout have for the most part the character of folk-song, but Sibelius has said that he seldom if ever employs folk-songs, though he gives to themes of his own invention the characteristics of Finnish folk-song, and these national songs are charged with melancholy. The musical sentiment of the symphony is bleak, almost hopeless. There is also a rebellious spirit, as of a people clamoring for liberty. I do not recall one sensuous strain in any movement.

The triumphal ending is not an ordinary hymn of victory with perfunctory fanfares of parade. There is a wildness, the wildness of loneliness and revolt. There is the suggestion continually of the rocks and moors and fens of Finland as described even by the prosaic. There is also the suggestion of that strange national epic the "Kalevala" or, "The Land of Heroes," which should be better known, now that it is published in Every-

Once or twice there are fleeting reminiscences of Wagner in this symphony, but as a whole it is uncommonly original, in material, in structure, in sober ornamentation. The melodic lines, the rhythms, the orchestral expression are all peculiar to Sibelius. The grim sobriety is peculiar, as is the sullen despair, the hopeless attitude that follows a vain but heroic struggle. The robustness that is almost physical in tones; the manliness of this music, which in its hopelessness is neither whimpering nor hysterical; the elemental grandeur of certain pages; the bravery of the "unconquerable soul" in the "fell clutch of circumstance"—these, too, put the symphony above many others in the catalogue.

Tschaikowsky unwittingly did Rimsky-Korsakoff harm when his letter in which he described the latter's Spanish Caprice as a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" was published. Tschaikowsky was honest in his praise, but it aroused anticipations that are not realized when we hear the Caprice in 1909. "Scheherazade," by the same composer, is surely more brilliant; and compare for a moment this Caprice with Chabrier's "Espana" or with some of the pages in Bizet's "Carmen."

How inferior, how pale is this Caprice in its attempt to reproduce or suggest the dazzling light, the color, the mad or subtle rhythms, the costumes, the poetry, the atmosphere of Spain! The little impressionistic piano piece by Debussy, the "Evening at Grenada," is at the same time more realistic and more imaginative, realistic by reason of its very vagueness. The performance of the Caprice, though creditable in many ways, was aesthetically inferior to that of the symphony. The charming menuetto of Brahms with its old-time flavor was delicately played; it served well in contrast with that which preceded and that which followed, and to separate the songs.

Miss Koenen, who was heard here early in the season with Dr. Wuellner, sang for the first time in Boston with the orchestra. Her voice is full and pure, agreeable, but without distinctive charm. She uses it with skill and she has evidently had much experience. She sang Beethoven's recitative with a nice appreciation of the various sentiments, and the aria with classic repose, but this aria is written in the grand style and singers of that style are now few in number.

In the group of songs she was most successful with Mr. Fiedler's sympathetic and effective setting of a poem by Eichendorff, and this song at once caught the fancy of the audience. Her reading of "Hymnus" was tame. Wolf orchestrated the accompaniment of his "Er Ist's" ("'Tis Spring"), but the song is better with the original accompaniment with piano. All in all, Miss Koenen yesterday appeared as a highly respectable and uninspiring singer.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Elgar, Symphony in A flat major; Brahms, violin concerto (Mischa Elman); Loeffler, "The Devil's Villanelle."

ADVERTISER,
JANUARY 1, 1910

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY HEARD IN BOSTON

SINCERITY THROUGHOUT, AND PURE ORIGINALITY

Orchestra Also Plays Max Fiedler's "Die Musikantin"—Miss Koenen's Singing.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Sibelius. Symphony in D. No. 2.
Beethoven. "Ah Perfido." Scena ed Aria.
Miss Tilly Koenen.
Brahms. Minuet from Serenade in D. Opus 11.
Richard Strauss. "Hymnus."
Max Fiedler. "Die Musikantin."
Hugo Wolf. "Er Ists."
Miss Koenen.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The chief number of this concert was the Sibelius Symphony. This Finnish composer is both national and cosmopolitan The national character of his music is shown in the sombre and earnest style of much of his work. The Finns are the noblest people that ever were doomed to martyrdom by an unscrupulous tyranny. Hon. Andrew D. White, long-time our ambassador to Russia, has told the present writer that their honesty, their fidelity, their purity, can scarcely be exaggerated. Perhaps Sibelius may be fated, like Chopin, to transmute into music the disasters of his country, for music is often born of sorrow, whether national or individual.

The symphony is, of course, a much more ambitious work than the "Spring-song" and "Finlandia" by this composer, which we heard in these concerts about a year ago. But in those works as in this larger one, we find the greatest of musical virtues—Sincerity. We believe a great deal of the modern music to be insincere, to be a deliberate throwing of dust in the eyes of the public; and, unfortunately, there are always many people who reverence any music that they do not understand.

The work is original from first to last. Its first movement begins with a chief theme that is as quaint as anything in modern music. It has all the brooding and pensive character of the North and the whole Symphony suggests Tschaikowsky, with a little less melody and less Cossack frenzy than we find in the Russian's music. As with Tschaikowsky there are many impressive passages in the deepest register of the wind instruments.

The second movement begins with pizzicato mystery and the contrabasses furnish a remarkable basso ostinato here to a strange theme on the bassoons. This second movement had the character of a threnody with some moments of striking power, but it was too long; it would have gained by brevity. Decidedly Sibelius cannot be accused of copying anybody. He is original if he is anything, and just this strange originality makes us timid about pronouncing judgment. One could readily see moments of Genius, but that the whole work is one of genius we are not yet prepared to say.

Folk-themes there were again in the third and fourth movements, which are joined together. There was often a sweet sadness in these that was ineffably poetic —"and resembled sorrow only as the Mist resembles Rain." But there was much reiteration also. Sometimes this gave a picturesque monotony, but sometimes it seemed barren repetition. Chromatic scales up and down in alternation, furnished much of the bass of the Finale. There was a grand climax at the end.

The work was read very sympathetically. We suspect it of being a great symphony. At all events it is a composition which we would cordially welcome to a second hearing this season, for the sake of further study of it. It is certainly worth the pains.

The other orchestral works were of much lesser degree. Brahms's Minuet from his Serenade is finely developed for this simple form and display the great German in his more melodic vein also. There are those who consider Brahms to be always abstruse and generally tuneless. Possibly such a selection as this Minuet may cause these superficial judges to waver in their unjust opinion. Just as Bach became a link between the old, pure counterpoint and a more modern style of modulation, so Brahms reconciles the 18th century with the 20th, proving that the old forms are not threadbare and that modern expression need not necessarily depart utterly from the old channels. Such a bulwark against the flood of cacophony and formlessness in music is most valuable just at this time.

The absolute beauty of the melodies, the charm of the simple scoring, the clearness of the contrasts and their effectiveness, made the Minuet one of the most delightful compromises between classical and popular music that we have heard in a long time.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice was very brilliantly performed, but at its best we do not care much for the work. Much of it is tinsel and the efforts to excite the auditor and to be very "popular" are too evident. To use again the simile introduced above, we do not think this is a sincere work. Its glitter and its syncopations are stagy. We cannot smell much Garlic in this work, it seems as if the cook had spilled some Bortzsch in the dish while cooking it. Bizet's "Carmen" is a very different presentation of Spanish Music. But it is decidedly a popular work, in its sparkling brilliancy, and it won the greatest applause of all the concert, although we rank it below the other two orchestral numbers. Perhaps it was intended as a sop to the popular Cerberus. If so it succeeded and achieved its purpose.

[70]

SUNDAY POST,
JANUARY 2, 1910

Sibelius' Symphony Gives Memorable Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 11th concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season last night in Symphony Hall:

Symphony No. 2, Sibelius; scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido," Beethoven; menuetto from Serenade in D, Brahms; three songs with orchestra: "Hymnus," Strauss; "Die Musikantin," Max Fiedler; "Er ist's," Hugo Wolf; Caprice on Spanish themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The symphony by Sibelius has been given once before in Boston, under Mr. Gerioke, in 1904. It was the first work by the Finnish composer to be heard here, and no doubt it was largely for this reason that it did not make so strong an impression as the first symphony in E minor, given by Dr. Muck in 1907. But the symphony heard last night is a magnificent work.

It is dangerous, too. We should beware of it. It should not appear on too many programmes. It might do incalculable harm to art, for it is sufficient to beat down the guard of the cleverest philosophy of esthetics ever formulated by dilettanti!

It is disconcertingly vital. It is brusque, direct, unsparing of emphasis, a primeval product, one would say, of the land that gave it birth. For through Sibelius, who thinks in 3-2 time and speaks with the voice of the early gods, a nation becomes articulate. His orchestral style is as individual as his ideas, which are like rough lumps of richest ore. It is as much the result of them as the bed of a river is the passageway worn by the current. The instrumentation is often harsh and thick, and as often again of the highest brilliancy. Gusts of tone in the lower strings, a brass choir that bursts out in golden splendor, or chokes with choler, sweet, wild phrases for the wood-wind—the shrill skirling of an icy blast, or fitful gleams of lovely sunshine, or, as in the last movement, the long, persistent figures for the basses, like the roar of surf.

Destiny's Hand Appears

Destiny has its hand on this music. Its might is unconquerable, but chained and impotent. How magnificently it mutters and glooms! The two middle movements are prodigious beyond compare. The pizzicato of basses, which prepares the entrance of the melancholy theme for the bassoons and the entrance of that theme, is one of the most imaginative and inevitable instances of such procedure in symphonic literature. There is no escaping the mood. And what themes! The long, mornful melody for the strings in the second movement, and the pathetic, aspiring air for the oboe in the following section. Wilde said that no great artist ever sang without the fullest consciousness of the matter and the manner of his singing. Be it so. Whether preconceived or not, we know of few more affecting moments in modern music than the simple moving phrase sung by the pastoral instrument over rich harmonies in the brass—a passage made the more striking by reason of the utter contrast of the flying measures that precede.

Over all is the bleakness, the space and the eternity of the north. Listening to this symphony one would say that from that tremendous region shall come all things creative. These melodies seem to spring from the very bottom consciousness of a people—more, of humanity.

It remains to relate the astounding conclusion and its preparation. From the preceding movement the strings rush up, pile Ossa on Pelion and then walks out—what? A lordly, vulgar, heroic, commonplace tune that from a cheaper soul would serve admirably for the first eight measures of a slow waltz for the summer hotel. But how splendidly this defiance rings out! With what a battalion of brass and rhythm is it flung forth, a gauntlet thrown in the face of man and god. In other hands it would serve for the beer garden. But behold! A voice from Walhalla. The apotheosis of this theme at the last is unutterably superb. The man who can write with such force, such sheer strength and fertility of invention, who can, so to speak, throw manners to the winds and bring back the gods, is quite beyond price in an over-cultivated age. The performance of a very difficult score reflected the greatest credit upon Mr. Fiedler and his men.

In this concert Miss Koenen showed herself one of the great interpreters of song now before the public. She has a great voice, and she has executive ability which is not the property of all lauded concert singers. She felt and she communicated the nobly dramatic spirit which underlies the somewhat antiquated style of the music of Beethoven, for she has the vocal organ, the depth and sincerity of sentiment demanded by such lines. The singing of the recitative preceding the aira and of Strauss' "Hymnus" were especially memorable. The latter song makes every demand upon an artist, and Miss Koenen met these demands with a skill and comprehension, a sense of line in her phrasing, a subtlety of nuance which left little indeed to be desired.

Mr. Fiedler's song is modern in style and feeling, and an apt expression of the spirit of the poem. It does not necessarily require an orchestra for the accompaniment. Miss Koenen interpreted this song with the same insight which she had brought to bear upon the other compositions, and then she sang charmingly the delightful miniature of Wolf. There was a brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice, and the melodious movement by Brahms met with its due reward.

JOURNAL-
JANUARY 8, 1910.

MUSIC

Wednesday it was a mathematical prodigy. Yesterday it was a musical prodigy.

For Mischa Elman, who was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony matinee and who will be the soloist again tonight, is still prodigious. It is more than remarkable that a boy who won't be 18 years old until the 20th of this month should stand before the most critical audience in the country, and before the finest orchestra, and perform with brilliant success the difficult Dvorak violin concerto in A minor, which has been played here before only by Bernhard Listemann and Timothee Adamowski.

Last year, at his debut here, the stirring little Russian, who is still not much bigger than the proverbial pintpot, played the big and bristling Tschaikowsky concerto, which also was first played here by Mr. Listemann, now living in Chicago. Yesterday the Elman predecessors were represented by Mr. Adamowski. The applause that followed the performance was fairly explosive. The season's record for recalls was easily broken. But it was not altogether the art of the soloist that charged the audience; it was his strong personality. It is not out of place to call Elman the little giant among violinists.

The symphony this week is the very impressive one by Edward Elgar, the English composer, which was first performed in Boston last season. It is a work that will bear repetition again and again. The nobility of the so-called heroic theme that dominates the piece is deeply affecting. The symphony was magnificently played under the sympathetic leadership of Mr. Fiedler.

The other number on the program was C. M. Loeffler's lurid "Devil's Villanelle," the fantasia after Rollinat's poem. The audience waited to applaud Mr. Loeffler.

The orchestra now goes on its third trip, with Elman as soloist. At the next concert, two weeks hence, the soloists will be Professor Hess and Mr. Schroeder, who will play the Brahms concerto for violin and cello. The novelty will be the "Rob Roy" overture by Berlioz.

JANUARY 22,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was exceptional contrast in the programme offered by Mr. Fiedler and his men yesterday afternoon at the 13th public rehearsal of the symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall: Overture, "Rob Roy," Berlioz (first time here); concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with orchestra, Johannes Brahms; tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss. Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder were the soloists.

Berlioz' early overture has much interest, though it is not one of that composer's important works, and though Berlioz himself knew enough to take what was worth while from it, and preserve the same in the "Harold" symphony. There is the prodigious surety of the orchestration and more than one stroke of telling originality in the building of a structure which is often askew, but never characterless. The work, moreover, communicates the exhilaration of a young man writing down such ideas as are his for all he is worth, and this enthusiasm carries its own appeal.

What to say of the Brahms concerto? The thought is elevated. The instruments are handled adroitly from a symphonic standpoint, and probably quite clumsily for the executants. The orchestration is tranquil and well balanced—some would say, thick and opaque. There is high purpose in this music, and now and then, when clouds of confusing notes clear away for a moment, one senses the serenity and the calm exultation of nature—emotions which few have equalled Brahms in translating. The musical material is handled with an amount of sheer earnestness that should indeed be acknowledged—the earnestness, some would claim, of a short-sighted individual with a lexicon.

Intricacy after intricacy unravels itself to say, "Now do you understand?" Perhaps, but after having burrowed like a mole among themes and counter themes, how many of us remember what the composer was talking about five minutes ago? Such gravity! One bows the head before the introduction of the last movement of the C minor symphony, for instance, but are not too many of these passages like some unusually portentous appearing gentleman, heavily [illegible] who sits down heavily after the [illegible] "I think—I think"—a [illegible]

The performance was excellent. Mr. Hess played the more brilliant instrument, yet he and Mr. Schroeder should be praised highly for the unity, the sureness and insight of their performance, and the orchestral part was well played.

The performance of Strauss' epoch-making work was inspiring in the extreme, and the most emphatic protest against mediocre music-making. The verdict of posterity cannot be delivered today, nor does a newspaper concern itself with posterity. All that can be said is that Strauss today seems above and beyond any other contemporaneous writer of symphonic music. No one else possesses his inspired technic, no one is so superbly artistic in entirely subordinating that technic to expression. Who equals him in imaginative sweep? To listen to this music is to behold a panorama of the universe. It should be added that there could hardly have been a more impressive [illegible] of the [illegible] poem.

BOSTON GLOBE
JANUARY 8, 1910

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Repetition of Composition by Sir Edward Elgar.

Mischa Elman, Soloist, Is Greeted With Hearty Applause.

The symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon became reminiscent of last year, in the repetition of Sir Edward Elgar's symphony; and, excepting one of Mrs McAllister's morning musicales, in the first appearance this season of Mischa Elman. He had previously been announced to play the Brahms concerto. That by Dvorak in A minor was substituted. Mr Loeffler's Fantasia for orchestra and organ, after Rollinat's poem, "The Devil's Villanelle," closed the program:

Memory does not need a violent prod to recall the symphony. Few foreign pieces of music had been so bruited abroad as the great light which was promised by the prophets. The honest and sturdy Britons, inspired with the belief that after two barren centuries a great composer had been born, arose and hailed him with one accord. The echoes of their plaudits crossed the sea and caused some stir. Anticipation was whetted keen. Walter Damrosch expounded upon the work at Carnegie hall and then produced it, Jan 3, 1909.

Mr Fiedler and the orchestra played it for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of Feb 26.

Every American scribe of music has long since located its precise niche in the symphonic gallery. Nothing original could possibly be said now.

The simple fact remains that impressions yesterday practically coincided with those of 11 months ago. It becomes more apparent that in their zeal the British reviewers at times mistook the sodden for the serious, and fustian for heroism. There are pages opaque with the commonplace. Others are flamboyant with much clangor. There remain, however, portions which have strength, intensity and beauty.

As before, the first movement seemed the most convincing. The warring of its forces was quick, tense and sharply incisive. The rigorously accenting brasses clash in splendid onslaughts against the other choirs. The English always could fight. Interest is whetted and sustained. Disposition of thematic material and its orchestral color are impressive.

The scherzo, however, styled by Elgar Allegro, again romps by like a troop of booted clowns. They may be exuberant in England, but they sound obstreperous here. The Adagio, into which the movement leads without pause, again seemed prolix, and often weighted with dire heaviness rather than deep seriousness.

The last movement again appears to sacrifice a final climax, because the high pitch it strikes and maintains leaves little chance to say more. The brasses ejaculate and scream. The whole orchestra wades through noise. At times it speaks of courage and triumph. Oftener it is wearisome.

This symphony is greatly taxing upon conductor, players and those who listen. This may suggest a cause for the two unusual slips in the wood-wind.

Elgar's accredited position as composer of superior choral works warranted the eager anticipation of his symphony. Yesterday, despite Mr Fiedler's diligent and just reading, it still seems to have been much overrated. Mr Fiedler deserves thanks for this chance to hear it again.

Mr Elman, more mature of physique and still more assured of manner, was heard with the greatest pleasure. He encompassed the herculean technical difficulties of the concerto, appalling octaves and all, with absolute sovereignty. His tone has become even broader. Through it runs the same virile and impassioned fire.

Mr Elman has fathomed the deepest, most vital secrets of rhythm. He, above any artist on the present concert stage, allows it to possess, to enkindle, to intoxicate both nerve and blood until it becomes the puissant force in music which it may be, when a great temperament bids it. He was recalled time after time.

Mr Loeffler's picturesque fantasy, as reproduced through the brilliant virtuosity of this bard, was by turns relaxing, amusing, exhilarating—always delightful.

GLOBE—SATURDAY,
JANUARY 22, 1910.

BERLIOZ' "ROB ROY" IS GIVEN

First Time in Hub at Symphony Rehearsal.

Rare Treatment of Scottish Themes by the Composer.

Teaching of Zarathustra in Musicianly Setting.

The program of the 13th public rehearsal of the orchestra yesterday afternoon included the overture to "Rob Roy," by Berlioz (first time in Boston); the concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with orchestra, by Brahms, with Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder for the soloists; the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, freely rendered after the book by Friedrich Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra, a Book for All and None."

Berloiz, having won the Paris conservatory "Prix de Rome" by his cantata, "The Death of Sardanapalus," traveled and sojourned in Italy. At Nice he outlined this overture. After a performance at the conservatory April 14, 1833, he burned the score and parts. Had he heard his work played for the first time as it was yesterday he would have had less cause for his action.

The Morose Berlioz Touch.

The overture is fiery, impassioned, rebellious, repining and morose by turns. Berlioz, when normal, was of like temper. He endeavored to mask something of his own disquietude under Scottish dress, but the autobiographical earmarks are not beyond recognition.

He uses a repeated martial figure as rugged and grim as the onset of doughty Scottish clans. They fight with fitful, feverish zeal, but come to no sure sign of victory or defeat. There are many abrupt transitions. There is frequent reedy, bagpipe flavor. There are melodies for the english horn unmistakably Scotch in color; they were strangely quaint and at times morbid.

The work sounds incoherent, but it has an individuality, a voice and a certain puissance, which only an erratic and brilliant genius could have given it. For these qualities Mr Fiedler's reading is accountable in a balancing of choirs which gave the essential voices their just value.

Brahms Gives Two Solo Parts.

The Brahms concerto, uncommon in the use of two solo parts, reveals again what frank and ingenuous comradeship its composer can write into a dialogue for twin solo voices and an assenting, emphasizing and commenting orchestra. Themes of lucid and appealing beauty are proposed by one of the three and recur in some new guise of tone color or melodic structure.

Technically, this is adept and musicianly development of thematic material. Simply, it is the sign of charm and true pleasureableness in music which has both emotional and intellectual worth.

It had both yesterday. Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder—the latter an eagerly welcomed figure at these concerts. Both played with delightfully pure and sonorous tone and with admirable understanding for the continuity of the quick and intimate musical conversation which they carried on together. The orchestral part was no less enjoyable. The andante had rare charm of melodic beauty, good proportion and true euphony.

Zarathustra's Teachings.

Mr Fiedler played the "Thus spake Zarathustra" at the concerts of Feb 5 and 6 last season. A hearing of this monumental work once each year could be none too often. Friedrich Nietzsche, philosopher, savant, mystic, genius, in his wellnigh incomprehensively imaginative book which inspired Strauss to achieve this tone poem, peers through a succession of vast perspectives of man's soul. He makes the tragedy of human isolation a tremendous and appalling thing. Zarathustra, his hero, wearied of the long solitude of mountains, returns to mankind and would teach them life, and in so doing would find himself.

Strauss, in his not too literal setting of this idea, begins this psychic quest of a man for himself with an introduction involving orchestra and organ of such solemnity and grandeur as to seem the slow rising of the curtain on the drama of eternity.

Episodes follow of yearning, of the creature joys of passion and dance, of the visions of past dead, of science and achievement, of the exultant night song, of the twelve strokes of the final bell. Through them all the haunting trumpet has followed with the interminable question of three unanswerable harmonic notes—the root, the fifth and the upper octave.

It was a superb performance, exquisite in the nicety of minute beauty, plangent and towering in bigness and awe.

[71]

SUNDAY POST,
JANUARY 2, 1910

Sibelius' Symphony Gives Memorable Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 11th concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season last night in Symphony Hall:

Symphony No. 2, Sibelius; scene and aria, "Ah! Perfido," Beethoven; menuetto from Serenade in D, Brahms; three songs with orchestra: "Hymnus," Strauss; "Die Musikantin," Max Fiedler; "Er Ist's," Hugo Wolf; Caprice on Spanish themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The symphony by Sibelius has been given once before in Boston, under Mr. Gericke, in 1904. It was the first work by the Finnish composer to be heard here, and no doubt it was largely for this reason that it did not make so strong an impression as the first symphony in E minor, given by Dr. Muck in 1907. But the symphony heard last night is a magnificent work.

It is dangerous, too. We should beware of it. It should not appear on too many programmes. It might do incalculable harm to art, for it is sufficient to beat down the guard of the cleverest philosophy of esthetics ever formulated by dilettanti!

It is disconcertingly vital. It is brusque, direct, unsparing of emphasis, a primeval product, one would say, of the land that gave it birth. For through Sibelius, who thinks in 3-2 time and speaks with the voice of the early gods, a nation becomes articulate. His orchestral style is as individual as his ideas, which are like rough lumps of richest ore. It is as much the result of them as the bed of a river is the passageway worn by the current. The instrumentation is often harsh and thick, and as often again of the highest brilliancy. Gusts of tone in the lower strings, a brass choir that bursts out in golden splendor, or chokes with choler, sweet, wild phrases for the wood-wind—the shrill skirling of an icy blast, or fitful gleams of lovely sunshine, or, as in the last movement, the long, persistent figures for the basses, like the roar of surf.

Destiny's Hand Appears

Destiny has its hand on this music. Its might is unconquerable, but chained and impotent. How magnificently it mutters and glooms! The two middle movements are prodigious beyond compare. The pizzicato of basses, which prepares the entrance of the melancholy theme for the bassoons and the entrance of that theme, is one of the most imaginative and inevitable instances of such procedure in symphonic literature. There is no escaping the mood. And what themes! The long, mornful melody for the strings in the second movement, and the pathetic, aspiring air for the oboe in the following section. Wilde said that no great artist ever sang without the fullest consciousness of the matter and the manner of his singing. Be it so. Whether preconceived or not, we know of few more affecting moments in modern music than the simple moving phrase sung by the pastoral instrument over rich harmonies in the brass—a passage made the more striking by reason of the utter contrast of the flying measures that precede.

Over all is the bleakness, the space and the eternity of the north. Listening to this symphony one would say that from that tremendous region shall come all things creative. These melodies seem to spring from the very bottom consciousness of a people—more, of humanity.

It remains to relate the astounding conclusion and its preparation. From the preceding movement the strings rush up, pile Ossa on Pelion and then walks out—what? A lordly, vulgar, heroic, commonplace tune that from a cheaper soul would serve admirably for the first eight measures of a slow waltz for the summer hotel. But how splendidly this defiance rings out! With what a battalion of brass and rhythm is it flung forth, a gauntlet thrown in the fac of man and god. In other hands it would serve for the beer garden. But behold! A voice from Walhalla. The apotheosis of this theme at the last is unutterably superb. The man who can write with such force, such sheer strength and fertility of invention, who can, so to speak, throw manners to the winds and bring back the gods, is quite beyond price in an over-cultivated age. The performance of a very difficult score reflected the greatest credit upon Mr. Fiedler and his men.

In this concert Miss Koenen showed herself one of the great interpreters of song now before the public. She has a great voice, and she has executive ability which is not the property of all lauded concert singers. She felt and she communicated the nobly dramatic spirit which underlies the somewhat antiquated style of the music of Beethoven, for she has the vocal organ, the depth and sincerity of sentiment demanded by such lines. The singing of the recitative preceding the aira and of Strauss' "Hymnus" were especially memorable. The latter song makes every demand upon an artist, and Miss Koenen met these demands with a skill and comprehension, a sense of line in her phrasing, a subtlety of nuance which left little indeed to be desired.

Mr. Fiedler's song is modern in style and feeling, and an apt expression of the spirit of the poem. It does not necessarily require an orchestra for the accompaniment. Miss Koenen interpreted this song with the same insight which she had brought to bear upon the other compositions, and then she sang charmingly the delightful miniature of Wolf. There was a brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice, and the melodious movement by Brahms met with its due reward.

JANUARY 22,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was exceptional contrast in the programme offered by Mr. Fiedler and his men yesterday afternoon at the 13th public rehearsal of the symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall: Overture, "Rob Roy," Berlioz (first time here); concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with orchestra, Johannes Brahms; tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss. Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder were the soloists.

Berlioz' early overture has much interest, though it is not one of that composer's important works, and though Berlioz himself knew enough to take what was worth while from it, and preserve the same in the "Harold" symphony. There is the prodigious surety of the orchestration and more than one stroke of telling originality in the building of a structure which is often askew, but never characterless. The work, moreover, communicates the exhilaration of a young man writing down such ideas as are his for all he is worth, and this enthusiasm carries its own appeal.

What to say of the Brahms concerto? The thought is elevated. The instruments are handled adroitly from a symphonic standpoint, and probably quite clumsily for the executants. The orchestration is tranquil and well balanced—some would say, thick and opaque. There is high purpose in this music, and now and then, when clouds of confusing notes clear away for a moment, one senses the serenity and the calm exultation of nature—emotions which few have equalled Brahms in translating. The musical material is handled with an amount of sheer earnestness that should indeed be acknowledged—the earnestness, some would claim, of a short-sighted individual with a lexicon.

Intricacy after intricacy unravels itself to say, "Now do you understand?" Perhaps, but after having burrowed like a mole among themes and counter themes, how many of us remember what the composer was talking about five minutes ago? Such gravity! One bows the head before the introduction of the last movement of the C minor symphony, for instance, but are not too many of these passages like some unusually portentous-appearing gentleman, heavily laden, who sits down heavily after the [illegible] momentary relapse—a start—"I think that"—then a quaff—and then ob-

The performance was excellent. Mr. Hess played the more brilliant instrument, yet he and Mr. Schroeder should be praised highly for the unity, the sureness and insight of their performance, and the orchestral part was well played.

The performance of Strauss' epoch-making work was inspiring in the extreme, and the most emphatic protest against mediocre music-making. The verdict of posterity cannot be delivered today, nor does a newspaper concern itself with posterity. All that can be said is that Strauss today seems above and beyond any other contemporaneous writer of symphonic music. No one else possesses his inspired technic, no one is so superbly artistic in entirely subordinating that technic to expression. Who equals him in imaginative sweep? To listen to this music is to behold a panorama of the universe. It should be added that there could hardly have been a more impressive reading of the monumental tone poem.

JOURNAL-
JANUARY 8, 1910.

MUSIC

Wednesday it was a mathematical prodigy. Yesterday it was a musical prodigy.

For Mischa Elman, who was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony matinee and who will be the soloist again tonight, is still prodigious. It is more than remarkable that a boy who won't be 18 years old until the 20th of this month should stand before the most critical audience in the country, and before the finest orchestra, and perform with brilliant success the difficult Dvorak violin concerto in A minor, which has been played here before only by Bernhard Listemann and Timothee Adamowski.

Last year, at his debut here, the stirring little Russian, who is still not much bigger than the proverbial pintpot, played the big and bristling Tschaikowsky concerto, which also was first played here by Mr. Listemann, now living in Chicago. Yesterday the Elman predecessors were represented by Mr. Adamowski. The applause that followed the performance was fairly explosive. The season's record for recalls was easily broken. But it was not altogether the art of the soloist that charged the audience; it was his strong personality. It is not out of place to call Elman the little giant among violinists.

The symphony this week is the very impressive one by Edward Elgar, the English composer, which was first performed in Boston last season. It is a work that will bear repetition again and again. The nobility of the so-called heroic theme that dominates the piece is deeply affecting. The symphony was magnificently played under the sympathetic leadership of Mr. Fiedler.

The other number on the program was C. M. Loeffler's lurid "Devil's Villanelle," the fantasia after Rollinat's poem. The audience waited to applaud Mr. Loeffler.

The orchestra now goes on its third trip, with Elman as soloist. At the next concert, two weeks hence, the soloists will be Professor Hess and Mr. Schroeder, who will play the Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello. The novelty will be the "Rob Roy" overture by Berlioz.

BOSTON GLOBE
JANUARY 8, 1910

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Repetition of Composition by Sir Edward Elgar.

Mischa Elman, Soloist, is Greeted With Hearty Applause.

The symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon became reminiscent of last year, in the repetition of Sir Edward Elgar's symphony; and, excepting one of Mrs McAllister's morning musicales, in the first appearance this season of Mischa Elman. He had previously been announced to play the Brahms concerto. That by Dvorak in A minor was substituted. Mr Loeffler's Fantasia for orchestra and organ, after Rollinat's poem, "The Devil's Villanelle," closed the program:

Memory does not need a violent prod to recall the symphony. Few foreign pieces of music had been so bruited abroad as the great light which was promised by the prophets. The honest and sturdy Britons, inspired with the belief that after two barren centuries a great composer had been born, arose and hailed him with one accord. The echoes of their plaudits crossed the sea and caused some stir. Anticipation was whetted keen. Walter Damrosch expounded upon the work at Carnegie hall and then produced it, Jan 3, 1909.

Mr Fiedler and the orchestra played it for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of Feb 26.

Every American scribe of music has long since located its precise niche in the symphonic gallery. Nothing original could possibly be said now.

The simple fact remains that impressions yesterday practically coincided with those of 11 months ago. It becomes more apparent that in their zeal the British reviewers at times mistook the sodden for the serious, and fustian for heroism. There are pages opaque with the commonplace. Others are flamboyant with much clangor. There remain, however, portions which have strength, intensity and beauty.

As before, the first movement seemed the most convincing. The warring of its forces was quick, tense and sharply incisive. The rigorously accenting brasses clash in splendid onslaughts against the other choirs. The English always could fight. Interest is whetted and sustained. Disposition of thematic material and its orchestral color are impressive.

The scherzo, however, styled by Elgar Allegro, again romps by like a troop of booted clowns. They may be exuberant in England, but they sound obstreperous here. The Adagio, into which the movement leads without pause, again seemed prolix, and often weighted with dire heaviness rather than deep seriousness.

The last movement again appears to sacrifice a final climax, because the high pitch it strikes and maintains leaves little chance to say more. The brasses ejaculate and scream. The whole orchestra wades through noise. At times it speaks of courage and triumph. Oftener it is wearisome.

This symphony is greatly taxing upon conductor, players and those who listen. This may suggest a cause for the two unusual slips in the wood-wind.

Elgar's accredited position as composer of superior choral works warranted the eager anticipation of his symphony. Yesterday, despite Mr Fiedler's diligent and just reading, it still seems to have been much overrated. Mr Fiedler deserves thanks for this chance to hear it again.

Mr Elman, more mature of physique and still more assured of manner, was heard with the greatest pleasure. He encompassed the herculean technical difficulties of the concerto, appalling octaves and all, with absolute sovereignty. His tone has become even broader. Through it runs the same virile and impassioned fire.

Mr Elman has fathomed the deepest, most vital secrets of rhythm. He, above any artist on the present concert stage, allows it to possess, to enkindle, to intoxicate both nerve and blood until it becomes the puissant force in music which it may be, when a great temperament bids it. He was recalled time after time.

Mr Loeffler's picturesque fantasy, as reproduced through the brilliant virtuosity of this bard, was by turns relaxing, amusing, exhilarating—always delightful.

GLOBE—SATURDAY,
JANUARY 22, 1910.

BERLIOZ' "ROB ROY" IS GIVEN

First Time in Hub at Symphony Rehearsal.

Rare Treatment of Scottish Themes by the Composer.

Teaching of Zarathustra in Musicianly Setting.

The program of the 13th public rehearsal of the orchestra yesterday afternoon included the overture to "Rob Roy," by Berlioz (first time in Boston); the concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with orchestra, by Brahms, with Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder for the soloists; the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, freely rendered after the book by Friedrich Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra, a Book for All and None."

Berloiz, having won the Paris conservatory "Prix de Rome" by his cantata, "The Death of Sardanapalus," traveled and sojourned in Italy. At Nice he outlined this overture. After a performance at the conservatory April 14, 1833, he burned the score and parts. Had he heard his work played for the first time as it was yesterday he would have had less cause for his action.

The Morose Berlioz Touch.

The overture is fiery, impassioned, rebellious, repining and morose by turns. Berlioz, when normal, was of like temper. He endeavored to mask something of his own disquietude under Scottish dress, but the autobiographical earmarks are not beyond recognition.

He uses a repeated martial figure as rugged and grim as the onset of doughty Scottish clans. They fight with fitful, feverish zeal, but come to no sure sign of victory or defeat. There are many abrupt transitions. There is frequent reedy, bagpipe flavor. There are melodies for the english horn unmistakably Scotch in color; they were strangely quaint and at times morbid.

The work sounds incoherent, but it has an individuality, a voice and a certain puissance, which only an erratic and brilliant genius could have given it. For these qualities Mr Fiedler's reading is accountable in a balancing of choirs which gave the essential voices their just value.

Brahms Gives Two Solo Parts.

The Brahms concerto, uncommon in the use of two solo parts, reveals again what frank and ingenuous comradeship its composer can write into a dialogue for twin solo voices and an assenting, emphasizing and commenting orchestra. Themes of lucid and appealing beauty are proposed by one of the three and recur in some new guise of tone color or melodic structure.

Technically, this is adept and musicianly development of thematic material. Simply, it is the sign of charm and true pleasureableness in music which has both emotional and intellectual worth.

It had both yesterday. Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder—the latter an eagerly welcomed figure at these concerts. Both played with delightfully pure and sonorous tone and with admirable understanding for the continuity of the quick and intimate musical conversation which they carried on together. The orchestral part was no less enjoyable. The andante had rare charm of melodic beauty, good proportion and true euphony.

Zarathustra's Teachings.

Mr Fiedler played the "Thus spake Zarathustra" at the concerts of Feb 5 and 6 last season. A hearing of this monumental work once each year could be none too often. Friedrich Nietzsche, philosopher, savant, mystic, genius, in his wellnigh incomprehensively imaginative book which inspired Strauss to achieve this tone poem, peers through a succession of vast perspectives of man's soul. He makes the tragedy of human isolation a tremendous and appalling thing. Zarathustra, his hero, wearied of the long solitude of mountains, returns to mankind and would teach them life, and in so doing would find himself.

Strauss, in his not too literal setting of this idea, begins this psychic quest of a man for himself with an introduction involving orchestra and organ of such solemnity and grandeur as to seem the slow rising of the curtain on the drama of eternity.

Episodes follow of yearning, of the creature joys of passion and dance, of the visions of past dead, of science and achievement, of the exultant night song, of the twelve strokes of the final bell. Through them all the haunting trumpet has followed with the interminable question of three unanswerable harmonic notes—the root, the fifth and the upper octave.

It was a superb performance, exquisite in the nicety of minute beauty, plangent and towering in bigness and awe.

[71]

THE BOSTON HERALD.

JANUARY 8, 1910.

SYMPHONY PLAYS WORK BY ELGAR

Composition Essentially Product of English "Middle Class"—Tinsel Pomp and Gilded Commonplaces Characteristics.

ELMAN MAKES SENSATION WITH DVORAK'S CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Mischa Elman was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A flat major.....Elgar
Concerto in A minor for violin...Dvorak
"The Devil's Villanelle".....Loeffler

The English make a great ado about Elgar's symphony. They point to this and to his "Dream of Gerontius" and say exultingly: "We, too, have a great composer, who is already one of the immortals."

This symphony is essentially a product of the English "middle class" and it is no doubt dear to this class as are the pictures of the late Frith and the romances of Marie Corelli. Take the first and chief theme exposed in the Introduction. Was there ever a theme more rankly sentimental? It should be sung by Mme. Clara Butt, with great expression, and to the accompaniment of a piano and a cabinet organ. And this theme is the most salient of all themes in the symphony.

Nor is the development of the themes dramatic and impressive. There are endless and wearying digressions. There are parentheses within parentheses. There are long stretches of dulness that dispose the hearer to folding of the hands and sleep. There are pages that irritate by their impotent fury and bluster. On the other hand there are pleasing passages, moments of elfish charm in the trio of the scherzo, but what are a few moments in an hour?

It has been said by ecstatic Englishmen that the adagio is "sublimely mystical." It is hopelessly middle class; there is no other word for it. Its sentiment is cheap; there is gush in plenty. The pomp of the apotheosis will no doubt excite applause whenever this symphony is played; but this pomp is tawdry; there is tinsel, not gold. Much has been said about the instrumentation. It is true that there are sonorous platitudes, gilded commonplaces. It is possible that Elgar may yet be known as the Tupper of music. The instrumentation of certain pages is euphonious; that of other pages is thick, muddy, drab.

There are few symphonies of equal length and pretensions that are so aggressively irritating, so wholly without distinction. The appeal of this work is like unto that of a frock-coated chapel orator. It recalls the rhetorical flights of Mr. Chadband improving an opportunity. There is the same expansion of a platitude; there is the same fatal and madding fluency.

Mr. Loeffler's Fantasia is music of a far different order and rank. It was suggested by macabre poem of Rollinat, a French parallel to "The Devil's Thoughts," but Rollinat never conceived the happy idea of describing Satan's costume:

And how then was the Devil drest?
O! he was in his Sunday's best:
His jacket was red and his breeches were blue,
And there was a hole where the tail came through, nor is there in the Frenchman's poem anything that in grim humor equals Coleridge's opening:

From his brimstone bed at break of day
A walking the Devil is gone,
To visit his snug little farm, the Earth,
And see how his stock goes on.

This Fantasia has the higher qualities: fancy if not imagination, sure and flawless expression, an exquisite sense of instrumentation, subtle and refined taste that is not too fastidious, a mastery over rhythm and color, unfailing appreciation of the value of contrasts. And this Fantasia would be effective even if the poem of Rollinat were not published in the program book. The publication, it is true, may allow a hearer to grasp the significance of this or that detail, as in the introduction by Mr. Loeffler of Aristide Bruant's cynical ditty, "A la Villette." The hearer will then feel the witty force of the introduction, provided he knows the air and also the words of the song. Nor would the pleasure of the hearer be aesthetically less if he were not able to recognize "Ca ira" and the "Carmagnole" when they occur. The composer, making these points, makes them necessarily for himself and a few friends, unless the Fantasia were to be played to a Parisian audience, and even in this case many sleek hearers might not be acquainted with the terrible song of Bruant.

Any orchestral work that depends for its effect on something extraneous has little prospect of a long life. Beethoven's "Eroica" would be none the greater if he had retained the original title, "Bonaparte," nor does the title "Eroica" add one jot to the intrinsic worth of the music. Mr. Loeffler's Fantasia does not hang on an intimate knowledge of Rollinat's poem. As absolute music, as a fantasia, it is engrossing, fascinating.

Mr. Elman played Dvorak's concerto, which was brought out here by Mr. Listemann with piano accompaniment early in 1893, and first played with an orchestra by Mr. Adamowski at a symphony concert late in 1900. It is not easy to think of the concerto without the orchestra, for the instrumentation is the most striking feature of the work. The themes have a vague profile, and when they assume definite shape they are obvious. In his treatment of them Dvorak was garrulous, and, as a rule, inconsequential. Mr. Elman, however, by his sensuous tone in melodic phrases, by his brilliant performance of florid passages, and by his compelling personality glorified that which was inherently ordinary and redeemed the finale from vulgarity. His performance was remarkable in many ways, and it would have been remarkable for any distinguished virtuoso of twice his years. He was applauded enthusiastically. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra were also heartily applauded for the performance of the orchestral pieces.

There will be no concerts next week. The orchestra will be away on its trip to New York and other cities. The program of Jan. 21, 22, will be as fol-

TRANSCRIPT

JANUARY 8, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS DVORAK'S VIOLIN CONCERTO

Contributions of the Player to the Work Performed—A Year in the Progress of the Virtuoso and the Ripening Qualities It Discloses—Mr. Loeffler's Symphonic Fantasia "The Devil's Villanelle" for an Exercise of Imagination in Orchestral Form—Elgar's Symphony Again and Renewed Impressions of a Work Uncomfortably Diffuse—A Note on the Invariable "Struggle with Fate" as Symphonic Subject Matter

After a silence of many seasons Dvorak's concerto for the violin was again heard at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with Mischa Elman as the soloist. Weighing of the concerto as music is somewhat complicated by a performance which caused the solo player to be recalled until one lost count. As might have been predicted, Elman transfigured the work by the vigor and vitality of his playing. He played the concerto, to be sure, but much more he played upon the concerto making it half his own. The limits of expression imposed by the concerto form upon the virtuoso seem to have no boundaries for this player. In the florid passage work of the first movement he bound phrase to phrase by a continuity of expression which added unity to a section of the work which has otherwise seemed spun out solely for the purpose of subtilizing figures for the solo instrument. As when he played Tchaikowsky's concerto on the same platform a year ago, Elman caught the spirit of the work, or infused one of his own and communicated it to his companions. He was as painstaking with the small things as with the great. He made the flourishes of technique a natural exuberance of expression, and no two came with the same tonal values; his legato playing, which thanks to the discretions of the accompaniment was steadily audible from piano to fortissimo, has gained during the past year in nuance, resonance and his own peculiar vibrancy. In so small a thing as a succession of even notes, each has its separate quality of tone delivered with a bow which deals in such subtleties with nonchalance. The last movement with its careering rhythms was a carnival, for a sense of rhythmic values like Elman's, but the playing which revealed him as most the artist came during the slow movement. However much we may have gloried in the flourishes of the first or the impetuosity of the last, he played the adagio as if he felt its beauty deeply and keenly. He amply conveyed that feeling to his audience. If candor is to prevail, it may as well be said that preparation for Dvorak's concerto was somewhat lukewarm. The presumption seemed to be that if the work had deserved frequent attention it would somehow have been earned between 1886 and 1910. Its performance was another lesson in the power of a personality which might go towards explaining the admiration of our grandfathers for some of the music which has gone tepid for us. Mischa Elman saw a great deal in Dvorak's violin concerto and by virtue of his sincerity made others see.

With Elgar's symphony to open the programme the balance was maintained for a close with Mr. Charles M. Loeffler's sharply characterized music to the poem of Rollinat, "The Devil's Villanelle." It is not the first time this music has been heard in Symphony Hall, but it came yesterday afternoon to reëmphasize a hint of Mr. Loeffler's pleasure in doing what other men have done, only doing it better. His use of the organ against orchestral instruments playing in diabolical timbres at the end is frankly thrilling. The ecclesiasticism which it summons is not so potent of historical or pictorial suggestion as it has been for the similar effect elsewhere—in the "Manfred" Symphony, for example, where the organ tones fairly build up monastery walls—but, for the task the composer has set himself in this instance, to fill to the last nuance the sense and the suggestion of the verses, the final episode through to the mystery of the last measure carries both its haunting mood and the fidelity of its expression.

Elgar's symphony, as it came again to performance a year after its first hearing here, has faded considerably. It sounded yesterday, even with all the fervors of the orchestra and the diligence of Mr. Fiedler's leadership, often labored and sometimes perfunctory. It was as if the work had been written, not because Elgar had to write it, but because he had made up his mind that a symphonic work was due from him. The technical feat of employing the same theme for the scherzo and the adagio never impressed the American audience as it impressed the Britons. Perhaps memory dwelt too freshly on the anecdote of the impromptu organist and his one tune. Perhaps, also, the listener wearies of the everlasting and vague references of the content of a symphony to "man's struggle with his environment" and the rest of it. Music which genuinely has anything to say, whether or not it follows the outlines of a programme in the modern sense, manages to make its message felt even if deprived of the assistance of the printed page, and where this message is lacking in its measures, it is not to be made up by the printed page. The exact authority of Elgar's intent in the symphony in question is somewhat vague. But it bears a strong resemblance to one announced to accompany the first performance of Frederick Stock's new symphony in Chicago last week. Again, the "tolls and triumphs of human life." The obvious reflection is that Mr. Elgar's tolls yesterday afternoon lasted for nearly an hour and a half. For a symphonic work of that length a composer needed to have had tremendous stuff in him which would not condense. The impression one brought away was not that the composer had any such abundance of great matter and that what he had would measurably condense.

For its incidental beauties, and they are by no means few, the work had every advantage that performance could bring it. The whirring transitions of the scherzo, its wild theme which goes crashing among the lighter pieces, the meditations of the adagio were given the utmost care and elaboration by the leader and a faithful enaction by the orchestra. What the symphony stood to gain by interpretation and instrumental color, it gained. It could not but have occurred to many as the strings were giving out the first theme of the opening andante, how far noble playing can go towards dignifying music that is intrinsically common. There was nothing either in the physiognomy of the theme nor its harmonization to give it distinction, and if it had been heard, say, on a cabinet piano in a drawing-room would have hardly left an etching mark on the memory. With the resonance of the strings and the subtlety of the phrasing by which it was played, it was only a challenge that it revealed its commonness. All this is not to say that the symphony does not contain measures, phrases, passages or even sections, if not exactly inspired, at least of great beauty. Towards the end of the Finale, for a notable instance, comes a repetition of the main theme in a different harmonic guise from that of its earlier appearance, and at a slower tempo, which surely communicates a sense of the deepening calm and the pride of achievement which the years bring to a

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 8, 1910

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME MODERN THIS WEEK

ELGAR'S SYMPHONY PLAYED ONCE MORE

Mischa Elman Wins Triumph in Dvorak's Concerto — Loeffler's "Devil's Villanelle."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Elgar—Symphony in A-flat major.
Dvorak—Concerto for Violin, A minor.
Soloist, Mischa Elman.
Loeffler—"The Devil's Villanelle."

A short time ago Mr. Fiedler said to me that he admired the earnestness of the Boston audience. They were not so boisterous in applause as the public in some other cities, but they respected a new work, even when they did not like it, and were ready to study it and hear it again, if it was an important composition.

They proved this yesterday by giving the closest attention to Elgar's symphony for the second time within a year and liberally applauding it. The glorious performance certainly merited this, but about the work itself I am still sitting upon the doubter's bench. It may be a case where "we first endure, then pity, then embrace." If this be so I have reached the second stage, for I certainly pity the great learning and skill that is spent on twisting all the variation-developments out of one inoffensive theme.

Elgar and D'Indy are running a race in this development matter. Beethoven held that development of a theme was not merely to show ingenuity, but to bring out the latent poetry within it. In prolixity of development Elgar and D'Indy certainly distance Beethoven and Brahms, but the latter pair did not attempt to squeeze the last drop out of the musical lemon; they clung to poetry and beauty in all their metamorphoses. I have now heard this symphony three times and its scheme and scope becomes clearer (naturally) with each hearing. But at the end one feels like asking if there is not one modern composer who would try to have the mantle of Tschaikowsky cut down to fit him, or who cares to follow in the calm, broad path of Brahms? The combination of earnest and original melody, with dramatic effect, and unforced development seems to be a lost art; only the gift of tone-coloring remains.

We are content to study such a work as Elgar's symphony for the second or third time, but we do not feel that such study should be pushed far enough to crowd out Liszt, or Franck, or Huber, or Hausegger.

The Elgar symphony seems studious but not inspired. It revels in variation-developments that are the will-'o-the-wisps that lead into the bog of prolixity. The second movement had a fierce march that was but an echo of the barbaric splendor that Tschaikowsky brought forth in his fifth and sixth symphonies. There were some beautiful moments in the slow movement. The Finale gave sequences without end and a powerful chorale as climax. But our impression of a year ago still holds good. Let Elgar's next symphony be twice as short and it will probably be greater.

But of the performance one cannot say too much in praise. Sir Edward Elgar should come to Boston if he wishes to know what his music really sounds like at its very best. Every figure, every phrase, was made clear and intelligible to the connoisseur. Mr. Fiedler may safely rest his reputation on such a performance as this. It gives him rank with the greatest conductors. And the orchestra, too, has here shown itself almost unapproachable in [illegible] and in ensemble under the most [illegible] circumstances.

the long, long musical banquet here offered at all digestible.

Mischa Elman was welcomed with enthusiasm, which grew yet more intense as his playing went on. The heavy orchestration of the Elgar symphony rather militated against the effect of the regular classical scoring which was used in Dvorak's violin concerto.

But the work itself is not to be ranked with the great violin concertos of the world. Its first movement seemed inconsequential. The violin and the orchestra babbled together in a somewhat tepid conversation that was not pregnant with ideas. The slow movement was joined to the first—rather an unusual conjunction—and this had at least some of that Slavonic sadness that is never unimpressive. The Rondo that ended the work was dashing but not intrinsically powerful. Altogether we found this a very different Dvorak from the composer of the "New World" symphony.

But young Elman's playing carried the commonplace concerto to success. His bowing is very remarkable in one so young. He is an incipient Ysaye in this respect. The G string work in the slow movement was very noble. The skips and double stopping of the finale were excitingly brilliant. The intonation was without flaw. It was not unnatural, therefore, that great applause should ensue. The artist was recalled seven times, and several auditors seemed loth to cease their clapping even then.

The programme now went to the devil, by presenting Loeffler's remarkable score in which that cloven-footed party goes up and down the world seeking whom he may devour. Satan is here a party who is much addicted to piccolo-pepper, to muted brasses and to French revolutionary tunes. The fact, frequently stated upon the programme, that "Hell's aburning," led to a conflagration in the orchestra that was considerably more than a three-alarm fire.

It is a splendid score, full of modern effects, climaxing with organ and bells in a very broad and massive fashion. I hold Mr. Loeffler to be the peer of any of the modern Frenchmen in this matter of managing the colors of the grand orchestra. Only Richard Strauss is his superior in this scintillating domain, and his scoring was definitely better than that of Elgar's symphony, which was sometimes coarse and could not always be saved from muddiness even by the great skill and tact of Mr. Fiedler.

The concert, therefore, gave several phases of modern music, from the lukewarm work of Dvorak to the boiling-point of Loeffler. At the next concert we shall have the prince of moderns (Richard Strauss), and Mr. Zarathustra will make a few remarks.

[72]

HERALD,

JANUARY 22, 1910.

SYMPHONY PLAYS BERLIOZ OVERTURE

"Rob Roy," Written 80 Years Ago, Performed for First Time in Boston at the 13th Public Rehearsal.

BRAHMS' DOUBLE CONCERTO BY HESS AND SCHROEDER

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Messrs. Hess and Schroeder were the solo violinist and 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Rob Roy".....Berlioz
Concerto for violin and 'cello..Brahms
"Thus Spake Zarathustra"....Strauss

The overture to "Rob Roy" is nearly 80 years old, and it was not played here until yesterday. But for many years the "Rob Roy" overture was supposed to be non-existent. Berlioz declared that he destroyed the work the day of its first performance in Paris, and few knew that there was a copy of the score in the library of the Paris Conservatory. The score was not published until 1900, and Chicago, more curious than Boston, heard the overture in November of that year.

Berlioz told the world that he destroyed his score because it was diffuse and long, and the audience did not like it; but the memoirs of Berlioz, entertaining as they are, are not always statements of fact. The composer was a superb romanticist even in his recollections. Is it not probable that he destroyed "Rob Roy" because he used some of the material for his "Harold in Italy" symphony? The chief solo in the former for the English horn became the chief theme for the viola in the latter, and in the overture there was an anticipation of the motive that in the symphony reminds one of Offenbach's "Voici le Sabre" in "La Grande Duchesse."

It is easy in 1910 to smile at this "Rob Roy" overture, yet in several respects it was an uncommon work in the early thirties. First of all, it shows the instinct of Berlioz for orchestration, his fine ear for contrasting timbres, his clearness, his sense of proportion. It is true that he here uses frequently the least advantageous tones of the English horn, but he evidently wished their effect.

Did he intend to give a tonal summary of Scott's novel, or merely to write an overture of Scottish character, as revealed by the "Wizard of the North"? There is the introduction of "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled"; there is the suggestion of a reel or Highland fling; there is music of a chivalric nature, and the English horn solo with harp accompaniment may be reasonably taken to express courtship. The theme that some one has named the "Rob Roy" motive has little character, and Berlioz inventing it may not have had Rob Roy in his mind.

It is idle to speculate on the precise nature of the program. If Berlioz had a program, he did not reveal it. And if the theory of Boschot is sound—that Berlioz wrote the overture, hearing that a play, "MacGregor," was to be produced at a theatre in Paris—this overture has little in common with the scenario of the play. For several reasons the theory of Boschot is untenable.

An intelligent foreigner, attending the concert in his study of American life, manners and morals, and seeing and hearing Messrs. Hess and Schroeder playing the double concerto by Brahms, might have entered in his notebook last night: "This afternoon I saw two excellent musicians, accomplished virtuosos, unjustifiably condemned to hard labor in the sight of a large audience. The fortitude of these musicians, their resolute behavior, their courage and patience in the accomplishment of a stubborn and disagreeable task, excited my admiration, and we all applauded vigorously to support them in their hour of trial and to reward them when they were released from bondage."

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave a brilliant and impressive performance of Richard Strauss' colossal tone poem, a performance that should have awakened enthusiasm and not merely feeble hand-clapping. Marcel Schwob in his bitter "Treatise on Journalism" put among the "100 Best Books" of the journalist a condensed "Nietzsche for society people." Strauss, or Mr. Fiedler, might arrange a pleasing potpourri, "Gems from 'Thus Spake Zarathustra'" for afternoon performances. This potpourri should include the overpowering introduction, the dance song (in simpler form), the trumpet leap that at times in its elaboration reminds one of the once popular tune, "Where did you get that hat?" the episode with the bell and the mystical conclusion.

It is too late to inquire whether Strauss should have tried "to convey by means of music an idea of the development of the human race from its origin, through the various phases of its development, religious and scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the Superman." No one, not even Strauss, could do all this, and did Strauss make the statement with a straight face? If he had given the title "Homage to Nietzsche" he would then have allowed hearers to "find things" in the music, each hearer according to his light.

Nine out of ten will listen to this symphonic poem as though it were absolute music, music without a program. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" contains some wonderful pages, but as a whole, as a work of purely musical art, it falls below "Don Juan." "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration." But Strauss' partisans might answer that with "Zarathustra" the composer invented a new art.

The program of the concert next week will be as follows:

Beethoven, Fugue for strings, op. 133; Franck, Symphony in D minor; Sibelius, "Night Ride and Sunrise" (first time); Wagner, Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 5,

15TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra will return from a most successful trip of a week through the Middle West on next Tuesday morning. But two works appear on Mr. Fiedler's fifteenth program next week. The first is Bruckner's Symphony, No. 7, in E major, the symphony of this composer which has had the greatest number of performances in Boston. It was last played here by Dr. Muck. The other number will be George W. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta" in D major, which has never been play at a Symphony concert. There will be no soloist.

RECORD,

JANUARY 28, 1910

FIEDLER HAS MADE NO PLANS

Two days more, and the question of the leader of the Symphony Orchestra will be nearer settlement.

No definite arrangement has yet been made by Mr. Fiedler for next season.

MAX FIEDLER.

Whether or not he will remain in Boston will be decided by the end of this week.

"You already know that I am still under contract with the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg," said Mr. Fiedler.

"Two years ago I secured a year's leave of absence and came to Boston. I liked things so well that, at the close of my first season here, I asked for another year's leave and it was granted. I cannot now say that I can have another year's leave. [illegible] has yet been decided de-

HERALD, JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 29,

JANUARY 29, 1910.

14TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Familiar Compositions Enjoyed by Audience—No Soloist—Mr. Fiedler Conducts—Wagnerian Excerpts.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried"...Wagner
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

Although these works were all familiar; although there was no soloist; although the program was too long, the concert gave great pleasure to many who rejoiced even in the overture to "Genoveva," an opera which was never so popular as Offenbach's "Genevieve de Brabant," but is much more respectable and dull.

The passion and tumult of two of the excerpts from Wagner's opera and the delightful suggestion of forest life from a third no doubt stirred the great majority of the hearers, yet the feature of the concert was the performance of Cesar Franck's symphony. When this noble work was first played here it perplexed and irritated many. Some went so far as to breathe out threatenings and slaughter against the conductor and the management. Some really believed in their heart of heart that the good old "Papa" Franck was Antichrist in music, and, not knowing his blameless life, they pictured him as an absinthe drinker with shrieking trousers and a Boulevard "Mich" hat. But the invigorating waters of ultra-modernism have rolled over the audience during the last half-dozen years and some that at first could not "understand" Cesar Franck's symphony now find it sane, a classic, and a little old-fashioned. Thus does the pendulum swing to an extreme.

This symphony is in cyclical form. A generative motive gives cohesion and symmetry to the movements. It has been said in opposition to this form that one main theme, however ingenious its metamorphoses may be, argues a paucity of invention; that each movement should have distinct and salient themes. I cannot see the force of this reasoning in this instance, for there is as much genius shown in the reshaping of the generative theme as there would be in the invention of other unrelated motives.

This symphony is indeed a beautiful, a sublime work, one to be ranked with d'Indy's symphony in B flat; that is to say, among the greatest symphonies written since Beethoven's death, and there are none greater Reading of Tristan Music.

In Mr Fiedler's reading of the Tristan music there was dignity, fervor and well-ordered intensity, if less of the elasticity of tempo and glow of passion which Mr Toscanini brought to it. The sensitiveness and rare beauty of the strings of the orchestra was particularly apparent in this number, and the soft murmurings of Wagner's "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," which followed it. To make a Wagnerian group of three, the overture to "Flying Dutchman," splendidly tempestuous and virile, closed the program.

It had been begun by Schumann's overture to his only opera, "Genoveva." In his intent this prelude would suggest the sad story of the plot, which relates of an absent knight and husband, an intriguing friend, a wife dishonored and disowned, the misery of herself and her child and her final restoration.

The work has beauty in its tender sadness and unrest, but the gentle and undramatic Schumann tells the heart-stripping story in more pacific and less convincing fashion than a modern tragedian, like Reger, who personifies dissonance, might do.

The orchestra will make a special western trip next week. There will be no concerts until Feb 11 and 12.

SOCIETY

Barbara Higginson, the fiancee of Barrett Wendell, Jr., and the latest in society to announce her engagement, was at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday and received many congratulations. She was with her sister, Juliet Higginson, who looked unusually well in a dark red tailored gown. There was quite a crush and many strange faces.

Among those conspicuous in the throng were Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis (Margaret Waterman), wearing some stunning ermine furs; Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, her sister, Miss MacNichol, becomingly gowned in dark green; Mrs. Augusta J. King in black broadcloth and ermine furs, Mrs. John M. Longyear, Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. W. H. Bowker, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, in dark gray broadcloth and gray hat with purple plumes; Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Horace Jealous, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Miss Amy Lowell, Katherine Foote, Mr. Frederick S. Converse and daughter, Rev. A. A. Berle, ex-Governor and Mrs. Long, Rabbi Fleischer, Mrs. Robert Stow Bradley and daughter Leslie, Rosamond Fay, Mrs. Edward Winslow, Mrs. William Lindsey, very richly gowned and wearing sables with lace frill; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Edwin A. Shuman, Mary Fay, Mrs. Francis Stanley, Miss Wolcott, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Miss Emma Wethern and others.

BOSTON GLOBE-

JANUARY 29

FRANCK LINKED WITH WAGNER

Symphony Rehearsal in a Rare Program.

German Composer Appears in Three Contributions.

Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" Presented.

Mr Fiedler made two supreme quotations from epoch-marking composers at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon which when so linked together upon an orchestral program must give it distinction. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor preceded the intermission. The prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" followed it.

In the symphony Franck has crystallized the idealization of the spiritual in man. It vibrates with the power in his own life, which not only redeemed from defeat a perpetual struggle against the pettiness, the strut, the fever and the malice of Pharisaism, but preserved a serenity and calmness of soul which betrayed no outward sign of that struggle.

In his monumental "Tristan und Isolde" Wagner has glorified a supremely human love. Here, divided by the brief span of the program's recess, was the apotheosis of asceticism and of passion—not of that asceticism which is the abnormal, morbid aloofness of monastic seclusion from the world's activity, but the concentration of a pure and unselfish labor in it and for it.

Such was Cesar Franck's life through the 50 years in which he lived quietly but deeply, taught earnestly; wrote little of great moment but thought much. Then he wrote a string quartet, a quintet and this symphony—with a few other works, and they are masterpieces.

With Promethean Fire.

There are pages of this symphony suffused and illuminated as by the fire which Prometheus stole from heaven. In them there is strength, majesty, the proclamation of victory and triumph, but there is serenity, profound grandeur, untroubled by the show of turmoil or conflict. There is no measure inflated by bombast, pomp or blatant circumstance.

There are moments in the development of the first theme of the first movement which are overpowering with the exaltation and infinitude of prophetic utterance. The return in the last movement of the principal figure of three notes, remolded into new tints of color and shades of thought, embellished and interwoven with a coterie of lesser figures, and carried to a triumphant conclusion, is as the unfolding of the experience of a whole people in the life of one man.

Mr Fiedler's reading of this work and the orchestral performance of it inspire the hope that it may not again lie in such long seclusion.

[73]

POST, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 5, 1910

MAX FIEDLER TO REMAIN

Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Re-engaged

Max Fiedler, who since the autumn of 1908 has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and who, it was reported, would retire at the end of this season, has been re-engaged for the seasons of 1910-11 and 1911-12.

This will prove of great interest to Boston music lovers, who during his stay here have been greatly taken with Mr. Fiedler's work.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. He commenced to play the piano at an early age and later studied under Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at the Liepsic Conservatory, where he took the Holstein scholarship. He was a classmate of Dr. George W. Chadwick and Dr. Carl Muck. In 1882 he became a member of the widely known Hamburg Conservatory, and since 1905 has been the director of that institute.

His compositions include a symphony in D, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs and piano pieces.

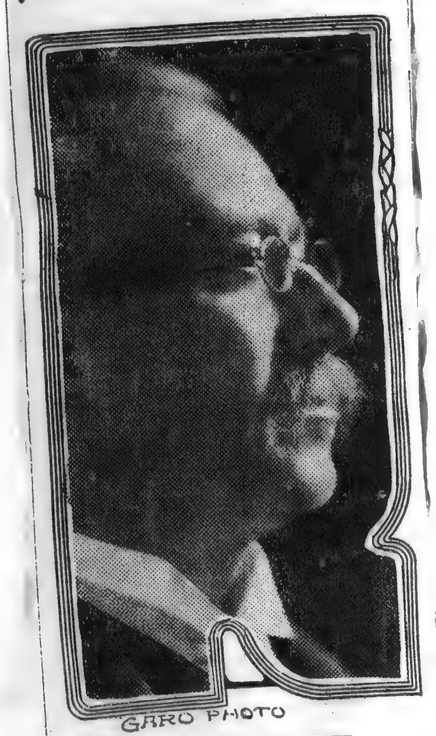
In 1894 he succeeded Richard Barthos, conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra concerts, and he became one of the principal conductors at the opera in that city.

Throughout Europe Mr. Fiedler is known as one of the greatest interpreters of orchestral music.

He has established a reputatfon as being a musician solidly grounded in the classics, but a very ardent exponent of the best music that is being produced today.

BOSTON JOURNAL
FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

MAX FIEDLER, WHO WILL CONDUCT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY



GARO PHOTO

MAX FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Max Fiedler will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the seasons of 1910-1911 and 1911-1912. The announcement of Mr. Fiedler's re-engagement as conductor here disposed of the report that he was to conduct the Manchester, England, Symphony Orchestra next season.

Mr. Fiedler came to the Boston Symphony in October, 1908, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck, who was the conductor for two seasons preceding. He was called to this city from the Hamburg Conservatory, to which institution he nominally belongs, and where he has influenced musical destinies to a remarkable degree.

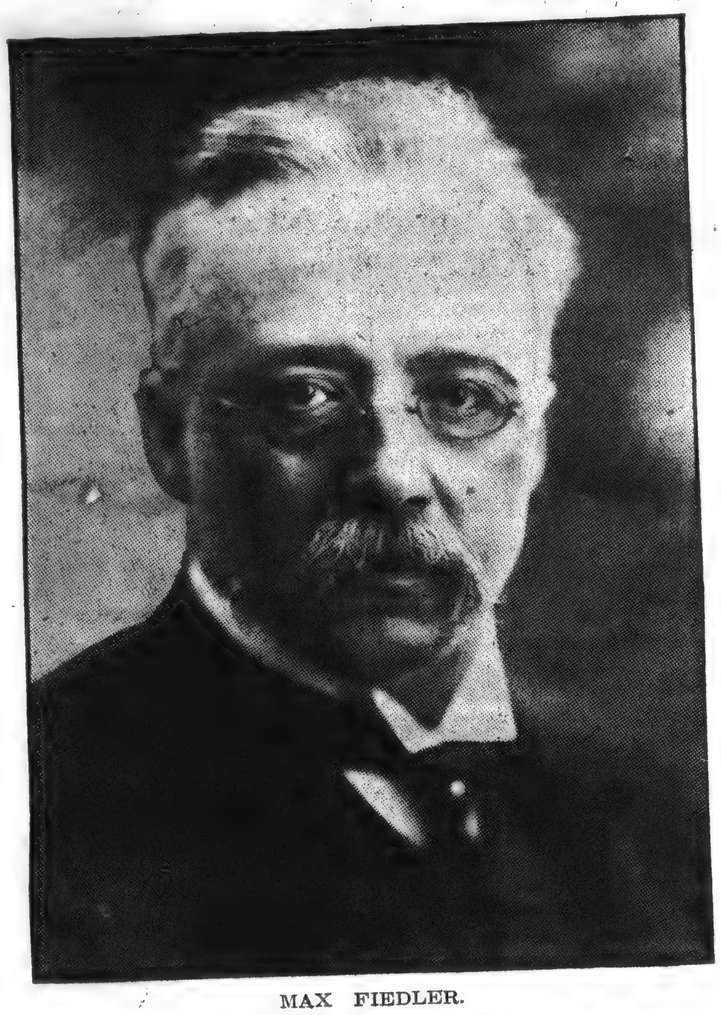
Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing work in Boston has been the presentation of the great modern works, such as Bruckner's symphony in C minor, and the Strauss tone poems. He has turned the attention of his public to the value of present-day music and has changed the attitude of Symphony audiences from one of distrust for the composers of our own time to one of respect and even of preference.

The announcement of Mr. Fiedler's re-engagement will be a source of pleasure to Boston music-lovers. In Boston, as in the other great cities of the continent where he has appeared as a conductor, Mr. Fiedler has built up a large personal following.

GLOBE, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

DR FIEDLER REENGAGED.

To Conduct Symphony Orchestra for Seasons of 1910-1911 and 1911-1912.



MAX FIEDLER.

For the past month several New York musical journals have been arranging, to their own satisfaction evidently, the affairs of the Boston symphony orchestra and have assigned a half dozen famous conductors to direct the organization after this season closes. But as there was no unanimity in choice, of course the matter was not definitely settled.

Such men as Mahler, Muck, Campanini and even Nikisch were in the roster of names specified to succeed Dr Fiedler, and despite the fact that the management of the orchestra did not affirm in any way that a change was contemplated Dame Rumor kept the report in quite active circulation.

Dr Max Fiedler came to Boston as leader of the orchestra in September, 1908. He soon displayed abilities which proved him a worthy successor to the baton of Gericke, Nikisch and Dr Muck, and although his ideas differed in many ways from those of his predecessors, his masterly command of men and thorough knowledge of his work quickly won for him the appreciation and regard of players and his audiences.

Catholic and progressive in his tastes, he favors alike music of the old or new schools, and worthy American composers receive prompt recognition in his makeup of programs. "Take him for all in all," he is a representative of the best thought in the musical field, and his sojourn here has resulted in keeping the standard of the orchestra on that plane which has made it one of the few great orchestras of the world.

Gossip has had its run for a while without an authentic basis. But now Bostonians and many others will be gratified to learn that Mr C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, announced yesterday that Dr Fiedler will not retire at the close of the season, but has been reengaged for the seasons of 1910-1911 and 1911-12.

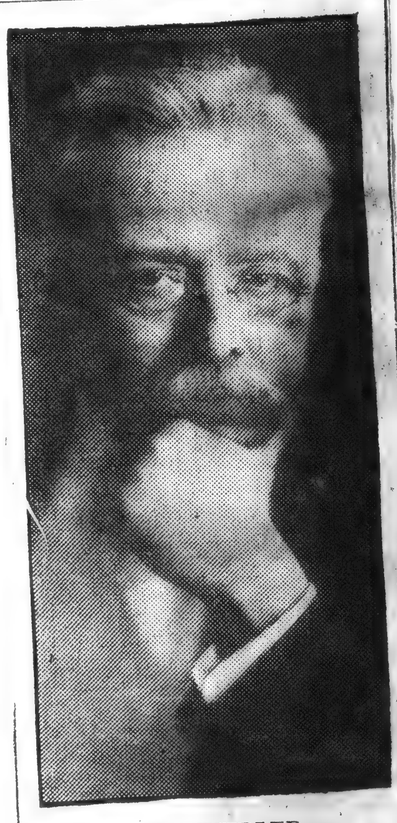
HERALD,
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED.

Will Conduct Symphony Orchestra for Two More Seasons.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced last night that Max Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra for the last two seasons, had been re-engaged for the coming seasons, 1910-11 and 1911-12. This settles definitely the reports, printed in the New York papers, that Mr. Fiedler intended going abroad for the next season, possibly to Manchester, Eng., or to Hamburg, where the conductor has been under contract with the Philharmonic Society for several years.

Mr. Fiedler's re-engagement here probably means a severance of his connections in Hamburg. Ten days ago, when the matter was still unsettled, Mr. Fiedler said his leaving or staying in Boston depended on whether or not he could get further leave of absence from Hamburg. He said that, in case he stayed here, he would probably sever his connections with the Philharmonic and remain on this side of the Atlantic a number of years. The conductor's family, now in Hamburg, will probably come to Boston.



MAX FIEDLER.

HERALD, BOSTON, FEBRUARY 6, 1910

TRANSCRIPT,
BOSTON EVENING

MR. FIEDLER CONTINUES

His Re-engagement as Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Two More Seasons—Fruits of His Faithful and Unremitting Service of the Past Two Years—His Obstacles, His Conquests, and Significance of the Present Choice

The disputes which have waged as to the probable succession of conductors for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the information which New York has, from time to time, undertaken to supply, have been set aside by the announcement, during the last few hours, of Mr. Max Fiedler's reëngagement for the seasons of 1910-11 and 1911-12. The decison comes not altogether as a surprise, and certainly as a gratification to a large and an increasing public, which has during two winters, learned to appreciate the earnestness of Mr. Fiedler's work, and the solid qualities of his interpretive art. Dr. Muck's name had been bruited abroad as a probable successor; Mr. Gustav Mahler, too, came in for his share of the conjecture, nor were the names of such men as Weingartner, Strauss and Schuch unmentioned. What with the New York press and the assiduity of foreign correspondents, half a dozen capitals have been concerned, soon or late, in furnishing the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a leader.

Mr. Fiedler came to his present post under conditions which may be thought of as trying. He succeeded a conductor of magnetic personality and a highly individual manner, both of leadership and musical taste. It is not by personal magnetism that Mr. Fielder seeks his musical ends. It is rather by thought, study, the careful weighing of this or that method, the patient elaboration of detail, and finally by the sweeping impetuosity which would weld all these elements into a single and unified impression of the effect he would produce.

As the audiences of the Symphony Concrets have watched him, for two seasons; as they have listened to the band as he summoned its thunders or its muted undertones, they have learned to appreciate and to admire a certain sturdy quality not only of the musician but of the man. Mr. Fiedler is never otherwise than obviously doing his best; whether the work happens to conform to his particular tastes or the contrary, it has justice at his hands; he furnishes, as the winter weeks go by, the figure of a finely-endowed leader, sparing no resource to give his audiences of the best of himself and his orchestra. It is known, of course, what a strong personal loyalty he has inspired among his men, and this is far from surprising. During the early months of his incumbency there were grumbles at his manner of fashioning programmes. These were merely chronic manifestations. They ceased and not to reappear. For a year past Mr. Fiedler's programmes have been a review of what a musical public wish to hear re-currently; he has brought telling contrasts of old and new; or significant juxtapositions of similar styles; he has scanned the horizon for new works of interest or importance; he has renewed, reviewed, innovated and educated.

These are a few of the services for which, during the past two seasons, we are debtors to Mr. Fiedler. The catalogue is by no means complete. To require more of a servant of a city's musical public would be demanding payments which have already been made in full. Mr. Fiedler remains the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the proudest right in any man's possession. He has fairly won it.

MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR.

Many in Boston and in other cities welcome the re-engagement of Mr. Fiedler. First of all, he makes programs that please the public, and this is half the battle. While he does not ignore contemporaneous composers, while he is not frightened by the audacity of the ultra-moderns, he does not forget the composers of the past, and in arranging his programs he considers contrast and climax. Furthermore, he gives music in generous measure, and this endears him to audiences in western cities visited by the orchestra; nor does Mr. Fiedler refuse any reasonable request made to him by western audiences for the performance of some favorite symphony or overture. Mr. Fiedler's personality and behavior on the stage are pleasing. He is neither pontifical nor flippant. It is evident to even the careless that he is aware of the responsibility of his position, and that he does not take himself too seriously. His sincerity, his modesty, his devotion to his task are recognized by all. It may also be said that under his rule the orchestra has maintained its reputation in the critical cities that look forward eagerly to its concerts; and under his rule the concerts have been highly remunerative to the management.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 10, 1910.

* * *

SYMPHONY CONDUCTORSHIP.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states today in regard to the various reports which are being printed about the conductorship of the orchestra, that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 6, 1910

FIEDLER'S WORK

The re-engagement of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for two more seasons, has been greeted with enthusiasm on all sides. Mr. Fiedler arrived here in the fall of 1908, unheralded by trumpetings of a "star" conductor, preceded only by reports of his efficient labors as a conductor in Hamburg and other European cities, and a single successful appearance as a guest conductor at one of the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in the season of 1905-6. His engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony for one season, was, like all such engagements, partly in the nature of an experiment.

This experiment has proved emphatically successful. Few conductors who have worked here have adapted themselves so quickly to the routine of their labors and the life of the city. Mr. Fiedler leads a simple and industrious existence, occupying himself with his scores, to the exclusion of most other things. He stands unusually high in the esteem of his men, for from the first he has been very attentive to their interests, and his regime has been utterly free of any hint of favoritism.

It is a pity that his habit of directing the rehearsals in English is not possible with more of the great visiting conductors, for it tends to promote the national motive in national musical endeavor.

With the exception of George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, who, perhaps, had not all the facilities that he might have desired to carry out his ideas of programme making, Mr. Fiedler has shown himself unequalled by any of his predecessors in the arrangement of music for performance, and more than any other conductor he has made modern music of absorbing interest to his audiences.

He excels particularly in the music of Strauss, and at last Strauss has had a representative showing on the Symphony programmes. He has been reading the music of the modern Frenchmen with eager and receptive curiosity, and his investigations have had extremely interesting and profitable results for his hearers, when such a work as D'Indy's B-flat symphony has been an item of the occasion.

In common with Dr. Muck's policy there has been an increasing number of concerts, of undiminished interest, without a soloist, and the Pension Fund concerts have offered programmes which could hardly be excelled for the attraction of their subjects, and the manner of their performance. And now, Mr. Fiedler, how long are we to wait for "Don Quixote" and the "Domestic Symphony?"

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 10, 1910

News of the Day

The newspapers in the smaller cities that the Symphony Orchestra visits for occasional concerts seem highly pleased at the re-engagement of Mr. Fiedler as its conductor for two years to come. There were fewer such concerts in Mr. Gericke's time than there are now; but he usually counted them as so many burdens, made his programmes as short as might be, and filled them with pieces that required little preparation, without much regard to the likings of his prospective audiences. Dr. Muck was as conscientious with these concerts in secondary cities as he was with all his work; but he had little understanding of the varying publics that sought them and he clung as stiffly to his theories and methods of programme-making as he did in Symphony Hall. Perhaps out of his experience as an occasional conductor in the smaller cities of Germany, Mr. Fiedler has better pleased his audiences at these "out-of-town" concerts than have any of his predecessors. Oftenest he has made his programmes two hours long, given them a characteristic diversity and usually included a piece or two that might be hackneyed in Boston or in New York, but that is still welcome in Providence or Springfield. Besides, there is no mistaking the means or the results of Mr. Fiedler's conducting. Dr. Muck used to puzzle his "out-of-town" audiences. Mr. Fiedler never does.

MONITOR,
FEBRUARY 12,

NOTES.

Bruckner's symphony No. 7 in E major and Chadwick's sinfonietta in D major make the program of the Symphony concert tonight. At the rehearsal of Friday afternoon, Feb. 18, and the concert of Saturday evening, Feb. 19, Ernest Hutcheson and Harold Randolph will appear as soloists in Mozart's concerto in E flat for two pianos and orchestra, a work which has not been performed at a Symphony concert since the early years of the orchestra. At the same pair of concerts, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was conducted by the composer in Boston last December, will be repeated under Mr. Fiedler's direction. The program contains two other numbers: the D major symphony of Haydn and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz.

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 12, 1910.

SYMPHONY GIVES PUBLIC REHEARSAL

Fifteenth of the Series Included Work of Bruckner and a Sinfonietta by George W. Chadwick.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Bruckner's symphony in E major, No. 7, and Chadwick's Sinfonietta in D major, which was played for the first time at these concerts.

There are conductors, as Messrs. Fiedler, Muck, Nikisch, Loewe, who find great pleasure in conducting certain symphonies of Bruckner. Many in the audience, unless the hearers be members of a cult, carefully chosen and sworn to be enthusiastic, cannot understand why these conductors delight in performances of the symphonies. To them a symphony of Bruckner is not unlike the great image, seen by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream: The image whose form was terrible. "This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and arms of silver, his belly and thighs of brass; his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay." And to some, not even the head is of gold.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave an eloquent interpretation of this symphony in E major, and the interpretation was as lucid as it was romantic and impressive. Surely any person sensitive to music that heard the performance must have been moved to say: "Bruckner, after all, was a genius." The composer was a genius, but it would be better for his fame today and hereafter if he had also been a man of talent.

Perhaps it was an inherent failing; perhaps it was due to a lack of thorough and long continued training that Bruckner's musical thought was seldom logically developed; that he lacked concentration; that he indulged himself in long winded digressions; that his seriousness was not tempered by the humor that leads to self-examination and rigid self-criticism. He had a rough humor, and at times a biting wit, they say; for he was not always a child as he is sometimes represented, although he liked to pose as a simple child of nature. There was a dash of peasant shrewdness in his composition, but he was not an unerring judge of his own works.

And so it must be said of this symphony, as of other symphonies by Bruckner, that it contains great things: noble and beautiful themes; pages of idyllic charm and demoniacal energy; sublime passages and overwhelming effects. It must also be said that there are pages which are trivial or dull, repetitions that weary, digressions that exasperate, halts and delays that put a favorably disposed hearer in bad humor.

It would be hard to find any theme more nobly beautiful in thought, form and orchestral expression than the first one of the opening allegro. The cantilena in the Adagio might have been proudly signed by Beethoven at the height of his power, and this Adagio as a whole is one of the most superb symphonic movements in the literature of music. The Scherzo has marked Brucknerian character, but this movement and the Finale are not equal to the two that precede.

Here and there the influence of Wagner is shown. This is not surprising when we remember Bruckner's worship of that master and recall the fact that he once or twice deliberately in his symphonies quoted phrases from Wagner's works, perhaps unconsciously, perhaps as an act of homage. In this 7th there are passages that recall measures of "Parsifal," others that suggest measures in "The Ring," rather by harmonic and orchestral mood than by the melodic line. That which is great in the symphony is Bruckner's own. It far outweighs the chatter and the maunderings. It is enough to insure the composer an honorable place among the composers of lofty ideas and memorable deeds.

Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta was first heard here at his own concert in 1904. (By a typographical error the tonality of the work is given on page 1165 of the program-book as "F major." It should be "D major," as stated on the next page of the book and on the title page.)

This music is agreeable, cheerful in disposition, frank, unpretentious, yet showing by its workmanship the ability of the composer. There is nothing that enters at hap-hazard; there is nothing that hints at experimentation; the composer knew what he was about to say and he said it as he intended it should be said. The Sinfonietta would undoubtedly be more effective as a whole in a smaller hall. As it was played yesterday, the first movement, with its attractive themes, one of which has a charming oriental character, with its interesting and firmly knit development and its dominatingly joyous spirit, had the most distinction of the four.

The program of the concerts next week has been slightly changed from the one announced in the program book. Haydn's Symphony in G Major, the "Oxford," will be played instead of one in D. The other pieces will be Mozart's Concerto for two pianos and orchestra; Rachmaninoff's Symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead" (by request); Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The pianists will be Messrs. Hutchinson and Randolph of Baltimore.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 18, 1910

News of the Day

On its monthly journey next week to the southward, the Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn and Hartford. By way of innovation on these journeys and at urgent local request it will undertake a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Baltimore, with the coöperation of the Oratorio Society there. The conspicuous pieces on Mr. Fiedler's programmes for the week are Rachmaninoff's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," to be played in Washington, Philadelphia and New York, and Strauss's "Zarathustra," to be performed in New York and Brooklyn. For some singular reason, too, New York and Philadelphia will hear Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello, the dullest piece by much agreeing testimony that has stood on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts for many a day. Mr. Hess and Mr. Schroeder will, therefore, be the "soloists" for the journey; but Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the English alto, who has lately returned to America, will sing with the orchestra in Hartford.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
ss _____ 1 - 0 - 1910

Mrs. Taft Hears Boston Symphony.

Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony concert. She had with her, her sister, Mrs. Laughlin, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. William A. Hammond, and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock.

Mrs. Leiter entertained a party including Mrs. O. H. Ernest, Mrs. Grinnell, the Rev. Roland Cotton Smith, Miss Margaret Cotton Smith, and Miss Kellogg, of Utica, N. Y.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons had in their box Mr. and Mrs. Francis M. Jenks, of Baltimore; Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, and James Marion Johnston.

Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs James McMillan, and Mrs. I. T. Mann were also hostesses at box parties.

Many Notables

...Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

POST

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Third Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 11, at 4:30. Mischa Elman will be the soloist and will then make his first appearance of the season. RRA

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 12, 1910.

CHARMED BY SINFONIETTA

Symphony Orchestra in a Premier.

Sane, Bright and Sound Work of the Composer Presented.

Bruckner's 7th Symphony Is Also Repeated.

After sitting through an hour of Bruckner's seventh symphony in E major yesterday afternoon Mr Chadwick's Sinfonietta in D major, heard for the first time at these concerts, was all the more welcome. This does not imply that Mr Chadwick's work would not have been heard gladly at any time, nor does it follow that a "symphony" must always be better music than a "sinfonietta" (a little symphony).

As is his custom, Mr Chadwick has written music which is vital. The four movements are all short. They set a brisk and eager pace and keep it up. They would not necessarily unfold the psychology of a man's life nor crack the deep riddles of the world, but they are a gracious balm to those who would.

It is music of bright color, sound substance and of a genial sanity withal. It is pithy. It has something to say, and says it spontaneously and with dispatch.

Playable Initial Theme.

As always, Mr Chadwick gives character and identity to his music by the clearness and vigor of his rhythme. The first theme of the first movement is a case in point. Every violin in the band must have felt its power. It is playable and has melodic charm.

The oriental theme, with a very characteristic dress in strings and harp, and the cantabile theme for violins, which then follow, retain their individuality and return in the recapitulation in a different key and in new guise without being hounded to death on the way, as were innocent, well-meaning fragments of melody in the Bruckner work. The second movement adroitly added the military color to a pert and piquant tune which begins in the strings and made it a march resounding with brass and enlivened with tambourine.

The scherzino is the gem of the work. It is a veritable spider-web of finely spun filaments of rhythmic tone, glistening in the sun. Its figures in the 9-8 time were woven with a deft dexterity and were played with admirable lightness and vivacity.

The precision and brilliance of the bowing at Mr Fiedler's lively pace were admirable. The finale retains the animation of the work and runs nimbly to the close.

Refreshing After Bruckner.

The sinfonietta came as an exhilarating breeze on a summer's day bringing hope and refreshment. Both were needed. If Bruckner's symphony could be limited to the first movement, allegro, and the second movement, adagio, much valuable time and much wearying noise might be saved.

The scherzo is so liberally weighted down with bombastic twaddle that what there is of beauty hides its face. Where is more senseless fustian than the trumpet theme, revived and re-echoed to the apotheosis of boredom?

A man who had few friends and cared for few, who traveled little, who built his world of solitude and introspection might indeed have written such music. It knows neither the gladness of children nor of nature. It has long forgotten, if it ever knew, that play is the eternal secret of life. It smells of the must of Faust's study and by so much is it pitiable rather than bad. The last movement is sterile and tedious and often condemns the brass to hard manual labor in coping with fortissimos that blare forth neither dignity, euphony nor any illuminating idea.

How the first two movements could have been written by the same man remains a mystery. At times in the unfolding of a thought through modulation the opening allegro reminds of Wagner, whose ardent disciple and champion Bruckner was.

Some Shreds of Melody.

The themes here have agreeable individuality and often beauty. Their development shows the fondness of the composer for inversion, and his skill in thus turning a melody upside down. The first and the second chief themes are reiterated again and again after this fashion in varying orchestral color.

The adagio is heralded by Buckner's partisans as his most superb utterance. It contains a second theme of unquestioned loveliness and apparent inspiration. The first theme, intrusted to four tubas—according to the score, two in B flat and two in F—has a serious and exalted beauty.

Why the composer chose a brass instrument with upright bell, whose tone contains unavoidable blare and is incompatible with the strings of an orchestra, is hard to say. The more romantic and no less dignified tone-color of the french horn would have been a beautiful medium.

Dissonances in the symphony have before been complained of, and with reason. They do not sting the senses into a sudden glow. They tire the mind by aimless wrangling. Dissonance is not mere confusion.

[75]

ADVERTISER,
FEBRUARY 12, 1910

TWO CONTRIBUTIONS TO SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

BRUCKNER AND CHADWICK ALONE THIS WEEK

Symphony in E Major by the Former and the Latter's Sinfonietta in D Major.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner. Symphony in E major. No. 7.
Chadwick. Sinfonietta in D major.

Let no one imagine that the concert was short because of the brevity of the above list. A modern symphony is something to reckon with. Elgar, Paderewski, Reger, Strauss, all the ultra-moderns require a good deal of room to turn round in. But this is no great defect when the composer is of long breath, as Bruckner is. The public may not give much applause to this work, for it is musician's music, but it is a great composition nevertheless. What Edgar achieves only with great effort and artificiality, Bruckner attains seemingly without effort. The Boston public may study such a symphony secure in the thought that their time is not being wasted.

But Bruckner was such a master of all the transmutations of counterpoint that there are many augmentations, diminutions, inversions, and what not, that are only fully appreciated by the conductor. Much of such contrapuntal ingenuity appeals as much to the eye as to the ear; it needs to be studied from the score itself, or at least it requires repeated hearing before the composer's full intention is understood.

Mr. Fiedler must have given enormous attention to the filagree work contained within the broader touches. Never did the subtle effects stand out so clearly. It was a grand effort in the cause of musical education and deserves the heartiest recognition. For once the first movement seemed quite as great as the second, and the Scherzo was a thing of intense interest, if not of melodic beauty.

The second movement, which is a tribute to Wagner, was given with grandeur and sweetness in contrast. The heavy and solemn passages upon the deep brasses were something to marvel at, but the tuba players must have blown their very lips off.

What can be done by a great composer with a comparatively ugly theme was shown by Strauss in the trumpet theme of "Zarathustra." In this Scherzo Bruckner has a six-noted theme, also upon the trumpet, that somewhat resembles it, and this rhythmic theme is omnipresent. It finally develops into a Brucknerian "Walkyrenritt."

Bruckner, like other musical giants, is not afraid of a degree of repetition when his thoughts are lofty. The end of the symphony, for example, had almost as picturesque a monotony as the beginning of Wagner's "Rheingold." Altogether then, this symphony has grown upon us until we are forced to recognize the fact that Bruckner's last symphonies belong to the great music of the modern school. But with such music it must always be "Aut Caesar, aut nullus." We would never want to hear such a composition given by a less perfect band than our symphony orchestra or by a conductor less earnest and painstaking than Mr. Fiedler.

It was a severe test to place Mr. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta" after this powerful symphony, but the smaller work proved a good foil to the vaster one. Mr. Chadwick has as much learning as any composer that America possesses, but he has not allowed his contrapuntal skill to crush out his spontaneity or his geniality. He is also thoroughly modern in spirit, without upsetting all the recognized forms of music to display his modernity.

The first movement seemed to us the strongest part of the little symphony, and had excellent points of contrast, especially between the chief and the subordinate theme, the latter being remarkably quaint and attractive. The Canzonetta had some striking military touches as an episode with drums and all the warlike touches that go to make a military march, but the effect was good enough to warrant the unusual change from love to war.

The Scherzo was effective, but scarcely as fine as some of Mr. Chadwick's other Scherzo movements. We consider Mr. Chadwick to be the best master of the Scherzo that America possesses. His Suite of Symphonic Sketches may prove this. It may be remembered too that Mr. Chadwick has built upon the foundation of the folk-song in this field. His "Jubilee" and the Scherzo of his second symphony show an ability to use the effects of the Plantation in classical form and blaze the path for the future American composer in this field as clearly as Dvorak did with his "New World" symphony.

The Sinfonietta was commendably brief and to the point. The diminutive "etta" does not always prove this in modern music. One composer has given forth a Sinfonietta nearly an hour long, and we may confidently expect to have modern Canzonettas long enough to fill an evening, very soon. Your true modern wants plenty of sea-room as well as plenty of instruments. Just as the French Revolutionists inscribed "Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite," upon their flags, we suggest that the new school inscribe upon their banner the motto—"Length, Strength and Discord." Mr. Chadwick has charmingly proved that he does not belong to this wing of the musical party.

BOSTON [illegible] POST,
FEBRUARY 12, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and George Chadwick's Sinfonietta made the programme of the 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Chadwick's little symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts. Form aside, he might well have dubbed the genial composition, "Novelette in Four Chapters," for there is surely a fanciful underlying programme. Yet the four movements have coherency of thought and style which is genuinely symphonic to a far greater degree than the "Symphonic Sketches" played under Dr. Muck in 1908.

The material and the workmanship of this "Sinfonietta" is light and transparent, though scored for full modern orchestra. The pieces are in the nature of a divertimento. There is consistent employment of some material that has an Oriental twang, but these sighs and roulades need not be taken too seriously. The slow movement is pretty, and it has imaginative touches. The growth of the song theme into a march is not merely a thing on paper; it is immediately appreciable to those who listen for the first time, and the dying echo of the march in the last measures is poetic. The scherzo is characterized by clever and diverting rhythms and instrumentation. In this movement, and in the last, Mr. Chadwick's valuable trait of native humor is prominent. Whether this section was penned before the finale of the Symphonic Sketches, or not, is unknown to the writer, but at any rate, there is strong affinity between the concluding measures of the two pieces, and there is further resemblance to the "thought of 30 days" in certain poignant measures which interrupt the brilliancy of the finale. Yet a further resemblance: in spite of mock Orientalism, the prevailing character of the music, with its lively, snappy motives, is a little Scotch and more plain, home-brewed American.

This music, no doubt with design on the part of Mr. Fiedler, offered the strongest possible contrast to Bruckner's awe-inspiring symphony. The first three movements of that enormous work are immensely strong, rich and superb. It is a glorious experience to encounter, one after another, perfect nuggets of musical invention, themes which in themselves would furnish such a master of construction as, say, Cesar Franck with material for an entire symphony. There seems hardly a limit to the imagination and the creativeness of Bruckner, and there is only one movement in this seventh symphony which has the customary blemishes, incongruity of material and loose, ill-considered structure. This is the finale. The other movements are, indeed, extraordinary, titanic. It should be said that it is not always well to form too hasty conclusions in regard to the strength or the weakness of this singular composer, for his methods, as well as his melodies, in spite of his Wagnerian affinities, are totally his own. And the gorgeous, resplendant instrumentation! Recall the sonority of the great theme of the adagio. Then consider whether there is anything more grandly treated in symphonic music. This man will surely live long by his greatnesses, in spite of his faults. There is only one incomparable Bruckner, whom we venture to consider a modern rival of Michel Angelo in the huge loftiness of his conceptions and the inordinate might of his workmanship.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 12, 1910.

SINFONIETTA BY CHADWICK FALLS FLAT AT CONCERT

Boston's supremacy in the American section of the musical world, which was testified to recently by two of this season's Symphony soloists, Sergei Rachmaninoff and Ernestine Schumann-Heink, found another striking illustration at yesterday's Symphony matinee, when a sifonietta in D major by George W. Chadwick, one of Boston's prominent composers, was performed for the first time at these concerts.

Sinfoniettas—little symphonies—are not familiar compositions. One by Ferdinand Thierot was performed at the Symphony concerts just 17 years ago. This one by Mr. Chadwick was first heard by the public at a Chadwick concert in Jordan Hall in 1904, the year in which it was written.

It is not so interesting a composition as Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," heard at Symphony concerts two years ago this month. It is not so remarkable either for charm of theme or for strength of general interest. Usually Mr. Chadwick's works have an attractiveness well sustained from beginning to end. Yesterday the interest of the audience rose and fell. Many people went out after the third movement, and at the close of the performance the applause was perfunctory. There was no calling for the composer. The plain fact is that the sinfonietta fell flat.

The memorable feature of the concert was the performance of Bruckner's seventh symphony, which had not been heard since 1906, in Dr. Muck's first season. This is the symphony with the famous adagio, sometimes described as funeral music, in memory of Wagner. It is also the symphony which Bruckner, in his naive way, said that he would like to have spoken of to his idol, Beethoven. At any rate, it is a work treated most sympathetically and reverently by most of the conductors of the day. Three of these conductors, by the way, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Dr. Muck, who have presided over the Symphony Orchestra, were pupils of Bruckner. Gustav Mahler, who will come here two weeks from tonight with the New York Philharmonic Society, is also a Bruckner pupil.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was full of color and vigor. The soloists next week will be Ernest Hutcheson and Harold Randolph, who will play the Mozart concerto for two pianos and orchestra. The Haydn symphony in D major and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture will have a place on the program. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was played two months ago, will be repeated by request.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 19, 1910.

SOCIETY WOMEN PROMINENT AT THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Mrs. John L. Gardner was one of several society women to arrive late at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday, so missed the first movement of the Haydn symphony. She looked unusually well in a long coat of broad-tailed fur, with deep knotted fringe bordering it, and a black turban with aigrettes. There was an unusual turnout of society and many stunning gowns worn. Miss Amy Lowell, sister of Harvard's president, is so devoted to the rehearsals that she, despite a lameness, appeared on crutches. Awaiting her in the looby was her chum, Barbara Higginson, one of the Hub's latest engaged society girls. Mrs. Winthrop Sargent wore a taupe gray broadcloth gown and some choice furs. Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis wore black broadcloth, an ermine stole and a black velvet turban with ermine.

Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, as usual, was severely gowned in black, but her sister, Miss MacNichol, affected color, her hat having a stunning plume of pale yellow.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:
FEBRUARY 13, 1910.

The conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, has made many friends, wherever the orchestra has played, who will be glad to know that he has been re-engaged for two more seasons. There have been rumors that Toscanini, the Italian opera conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York, might be secured, and reports have circulated that Gustav Mahler also had been approached. But the orchestra management have issued a statement in which it is said that the only leaders considered have been Mr Fiedler and his predecessor, Dr Muck.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 12, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Fiedler and an Unusually Tepid Audience—Bruckner's Symphony of the Tenor Tubas, and Mr. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta" for Contrasting Pieces.—Of Ground Plans and Their Advantages in Music

Truly the conductors of the Symphony Concerts are all in the pleasure—or the routine—of the day for the audiences that "sit under" them for twenty-four weeks of autumn, winter and spring. It was a fortnight, yesterday, since the company of Friday afternoons had assembled in Symphony Hall, and in the interval Mr. Fiedler had been reappointed as conductor for two seasons to come. Nine-tenths of his hearers, it is safe to say, warmly like his conducting, and one proportionately glad that they are to have long pleasure of it. The conductor was only human when he seemed to come a little elatedly to his place. Yet thewelcoming applause has been heartier when he has returned from a journey to New York, or was merely following the course of successive concerts in Boston. It was not a whit more hearty in the intervals, or at the close, of Bruckner's symphony in E major, which was by no means so well received as it was under Dr. Muck three years ago, or as was the composers' eighth symphony under Mr. Fiedler last winter. Mr. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta" was the other and contrasting piece. It is light music, as the music of symphony concerts goes—easy to understand, brief, interesting and spirited. Yet it waked little more applause than did Bruckner's unsparing lengths and insistent idiosyncrasies. Worse still—for a very rare occurrence at the afternoon concerts in Mr. Fiedler's time—departures were audible, visible and plentiful at every pause in the music. Perhaps one reason is not far to seek. Mr. Chadwick, in recent years, has written eminently masculine music. The qualities that give it exceptionally American savor—its robustness, its elasticity, its high spirits, its unexpectedness, its alternate reliance and frankness—are masculine qualities. In a time and a world that is sadly feminized in the arts in America, Mr. Chadwick has dared to write as a man for men. His courage praises him; the music that he has con conceived, like the "Symphonic Sketches" of the spring of 1908 and the "Sinfonietta" of yesterday, praise him still more. Yet all this brings its consequences. Women seemed not to like the Sketches overmuch; they drifted away from the "Sinfonietta," or they applauded it only mildly. Fortunately, tonight, Mr. Chadwick will have more listeners of his own sex. They ought to champion him.

When Mr. Fiedler divided his programme between Bruckner's symphony and Mr. Chadwick's "Sinfonetta," he evidently intended the second piece as contrast and relaxation to the first. The symphony continued for fifty minutes; the "Sonfonetta" for barely twenty. Mr. Chadwick sought brevity, while Bruckner courted lengths. Bruckner is reflective, laborious, striving. He dreams his dreams; he sees his visions; and he would transmute them into tones almost by the main force of his invention and the white heat of his ambition. For him large ideas and imaginings, largely and puissantly expressed. Mr. Chadwick in this particular piece writes spontaneously, fancifully, gayly. He contemplates not an august masterpiece but a pleasurable trifle. The contrast ran further. Bruckner, after long meditation, invents melodies of ample substance, long, and in some instances, like the very first theme of this particular symphony, of thrilling beauty. Then he sometimes worries these melodies with their endless advance in crescendo and in more and more opulent instrumental dress, until they gradually fall away or he breaks abruptly with one phase of them and passes to another. There are architects, children of the Beaux-Arts, who believe that the fount of all architectural virtue is the making of a ground plan. Make it as it should be, they say, and the building, especially in its exterior, will rise almost of itself. Bruckner lacked this architectural faculty; and unkind fate had schooled him in no Beaux-Arts of music. He lacked the designing faculty; he failed in his ground plans and his symphonies do not rise from them. They lack unity; the divisions and sub-divisions of them stop oftener than they end; they are not adroit in transitional passages. Now, Mr. Chadwick's "Sinfonetta" shines with these virtures. His design is small, his design is simple; but it is a design. Musical paragraph flows from musical paragraph. The transitions are so persuasive that the ear hardly notes that it is heard. Bruckner, in this symphony in E major, as in all the rest, worked under laborious inspiration. Mr. Chadwick in the "Sinfonetta" worked in spontaneous craftsmanship. The Viennese produced a puzzling and uneven monument; the Bostonian a pleasurable trifle. Yet the advantages in the process are by no means all on the side of the larger purpose and the bulkier accomplishment.

TRANSCRIPT.
FEBRUARY 19, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TWO CLASSICS, TWO MODERNS AND TWO PIANISTS

A Symphony by Haydn and a Double Concerto by Mozart That All Concerned Kept to Their Substance and Spirit—The Two Pianists—Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," and a Moral or Two About "Interpretative" Conducting—The Baffling Kaleriodoscope That It Is

Whatever else the public of the Symphony Concerts may mistrust, it never doubts Haydn. Annually the dutiful conductor puts a symphony by him on a pair of programmes, and annually two audiences receive it with happy applause. For the present musical year the incident befell yesterday afternoon; the applause was as cheerful as ever and the relative freshness of the chosen symphony—the "Oxford" in G major—and the suavity of the performance by Mr. Fiedler and his men made the plaudits the more deserved. A concerto out of Mozart followed, and the foreboding might have feared that Mr. Fiedler, for once, was making a "unified" programme in the fashion that used so to distress some of Dr. Muck's hearers. The real purpose, however, was a purpose of curiosity. The concerto is written for two pianos and from Baltimore came Mr. Hutcheson and Mr. Randolph, long expert in such music, to play it. As in their recitals, their pianos stood back to back in solid black mass across the centre of the stage; at either end sat one of the virtuosi; above this barrier towered Mr. Fiedler; beyond and around was the orchestral fringe. The spectacle was so unusual that the listeners craned their necks to look even as when some noted opera singer is the "soloist" of the day and in their absorption in the sight of two pianists accomplishing a common task, they almost forgot the music that set it. Perhaps thereby they lost little.

Then, the unity of the programme split in two, and the other two pieces upon it made contrasting romantic music. One Rachmaninoff's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead" was of the sober, the brooding, the reticent and a little morbid romanticism of our own time; the other Berlioz's overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," was of the large, frank, showy and striding romanticism of the thirties. Mr. Fiedler, who can conduct as though a like tempefament was in belated play in him, fairly wallowed in the delights of the music, and the band had its joy of it as so many virtuosi disporting themselves in a familiar and rather flamboyant task. With "The Isle of the Dead," Mr. Fiedler's conducting was of like temper; but it was not conducting that suited either the musical or the poetic substance of the piece. The tone-poem lost its rarefied quality; the audience listened coldly; and the applause at the end was the half-hearted applause of warm anticipation that has turned into rather bewildered disappointment.

In spite of the little band of purists that would have their Haydn and their Mozart as the eighteenth century—as they believe—had them, such music as the symphony and the concerto of yesterday must be inflated when it is played at a symphony concert ten years into the twentieth. Haydn and Mozart wrote for little bands, little audiences and little halls. In a sense that is by no means detraction, they also wrote little music. Symphony concerts, in 1910, connote big bands, big audiences, big halls and, as often as not, big music. Inflation there must be, and the real point of the process is whether it does violence to the substance and the spirit of the music. When the purists have their way with it they make it sound quaint in twentieth-century ears. Quaintness is precisely the effect that most delights these perverse souls, but quaintness was also the last quality that the eighteenth century found in its own music. The English ears that heard the "Oxford" symphony in 1791 or the Viennese audience that first listened to the double concerto ten years earlier, doubtless found both the most natural music in the world, as Wagner's or Brahms's is wholly [illegible] to us.

[illegible]ydn's symphony or [illegible]art's concerto to the dimensions of the modern symphony concert is thus to take it natural again in our ears, and to inflate the one or the other with the intelligent discrimination that Mr. Fiedler and the two pianists showed yesterday, is to restore both to something very like their true estate. The Oxford dons and gownsmen, who heard Haydn's symphony, may have been little interested and little versed in music; but the sympathetic ears in the Sheldonian Theatre must have found pleasure in its unfailing suavity of voice. It is a smooth symphony—recall for example how little the two dance melodies of the final rondo are differentiated or how slightly the heavier contrasting passages in them disturb the euphonic flow of the music. It is music of frequent repetition that the players must vary by the shadings—and the shadows of shadings—in their virtuosity. It is music that is full of little feathery ornament, like the breathings of the wood-winds, that is not itself unless it come as so many exquisite felicities. Now, the attaining of these qualities as Mr. Fiedler and his men proved is as possible to a large band as to a small, in a modern hall as well as in a little salon, to an audience nowadays as to an audience a century ago. In pervading but shaded suavity, in ceaseless euphony, in delicate flicker of feathery detail, Haydn's symphony surely sounded yesterday as it must have sounded in its time and for once in his music, it has not a hint of commonness.

Mozart's concerto for two pianos—the concerto in E-flat, has much less distinction. Curiosity over the double pianistic feat that it asks keeps it alive, and when the feat is done with the mutual understanding and sympathy, the common feeling for melody, figure and phrase, for pace and rhythm, with the team play of hand and almost of intuition that Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hutcheson shared yesterday, it has its interest of musical curiosity and of psychological curiosity as well in this welding of two minds and temperaments in a common task. The eighteenth century, however, probably had far less curiosity over pieces for two or even three pianos. They were common enough in those days; all sorts of composers wrote them; all sorts of players played them as so much routine. Mozart was of his time, and wrote routine music like the rest, and of it is the double concerto. Probably the Viennese audiences that first heard it expected no more than routine, just as a Bostonian audience does when it is asked to hear a new string quartet by an American composer. We of the twentieth century, being trained to Mozart as a classic master, will have him always masterful and always classic. Being human he could not always be so; being spendthrift and poor, he flung off potboilers, of which the double concerto is one. Something of his finer qualities went into it—the light brilliance of some of the running passages, the quick fancy of the cadenzas, the sunny flow of the more songful passages. Two modern pianos and a modern orchestra had their share in them; and, as with Haydn's symphony, abated not one.

The hide-bound in convention, tradition and musical antiquities generally like to sneer amusedly at what they call modern "interpretative" conducting, but the contrast between "The Isle of the Dead" as the same audience heard it under Mr. Fiedler yesterday and under Mr. Rachmaninoff two months ago, made a singularly salient instance of what it may accomplish, or fail to accomplish, with the same music. Mr. Rachmaninoff was conducting in his own piece. Steadily, so to say, he held it down. He kept its voice and the voices of the orchestra low; the instrumental coloring was insistently shadowed and sombre. If still music is possible—and it certainly is in impression—the music of "The Isle of the Dead" was still as the cypresses in Böcklin's picture that suggested the tone-poem, as still as the motionless air in which the isle itself stands or the pale light in which it swims. Much of the music under Mr. Rachmaninoff's hand seemed deliberately monotonous, like the low, unbroken lapping of the sea upon the isle, like the changeless fields of sky above it. And when they who mourned their dead lamented in the music, or when perchance a dim longing for the life behind, for its pains as well as its joys, for all that it had meant and known, stirred in this still isle of disembodied souls, then was the music, as Mr. Rachmaninoff read it, still low-pitched, quivering, shadowed. It was the music of those whose grief sits too deep for loud lament, or it was of the longing of spirits that are half-phantoms. Thus "interpreted," and by the composer himself, the music seemed imaginative, beautiful, poignant. None was easy to recall like to it in mood; few of the tone-poems of the hour seemed so fully to accomplish their end as poetry by the music that was their means.

Under Mr. Fiedler "The Isle of the Dead" became as another piece. Had he never seen Böcklin's picture—a picture of stillness, of remote monotony, of rarefied airs and rarefied lights, if ever there was one? Was he, who usually is of quick and keen perceptions, especially in romantic music, deaf and blind to what seem the audible voices and the manifest moods of Mr. Rachmaninoff's tone-poem? Did their quietness, their monotony, their endless shadows evade his more robust mind and his more eager temperament. To every one of us, and sometimes often, there is music that we may not, for some temperamental barrier, understand, and into which even the most supple and manifold conductors may not enter. Franck's "Psyche," as Mr. d'Indy's subsequent playing of it disclosed, was a sealed book to Mr. Gericke. Tried by his predecessors and successors, Dr. Muck was not fortunate with Schubert. Similarly "The Isle of the Dead" seemed to evade Mr. Fiedler. For the images that Mr. Rachmanionoff's music wrought he substituted a troubled sea, a perturbed isle, rushing winds, glaring lights, mourners who cried their grief, spirits that clamored their longings. Mr. Rachmaninoff's isle was an isle of sanctuary and solitude. Mr. Fiedler bade his audience lustily to hear the effects of the concert-room. Before he was half done it was easy to believe that "interpretative" conductors may not only interpret music, but as understanding and sympathy serve or fail, almost create or almost annihilate it. And to turn this queer kaleidoscopic glass of "interpretation" yet again, what was fatal in Mr. Fiedler's conducting to Mr. Rachmaninoff and "The Isle of the Dead," intensified, glorified, fairly-recreated the striding, restless, opulent, heavy-handed Berlioz of the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

H. T. P.

This music was suggested to the Russian by a picture. It is reasonable to suppose that the music is the expression of his emotions awakened by the picture; which one of the four or five variants of the original we do not know. It is also reasonable to suppose that the composer wishes the hearer to be similarly affected. But between the composer and the hearer the conductor, the interpreter, must stand. A composer is not always a good conductor even of his own compositions; he may not have authority and magnetism; he may not have the technical skill. Fortunately for us Mr. Rachmaninoff is a conductor of ability and experience. We knew how he wished his music to sound; what moods, emotions, effects are contained in the score—as he conceived it and as he still feels.

Mr. Fielder is also a conductor of ability and experience. It is not likely, however, that he, or Mr. Nikisch, or Mr. Mahler, or Mr. Weingartner would conduct "The Island of the Dead" in precisely the manner of the composer. The individuality of each conductor, worthy the name of conductor, must necessarily assert itself. Boecklin's picture is not the same to all that see it. Rachmaninoff's music is not the same to all that read or hear it.

There can therefore be different and at the same time effective interpretations of this symphonic poem. One reading may appeal to A more than it does to B. Now suppose that C has not seen Boecklin's picture, not even a half-tone of it? The music to him will be only absolute music, music without a program, without any association. What he will hear, what he will feel will depend wholly on his own imagination.

But C might say reasonably that music which paints in tones the Isle and of the Dead should have for its prevailing mood a certain calm, a certain serenity. The waves should lap the shore, not surge and roar. Let the lamentation of the mourners be ever so poignant—and it may be taken for granted that the more dramatic section of this symphonic poem is a lamentation—the mood of the isle and its [illegible]

When Mr. Rachmaninoff conducted, the first impression was of this calm, this repose; and the passionate outburst and the funeral hymn, the "Dies Irae," were all the more dramatic. The ocean, as Mr. Fiedler sees it, is agitated. The waves themselves mourn and they toss in anguish. As conducted by him, the work has more than one great climax. The difference in the readings and in the consequent impression made on the hearer was interesting. It should be remembered that the presence of the composer gave an extraneous interest to his composition.

If A exclaims: "I prefer the reading of Mr. Rachmaninoff," not knowing the score, it is because A, knowing the picture, sees it as the composer saw it, and his mood was more in unison with the composer's mood. To the average audience Mr. Fiedler's reading would be the more dramatic. Some, who are impressed by the awful stillness of Boecklin's picture, prefer the composer's interpretation.

The overture of Berlioz was brilliantly performed. Haydn's symphony pleased many, and it was finely played. The last movement suggests comic opera music, such music as the famous finale in "The Marriage of Figaro."

Messrs. Hutcheson and Randolph for some years have been passionately addicted to the habit of playing mild, innocuous music for two pianos. Yesterday they gave a performance which may justly be described as neat.

The program for the concerts of March 4 and 5 will be as follows: Wagner, Faust overture; Schumann, symphony in B-flat major; Sibelius, "A Saga" (first time here); Strauss, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from "In Italy"; Tschaikowsky, overture "1812."

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 20, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony orchestra will start away tonight on its fourth southern trip. Concerts will be given in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn, and on the following Monday night, the 28th, the third and last concert of the season will be given in Hartford. Messrs. Hess and Schroeder will play Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and 'cello in Philadelphia, and at the Thursday evening concert in New York. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn will be the soloist in Hartford. The chief orchestral works played will be Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead," Brahms' Symphony in D major and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." At the request of the subscribers of the Baltimore concerts, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed with the assistance of the Oratorio Society of that city.

HERALD, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 19, 1910

SYMPHONY GIVES 16TH REHEARSAL

Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead" Repeated by Request—Music Suggested by a Picture.

OVERTURE TO "BENVENUTO CELLINI" ALSO PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Oxford"..Haydn
Concerto for two pianos.....Mozart
"The Island of the Dead".Rachmaninoff
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"....
Berlioz

Rachmaninoff's Symphonic poem, a musical illustration of Boecklin's celebrated picture, was played yesterday "by request." The composer conducted the work when it was first played here last December.

[illegible] MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21,

IN THE [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

IN Symphony hall, Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra played their fifteenth program of the season, as follows:

Haydn, Symphony in G major, "Oxford" (Peters, No. 9), (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 2); Mozart, Concerto for two pianofortes (K. 365); Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," Symphonic Poem for full orchestra to the picture by A. Bocklin, op. 29 (by request); Berlioz, Overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23. The soloists in the concert were Ernest Hutcheson and Harold Randolph.

The tone poem was that which the composer Rachmaninoff, codnucted at a Symphony concert during his recent visit to America. The work as conducted by Mr. Fiedler had clearer structural significance than it had when conducted by Mr. Rachmaninoff; but while Mr. Fiedler's interpretation laid emphasis on structure, it did not neglect to make plain the moods and pictures of the music. There were the contrasting moods of defeat and triumph, each of which prevailed by turns through more than half the poem and seemed likely to last indefinitely, when the principal violin and the solo woodwind voices interrupted and brought in a period of pastoral and idyllic contemplation. So the music progressed to the end, with a short processional scene as its one dramatic feature and with a moment of neutral mood, like that at the close of Tschaikowsky's Pathetic symphony, to justify the Teutonized Rachmaninoff in calling himself a Russian composer.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the tone poem was more or less interesting than the composer's, according to whether the listener prefers bold or subdued effects of orchestral interpretation. If Mr. Rachmaninoff's contrasts had been stronger, Mr. Fiedler's would doubtless have been lighter; at any rate the regular conductor of the orchestra could be counted on to give the work a reading all his own.

The Mozart concerto for two pianos was performed in as thorough a spirit of scholarship by Messrs Hutcheson and Randolph as was the Brahms double concerto for violin and violoncello in which Messrs. Hess and Schroeder recently appeared at a Symphony concert.

THE EVENING TIMES.
PAWTUCKET, R. I.,
JANUARY 1. 1910.

Boston Symphony.

The programme which Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening, will so far as the symphony is concerned at least, be of rather lighter character than is the rule, for he has chosen Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony. Goldmark who today at an advanced age is still able to write entrancing music, has done nothing more charming than this so-called symphony, a work which purists in music call a "Suite."

The soloist, as already announced, will be Mischa Elman, who after an extraordinary career as a prodigy in Europe, came to America last winter to win triumph after triumph wherever he played and to be acclaimed as one of the greatest geniuses of the violin this country had ever heard. Elman is no longer in the prodigy class, for he is now a lad of 18 and very mature for his age; in fact, his performances are to be measured only by the performances of the great masters of his instrument. He will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin in D major. It is an interesting fact that this work was written for Elman's teacher, the great Leopold Auer, and Auer refused to play it because it was too difficult.

The programme in full is as follows: Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Weber; "Rustic Wedding" symphony, E-flat major, No. 1, op. 26. (1) "Wedding March," variations, moderato molto; (2) "Bridal Song," intermezzo, allegretto; (3) "Serenade," scherzo, allegro moderato scherzando; (4) "In the Garden," andante; (5) "Dance," allegro molto, Goldmark; concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, op. 35. (1) Allegro moderato; (2) canzonetta, andante; (3) finale, allegro vivacissimo, Tschaikowsky; prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristam and Isolde," Wagner.

THE EVENING TIMES.
FEBRUARY 12, 1910.
PAWTUCKET, R. I.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony is to give its third concert in Providence on next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Unquestionably an even warmer welcome than usual will be given Mr. Fiedler in recognition of his renewed engagement with the Boston Symphony for two years, which has just been announced. The fact that he has been retained for two years has been very pleasing news to the very many admirers he has made in Providence.

His programme is one of usual interest. The symphony will be Brahms' D-Major No. 2, the idyllic work which has been a final denial of the many accusations that Brahms was not a melodist. It is one of the most gracious works in symphonic literature and particularly appealing to Mr. Fiedler. The other orchestral numbers will be the favorite "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." The soloist will be Ernest Hutcheson, the distinguished pianist at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson, although a resident of this country now, was born in Melbourne, Australia, July 20, 1871. When he was about 15 years old, he went to Leipsic and studied there for six years—the pianoforte under Bruno Zwintscher and Reinecke, composition under Jadassohn. He wrote a pianoforte trio; he won the Mozart prize. He then made a tour through Australia and he played in other lands. He went to Weimar where he studied the pianoforte under Stevenhagen. In 1898 he settled in Berlin, and the next year he married the Baroness Senfft von Pilsach. In 1900 he was invited to be the chief pianoforte teacher at the Conservatory of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore; and his first appearance as a pianist in this country was in Baltimore Oct. 19, 1900, where he now resides. Mr. Hutcheson has given concerts in Russia, Germany and England. During the past winter he has been gaining a great deal of praise through his illustrated lectures on Richard Strauss' "Electra." Here he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

The programme in order is as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
"Symphony in D-Major, No. 2"....Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra,
"The Emperor".....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"....Liszt
Soloist—Ernest Hutcheson.

POST
ss
DEC 6 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although there are but three numbers on the program which Max Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:20, the concert will be one of extraordinary charm. In the first place the soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who in past years has made many admirers here. Mme. Samaroff will play the Liszt concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING TIMES,
PAWTUCKET, R. I.,
FEBRUARY 16, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Players Give Brilliant Performance At Infantry Hall.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before an unusually large audience in Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening, and was, as usual, a brilliant performance from beginning to end. This concert was of special significance as being the first in Providence since the re-engagement of Mr. Fiedler as conductor. The pleasure felt by symphony auditors in his re-engagement was in plain evidence when he was greeted by hearty applause on his appearance on the conductor's stand last evening.

Besides being a large audience, it was a most enthusiastic and demonstrative gathering that greeted the symphony players. And there was plenty to enthuse about, for rarely has this brilliant band of musicians played such a thoroughly pleasing programme in Providence. The symphony, Brahms' second, in D-major, was executed with a dash and finish that was a revelation even to old symphony concert goers. It is difficult to say anything new of the work of the famous Boston orchestra, and it is entirely unnecessary to indulge in extreme praise when speaking of its rendition of the Brahms' symphony.

The other orchestral number, the Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was a piece of dainty beauty familiar to those who have an acquaintance with high-class music the world over, and it was executed with the beauty and sympathy it deserves. Ernest Hutcheson, pianist, was the soloist of the evening. He played the fifth concerto by Beethoven in brilliant fashion, and was given an enthusiastic ovation at the close. The programme follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"..... Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73..... Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, op. 73.....Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
"Les Preludes," syphonic poem No. 3.. Liszt

From EVENING STAR
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 7, and will present as soloist that greatly admired pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's Concerto No. 1 in E flat major. Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

1884

EVENING STAR
ss Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although there are but three numbers on the program which Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, the concert will be one of extraordinary charm. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Liszt concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

In the past the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not given much Strauss music, but Mr. Fiedler is altering that condition, for at the first concert a month ago he did "Don Juan" and the coming concert will bring "Till Eulenspiegel," which in its way is one of the most astonishing works written for an orchestra.

In the whole symphonic literature there is no more charming work than Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The composer calls it a symphony, but captious critics insist that it is a suite, but no matter what the nomenclature may be, it is a work that is always greeted with enthusiasm because of its grace and melodious charm. It is in five parts—I. "The Wedding March"; II. "The Bridal Song;" III. "The Serenade"; IV. "In the Garden"; V. "The Dance."

The program in full is as follows: Goldmark, "Rustic Wedding," symphony in E flat major No. 1, Op. 23; Liszt, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat No. 1; Richard Strauss, tonepoem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo form, Op. 28; soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
JAN 9

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MADAME OLGA SAMAROFF.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will give the second concert of the season at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Although there are but three numbers on the program which Mr. Fiedler has arranged, the concert will be one of extraordinary charm. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who in past years, by her personality and her magnificent playing, has made many admirers here.

Mme. Samaroff returns after a year's stay abroad, where she studied in addition to playing much in public. She will play the Liszt Concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

In the past there has been more or less complaint from the Washington patrons that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not giving them enough Strauss, but Mr. Fiedler is remedying that, for at the first concert a month ago he did "Don Juan," and the coming concert will bring "Till Eulenspiegel," which, in its way, is one of the most astonishing works written for orchestra.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Although there are but three numbers on the programme which Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, the concert will be one of extraordinary charm. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who in past years, by her charming personality and her magnificent playing, has made many admirers here, who will be anxious to hear the result of her year's stay abroad, where she studied, in addition to playing, with great success, much in public. Mme. Samaroff will play the Liszt Concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." In the past there has been more or less complaint from the Washington patrons that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not giving them enough Strauss, but Mr. Fiedler is remedying that, for at the first concert a month ago he did "Don Juan," and the coming concert will bring "Till Eulenspiegel," which, in its way, is one of the most astonishing works written for orchestra.

In the whole symphonic literature there is no more charming work than Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The composer calls it a symphony, but captious critics insist that it is a suite; but no matter what the nomenclature may be, it is a work that is always greeted with enthusiasm, because of its grace and melodious charm. It is in five parts: (1) "The Wedding March," (2) "The Bridal Song, (3) "The Serenade," (4) "In the Garden, and (5) "The Dance."

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.

GIVES SECOND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Furnishes Musical Treat.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon drew a large audience and proved in every way the treat to Washington music lovers that similar concerts in the past have been. On the program were a number of light numbers that won approval. Nothing that a conductor could do was left undone by Max Fiedler, whose uniformly fine work has won for him a position in the first ranks of symphony conductors, and Olga Samaroff played with that brilliancy which is so thoroughly appreciated by those who lean more to the intellectual than to the temperamental in music.

The principal number on the program was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." Even if the "Rustic Wedding" is a "suite" and not strictly a "symphony," as many critics maintain, it is nevertheless a composition of such rare beauty that none found fault with Director Fiedler for giving it.

The other purely orchestral number was Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks," an eccentric fantasy in the composer's happiest mood, and again the band was heard in the Liszt concerto for piano and orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 2- 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 11, at 4:30 o'clock. Mischa Elman will be the soloist and will then

[78]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 2- 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 11, at 4:30. Mischa Elman will be the soloist and will make his first appearance of the season.

TIMES

ss Washington, D. C.

SYMPHONY MUSIC IS WELL RECEIVED

Perfection of Art Verdict of Audience at National Theater.

By ROBERTA V. BRADSHAW.

In the program presented at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater, lovers of novelty found much to their liking.

From the too seldom heard "Rustic Wedding" symphony of Goldmark, to the fantastic and ultra-Strauss-esque "Tyl Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," an almost eerie "flavor" pervaded the offerings yesterday afternoon. That the program was built to suit the mood of the house to a T, too, was most apparent, since Mr. Fiedler at the conclusion of both orchestra selections found himself compelled to return to the stage time and time again to bow his acknowledgments to a tumultously approving house.

Goldmark's poetic and markedly original symphony found in Mr. Fiedler an interpreter imbued with the spirit of the composer, and as the audience followed the work from the first melodious note of the theme announced by the first horn through several movements—intermezzo, scherzo, andante—into the full storm of a rollicking rural dance, it is scarcely probable that even the most accomplished and stubborn formalist ever gave a thought to the fact that the term 'symphony' might better be replaced by "suite."

To say the rendition was the perfection of art is merely to voice the verdict not only of thosewho know music as a science, but as a medium for sensuous enjoyment.

Catering to meditative in the first number, in the second and last orchestral composition, "Tyl Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks.," the program builder essayed to play upon one's sense of humor, upon one's imagination, and upon that little vein of sympathy for the unconventional, and picturesquely lawless which in a larger or lesser degree is present in every human "make-up." Tyl Eulenspeigel, folklore hero, practical joker, trickster, and rogue through his manifold disguises, moods, and situations, had his story written by Richard Strauss, that great master of tonal expression, and told with a fluent, and emphatic diction by Mr. Fiedler and his men. Between the two orchestral numbers, Mme. Olga Samaroff, fresh from a European harvest of laurels, delighted her hearers with Liszt's concerto, in E flat, major No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra.

Those who remember Madame Samaroff's diction and technique, her delicious singing tones, her crisp, clear chords, and her octave work, remarkable alike for precision and facility, will not wonder at the pleasure her work gave her hearers at yesterday's concert.

Indeed, selfishly overlooking the tremendous expenditure of nervous force and energy which such a number requires, the house insisted upon a recall, their clamors subsiding only upon the appearance of the men who summarily removed the grand piano and replaced the seats for the orchestra to proceed with the concluding number of the eminently satisfactory and enjoyable performance.

POST

ss Washington, D. C.

MUSICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, in many respects the most remarkable of the violinists of our day, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 11, at 4:30 o'clock. It was the privilege of the orchestra to bring Elman here last year, when he made his debut in Washington, and no one who heard him on that day will forget the tremendous sensation this quiet-looking boy made when he played the Tschaikowsky "Concerto." This year he has chosen Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra. The work is really a concerta, being symphony only in name, and is one of the most ingratiating compositions in the literature of music for the violin. Lalo was one of the greatest of French composers of the last century, and nothing that he has done has given him broader fame than this "Spanish Symphony."

rom EVE. STAR

ddress Washington,

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the New National Theater found the enthusiastic welcome which always awaits this organization. The program was one of especial interest, the "Sim[phonie Eroica" finding especial approva[l] rendered under the accomplished d[irec]tion of Herr Fiedler. The soloist [Mischa Elman, was greeted with th[e] warmest enthusiasm, and his perform[ance] entitled him to rank with the great [violin virtuosi] of his time.

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 8

RUSSIAN PIANIST APPLAUDED

Mme. Olga Samaroff Pleases at Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Artist Is Encored Time and Again by Large Audience of Music Lovers.

Notwithstanding the inclement weather yesterday afternoon, there was a large audience at the National Theater for the second of the series of matinees given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The theater was filled with music lovers and the rendition of the several pieces was well-nigh perfect. To Max Fielder, who led the orchestra, may be attributed in a large degree the excellent rendition of the numbers.

The programme also served to present Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist, whose splendid work in the only number in which she took part brought forth much applause. The appeal for an encore was persistent and the artist had to come forward time and again to receive the tributes that her work had called forth. Her performance was a concerto by Litz, in E flat Major, No. 1, and she was ably assisted by the orchestra. But her work easily dominated this piece and the applause at the end was entirely evoked by her remarkable work at the piano.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Goldmarks' "Rustic Wedding," Symphony in five numbers, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The first of these was the principal, and Herr Fielder showed his ability, especially in the lighter parts. The last number of the symphony was, perhaps, the most appealing and also the lightest. "The Dance" and "The Wedding Song" were the most encored of the first series of selections.

In the last number the orchestra rose to the occasion. The merry vein in the opening of the "Merry Pranks," culminating in the droll humor and insolence of the trickster—"Till Eulenspiegel"—and finally the trial, the condemnation, the death, and the sinking into the folklore of the people are wonderfully portrayed in the music of that master of melodies, Strauss. And it suffered nothing in the reading of Herr Fielder or the rendition of the orchestra.

n EVE. STAR

ress Washington, D.

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday, afternoon, January 11, at 4:30 o'clock. Elman aroused great enthusiasm when he played here last year by his performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto. This year he has chosen Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride." It has been some years since "Eroica" has been played here. In composing the "Eroica" Beethoven is supposed to have had Napoleon in mind, although afterward he changed his views of the heroic qualities of the French conqueror and denied that his symphony was a musical epitome of his career.

Several of Smetana's symphonic poems have been played here in years past by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and music lovers are aware of the success enjoyed by his opera "The Bartered Bride" in New York in the past two years.

om HERALD dress Washington,

te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, in many respects the most remarkable of the violinists of our day, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 11, at 4:30. This year he has chosen Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. The work is really a concerto, being symphony only in name, and is one of the most ingratiating compositions in the literature of music for the violin.

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride." It has been some years since "Eroica" has been played here. Many connoisseurs profess to see in the "Eroica" the work most typical of Beethoven's genius; this despite the fact that the C minor No. 5 is usually spoken of in this way. In the "Eroica" Beethoven unquestionably had Napoleon in mind when he wrote it, although afterward he changed his views of the heroic qualities of the French conqueror and denied that his symphony was a musical epitome of his career.

TIMES

ss Washington, D. C.

DVORAK'S CONCERTO PLAYED BY ELMAN

Soloist of Boston Symphony Scores Another Triumph.

Mischa Elman, soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday at the New National Theater at the last moment changed his number on the program and instead of the Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, by Lola, substituted Dvorak's concerto for violin in A minor (op. 53).

Otherwise the program was given as first arranged, the Beethoven's much discussed Eroica being the symphony number. Mr. Fiedler's perfect organization left nothing to be desired in the rendition of a work "painted" to express the progress and consummation of the life of an heroic individuality.

The overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," a rollicking comedy song depicting the misadventures of an "arranged" village wedding completed the program.

Mr. Elman's contribution, which was superbly given, was a colorful piece of work, which gave the young musician ample opportunity to show his virtuosity.

TIMES

ss Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert. Accompanying her was Mrs. Charles P. Taft, Miss Louise Taft, and Mrs. Charles Anderson.

In another box was Mrs. Norman Williams, who had in her party Mrs. Merrill, and Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson.

The Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, and their house guest, Miss Kienen, occupied a box.

Mrs. Edson Bradley entertained a party in her box.

Mrs. I. T. Mann was also among those occupying boxes. With her were Mr. and Mrs. Terry, and Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Hickey.

Among those in the audience were the German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff, the Countess Luise-Alexandra von Bernstorff, the Danish Minister and Countess Moltke, Countess de Buisseret, wife of the Belgian minister; the Assistant Secretary of War, Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, and Miss Marian Oliver, Mr. de Thal, of the Russian embassy staff, Mr. Justice Harlan, the Misses Harlan, Mrs. James Harlan, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, the Counselor of the German Embassy and the Countess Wedel, the counselor of the Austrian embassy, Baron Ambrozy; Dr. and Mrs. Roland Cotton Smith, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Albert Clifford Barney, Miss Louise White, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Swift, the Misses Droop, Miss Zelma Pilson, Samuel Pilson, Miss Ethel Robeson, Miss Elsie Downing, Miss Leonora Finley, Mrs. M. M. Parker, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Fisher, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McKenny, Mrs. P. Lee Philips, and Mrs. Thomas H. Carter.

rom POST

ddress Washington, D. C.

ate

Mrs. Taft at Concert.

Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. With her were Mrs. Charles P. Taft, Miss Louise Taft, Mrs. Charles Anderson, and Miss Parsons.

Mrs. Norman Williams had another box, and with her were Mrs. Merrill and Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson.

The minister from the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon and Miss Kienen were in another box.

Mrs. Edson Bradley entertained a box party, as did Mrs. I. T. Mann, who had with her Mr. and Mrs. Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Hutchinson, and Miss Hickey.

In the audience were the German ambassador and Countess Luise-Alexandra von Bernstorff, the Danish minister and Countess Moltke, Mrs. A. C. Barney, Miss Louise White, the counselor of the German embassy and Countess Wedel, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Dr. and Mrs. Roland Cotton Smith, the counselor of the Austrian embassy, Baron Ambrozy; Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Swift, Miss Ethel Robeson, Miss Zelma Pilson, Mr. Samuel Pilson, Miss Elsie Downing, Miss Leonora Finley, Mrs. M. M. Parker, the Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver and Miss Oliver, Mr. de Thal, of the Russian embassy; Countess de Buisseret, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Fisher, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McKenny, Mrs. Lee Phillips, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Harlan, wife of Mr. Justice Harlan; the Misses Harlan, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Philip Hichborn, Miss Constance Hoyt, Miss Elizabeth Williams, Mrs. Louis Coolidge, Mrs. Joseph E. Thropp, Miss Stephanie Trescot, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, and Miss Isabelle Hagner.

Posh

WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 13

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The attention of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington is called to the fact that the fourth concert will be given in the National Theater on Monday afternoon, February 21, instead of the usual Tuesday afternoon, owing to the inability of the orchestra to secure the theater for Tuesday afternoon, which is Washington's birthday. There will be no soloist at this concert, but Mr. Fiedler has made a most interesting program. The center of interest will rest in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The overture to "Euryanthe," Shubert's unfinished symphony; the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Rienzi" overture complete the list of work.

rom EVE. STAR

ddress Washington,

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the New National Theater found the enthusiastic welcome which always awaits this organization. The program was one of especial interest, the "Simphonia Eroica" finding especial approval as rendered under the accomplished direction of Herr Fiedler. The soloist, Mischa Elman, was greeted with the warmest enthusiasm, and his performance entitled him to rank with the great violin virtuosi of his time.

HERALD

ss Washington, D.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management desires to state that the only musicians who have been considered for the post are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATE IS CHANGED

Orchestra to Appear at New National Theater Monday, Februray 21.

The attention of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington is again drawn to the fact that the fourth concert will be given in the New National Theater on Monday afternoon, February 21, at 4:30, instead of the usual Tuesday afternoon. Owing to the inability of the orchestra to secure the New National Theater for Tuesday afternoon, which is Washington's Birthday, this change had to be made.

There will be no soloist at this concert, but Mr. Fiedler has made a most interesting program. The center of interest will rest in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was played recently in Boston under the direction of the composer with such sensational success. The overture to "Euryanthe," Schubert's unfinished symphony, the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Rienzi" overture complete the list.

AMERICAN STAR

ess Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two soloists will be presented at the Boston Symphony concert, which is the second concert of the season, in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 8. They are Madame Schumann-Heink, the great contralto, and Mr. Georges Longy, who is equally sure of his place as a great master of the oboe, Mr. Longy being the solo oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for Oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony in C Major No. 2 and Tschaikowsky's very charming "Nut Cracker" suite.

[79]

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 13 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The attention of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington is again drawn to the fact that the fourth concert will be given in the New National Theater on Monday afternoon, February 21, instead of the usual Tuesday afternoon. Owing to the inability of the orchestra to secure the New National Theater for Tuesday afternoon, which is Washington's Birthday, this change had to be made.

There will be no soloist at this concert, but Mr. Fiedler has made a most interesting programme. The center of interest will rest in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was played recently in Boston under the direction of the composer with such sensational success. The overture to "Euryanthe," Schubert's unfinished symphony; the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Rienzi" overture complete the list of works.

Mischa Elman, Violinist.

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years, and perhaps the most remarkable violinistic talent that the world has ever known since the great Italian, Paganini, is what is asserted of Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who will be heard at the Columbia Theater Friday afternoon, February 25, at 4:30 o'clock.

Mischa Elman came out of Russia four years ago a boy of fourteen and conquered Germany. Three years ago he went to London and conquered that great city. Last month he came to New York, and it was the same story, and within the last few weeks he has made a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Washington, Rochester, and Buffalo, and in Chicago with the Thomas Orchestra, and had receptions the like of which have not been seen since Paderewski first began to play before the American public.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR

Two soloists will be presented at the Boston Symphony concert, which is the second concert of the season, in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 8. They are Madame Schumann-Heink, the greatest contralto of our day, and Mr. George Longy, who is equally sure of his place as the greatest living master of the obeo, Mr. Longy being the solo oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellit" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony in C-Major No. 2, and Tschaikowsky's very charming "Nut Cracker" Suite.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two soloists will be presented at the Boston Symphony concert, which is the second concert of the season, in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 8. They are Madame Schumann-Heink, the great contralto, and Mr. Georges Longy, who is equally sure of his place as a great master of the oboe, Mr. Longy being the solo oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for Oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony in C Major No. 2 and Tschaikowsky's very charming "Nut Cracker" suite.

WORLD
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 2, 1909

money and wax.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Baltimoreans will have another opportunity to hear Madame Schumann-Heink before her European tour at the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric next Wednesday.

This year the orchestra is augmented, and Max Fielder, conductor, has arranged a program that cannot fail to appeal. Madame Schumann-Heink has many friends in Baltimore, and there is no doubt but that she will be greeted by a large house. The other soloist will be Georges Longy, who will make his first appearance in this city with the Boston

AMERICAN STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his remarkable programs for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening at 8:15. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here, and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers, the "Vitellia" Recitative and Aria from Mozart's opera "Titus" and the great aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

SCHUMANN-HEINK TO SING IN CONCERT

Will Be One Of The Soloists With Boston Symphony Next Week.

Another remarkable program has been arranged for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. Contrary to the usual custom of the Orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the Orchestra here, and her presence will doubtless be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers — the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera "Titus" and the great aria from Gounod's opera "Sapho."

The regular orchestral numbers will be Schumann's beautiful symphony in C major No. 2, and Tschaikowsky's entrancing ballet suite, "The Nut Cracker," which will be played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 2, Op. 61..Schumann
Recitative and Aria "Vitellia," from "Titus".....Mozart
Concerto for oboe and string orchestra.....Haendel
"Stances de Sapho".....Gounod
Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet, "The Nut Cracker," Op. 71-A.....Tschaikowsky Soloists — Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Schumann-Heink And Georges Longy To Be Soloists Wednesday.

PHILADELPHIANS NEXT WEEK

Tillie Koenen To Give Peabody Recital In January — Miss Greenwood To Sing.

A program of unusual interest and two soloists will mark the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening. The soloists will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Georges Longy, oboist.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia," recitative and aria, from Mozart's opera "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera "Sappho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboist, who is to appear for the first time in Baltimore as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra.

Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of five, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet. In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his friend, Prosper Mimart (teacher of clarinet at the Paris Conservatoire), he re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera.

He became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later he founded the famous Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The regular orchestral numbers will be Schumann's beautiful symphony in C Major No. 2 and Tschaikowsky's entrancing ballet suite, the "Nut Cracker," which will be played here by the orchestra for the

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

KOENEN'S VOICE FINE;, SELECTIONS UNHAPPY

Not Adapted To Display The Versatility Of The Singer's Powers, And Success Of Concert Impaired By This Fact.

Conductor Fiedler presented the following numbers last evening at the Lyric on the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra second concert, Miss Tilly Koenen taking the place of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was detained by illness:

Schumann—Symphony No. 2, C major, Op. 61.
I. Sostenuto assai: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio I. and Trio II.
III. Adagio espressivo.
IV. Allegro molto vivace.
J. S. Bach—Aria from St. Matthew's Passian Music, "Erbarme dich."
Handel—Concerto for oboe and string orchestra. (First time at these concerts.)
I. Grave.
II. Allegro.
III. Sarabande.
IV. Alegro.
Heinrich van Eyken—"Judith's Song of Victory." (First time in Baltimore.)
Tschaikowsky—Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," Op. 71A.
Ouverture miniature.
Danses caracteristiques: (a) Marche; (b) Danse de la Fee Dragee; (c) Trepak, Danse russe; (d) Danse arabe; (c) Danse chinoise; (f) Danse des mirlitons.
Valse des fleurs.

Could Be Enhanced.

Schumann's initial invention was so fertile and his individuality was so clearly defined in his themes, as well as in his treatment of them, that he created a distinct period in music's evolution; still, many lesser composers have far excelled him in adapting music to orchestral expression. Schumann's discrimination in writing for the piano or for voice was impeccable, but his sense for instrumental ensemble was neither inventive nor finely conventional. Were any of the orchestral virtuosi to reinstrument the C major symphony, which was played last evening, its effectiveness would be materially enhanced. The first movement of this symphony emphasizes Schumann's orchestral poverty, and it is strangely labored and disjointed for the work of one of the world's greatest musical creators. The second movement is one of the most irresistible scherzi existent. In it Schumann gives vent to spontaneous exuberance and liveliness. It was exquisitely played. The "adagio expressivo" is a wonderful lyric, which could have come from no heart but Schumann's. The full, inherent intensity of this number failed to materialize with Mr. Fiedler's unemotional beat. There must necessarily be fluctuations in rapidity of pulsations in following the ebb and flow of impassioned expression. The finale is noble and is wonderfully adapted to bring the symphony, with its varying moods, to a rounded and satisfactory close.

Artist In Fine Voice.

Miss Koenen has a fine voice—is indeed in every respect an artist, but her selections were not adapted to display the versatility of her powers. The Bach aria, as wonderful as it is, is better suited to an ecclesiastical function than it is to a symphony concert. It is extremely difficult, and appeals only to hearers in a more or less devout mood. "Judith's Song of Victory" is better adapted to every-day receptivity, but it was not over infectious.

Mr. Longy manipulates the difficult oboe as if to the manner born, and the length of time which sometimes elapsed between his breaths induced a stifling sensation in observers. Mr. Longy produces a genuine oboe tone from his instrument, and is undaunted when confronted by difficulties. He is one of the few great players of this tricky pipe, which is better capable of shining in the orchestra than as a solo instrument, for it produces no variety of tone color.

Scenes Painted In Tones.

Peter Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite" is a most fascinating collection of fairy scenes, painted in tones. The absolutely distinctive character of each number, the terse completeness which pervades, and the ingenious, almost unique, employment of the orchestra, make this opus 71A one of the clearest manifestations of broad-winged genius which we have in music. From the beginning of the overture to the end of the "Valse des fleurs," material things are not once suggested. It is a series of fancy pictures in miniature, which only develop more beauty if microscopically scanned. Each picture is an effortless characterization, without one false or one superfluous line; and the coloring always adds wonderfully to the fitness of the thematic texture. The suite was beautifully played.

In spite of the character of her selections, Miss Koenen aroused insistent enthusiasm. She will soon be heard at the Peabody, and will doubtless on that occasion give herself ample opportunities to show her high artistry.

O. B. B.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SECOND CONCERT

Great Audience Applauds Conductor Fielder and the Two Soloists.

Last night's crowd at the second concert of the Boston Symphony filled the beautiful hall and rose to rare heights of enthusiasm in spite of the absence of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is ill with tonsilitis. Miss Tilly Koenen took the madame's place on short notice and won a triumph. The following was the program:

Schumann—
Symphony No. 2, C major, Op. 61.
Handel—
Concerto for oboe and string orchestra. First time.
Tschaikowsky—
Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," Op. 71-A.

Miss Koenen sang the following two strong numbers with orchestral accompaniment—aria from St. Matthew's Passion music, "Erbarme dich" (J. S. Bach); Judith's Song of Victory, (Heinrich van Eyken). That she was thoroughly successful was shown by the many recalls she received after the aria and the song.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2 is less popular than the others, and, therefore, not often heard in this city. Hence its performance is educational. The Bach aria, "Enbarme Dich," is one of the noblest and was given in its own fine style, proving at once the ability of the artist, who is well equipped for her work in every respect.

Her other aria was very dramatic, and may be thought of in connection with the celebrated picture, "Judith with the Head of Holofernes." It is a song of intense triumph, and Miss Koener gave it in its true spirit. She was recalled five times. five times.

The oboe concerto played by Mr. George Longy was another educational number brought to the present from Handel's time, when such concertos were oftener heard on this rare solo instument. Mr. Longy was heartily recalled several times.

The concert closed with a rare selection by the greatly lamented Tschaikowsky. It was the gem of the evening and the audience applauded to the echo.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

In Boston encores are not allowed at the Symphony Orchestra concerts. They lengthen the concerts so that commuters who live in the outskirts of the Hub are unable to catch the last car.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERT

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 12. The symphony will be the now famous work by Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. The soloist will be Mischa Elman. He will play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.

WORLD
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 1 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, Jan. 2. The Symphony will be the now famous work by Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. This is the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years and is especially interesting as being the work of the greatest of English musicians.

The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season here. He will play Beethoven Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. The other orchestral number will be the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

[80]

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN-1 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 12. The symphony will be the now famous work by Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. This is the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years, and is especially interesting as being the work of the greatest of English musicians. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season here. He will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. The other orchestral number will be the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

AMERICAN
ess BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 2 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 12. The symphony will be the now famous work by Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. This is the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years and is especially interesting as being the work of the greatest of English musicians. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season here. He will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. The other orchestral number will be the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

SUN
ess BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 2 - 1910

Boston Symphony Next Week.

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert at the Lyric Treatre Wednesday evening, January 12. The symphony will be the now famous work of Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. This is the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years and is especially interesting as being the work of the greatest of English musicians. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season here. He will play Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra. The other orchestral number will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
JAN 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A program of more than ordinary interest and importance will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 12. The symphony will be the now famous work by Sir Edward Elgar, which will be heard for the first time in Baltimore. This is the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season here. He will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. The other orchestral number will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
JAN 9

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, January 12, Baltimore will hear for the first time Elgar's Symphony in E flat. Sir Edward Elgar (for he has been knighted by the King) enjoys the unique reputation of being the only English composer of our time whose works march with the works of the greater composers of the Continent. In fact, it is not too much to say that he is the largest figure English music has had since Handel ruled the musical world of Great Britain with a firm hand in the eighteenth century, and Handel was a German. The symphony was performed for the first time in Manchester, England, on December 3, 1908, under the conductorship of Hans Rechter. London heard it for the first time on December 7 of the same year; New York on January 3, and Boston on February 26 of the following year (1909).

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 8 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theatre on next Wednesday evening, January 12, Baltimore will hear for the first time Elgar's Symtphony in E flat.

Sir Edward Elgar (for he has been knighted by the King) enjoys the unique reputation of being the only English composer of our time whose works macrh with the works of the greater composers of the Continent.

In fact, it is not too much to say that he is the largest figure England must have had since Handel ruled the musical world of Great Britain with a firm hand in the eighteenth century, and Handel was a German. The symphony was performed for the first time in Manchester, England, on December 3, 1908, under the conductorship of Hans Rechter. London heard it for the first time on December 7 of the same year; New York on January 3 and Boston on February 26 of the following year—1909.

The symphony when first played in England was hailed as a masterpiece. It has been played time and again in England and always with success. It has been received with great pleaure in Germany, and its success in the United States was far more than one of curiosity.

Quoting an anlysis of the symphony published in the Musical Times, of London, in December, 1908:

"Now that the symphony is before us the first fact that strikes us is its likeness to the classical model. It is in four movements: 1. Andante nobilmente e semplice—Allegro; 2. Allegro molto; 3. Adagio; 4. Lento-Allegro.

The first is substantially in what is known as 'first movement' form, with certain important modifications; the second is practically a Scherzo in all but name; the third is a serene slow movement in a binary form without development, and with an important Coda; while the fourth, after a slow introduction, breaks into a swinging theme, the principal one of a rondo movement.

The composer has denied that the symphony illustrates any particular story or phase of life; its purpose, however, is greater than can be contained in a programme of words. It is written out of a full life experience, and is meant to include the innumerable phases of joy and sorrow, struggle and conquest, and especially the contrast between the ideal and the actual in life.

The symphony is dedicated to Hans Richter. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who on this occasion make his reentry into the musical life of Baltimore. His debut here last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the sensations of the season, as it was everywhere that the young man played. This year, instead of the Echaikowsky concerto, he will play the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—that by Beethoven in D Major opus 61. The finale number will be the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan & Isolde."

m NEWS
dress Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY WEDNESDAY

Third Concert Will Be Given At The Lyric—Elman Will Be Soloist.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening Baltimore will hear for the first time Elgar's Symphony in A-flat major. Sir Edward Elgar enjoys the unique reputation of being the only English composer of our time whose works march with the works of the greater composers of the Continent.

The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who on this occasion makes his re-entry into the musical life of Baltimore. His debut here last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the sensations of the season, as it everywhere that the young man played. This year instead of the Tschaikowsky concerto he will play the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—that by Beethoven in D major, opus 61. The final number will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
ldress
te JAN 12 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT, LYRIC THEATER

Tonight brings at the Lyric Theater the third Boston Symphony concert with Mischa Elman as soloist. Elman will play Beethoven's great concerto. Interest in the concert, however, will be centered on the symphony by Sir Edward Elgar, which proved to be one of the sensations of last year in music. The other number will be the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

[81]

n SUN
ress Baltimore, M
JAN 9

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Third Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday evening Baltimoreans will hear for the first time Elgar's Symphony in E flat. Sir Edward Elgar (for he has been knighted by the King) enjoys the unique reputation of being the only English composer of this time whose works march with the works of the greater composers of the Continent.

The fame which had come to Elgar through his essays in oratorio form, notably his "Gerontius" and his "The Apostles," as well as the success that attended his works in purely orchestral forms, made his symphony more eagerly awaited than any work that has been produced for many years, with the possible exception of Strauss' operas "Salome" and "Elektra."

The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his re-entry into the musical life of Baltimore. He made his debut here last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This year instead of the Tschaikowsky concerto he will play the greatest of all works for violin and Orchestra, that by Beethoven in D major, opus 61. The final number will be the prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

n AMERICAN STAR
ress Baltimore, Md.
e JAN 9 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday at the Lyric Theater will be given the third Boston symphony concert, with Mischa Elman as soloist. Elman will play Beethoven's great concerto. Interest in the concert, however, will be centered on the symphony by Sir Edward Elgar, which proved to be one of the sensations of last year in music. The other number will be the prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

n NEWS
ress Baltimore, Md.
e

SOLOIST AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCER

MISCHA ELMAN

Mischa Elman, who made a big impression on the music-loving population of Baltimore when he appeared here last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the next concert of that organization at the Lyric on Wednesday. He will play Beethoven's concerto in D major, opus 61.

om AMERICAN
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight brings to the Lyric Theater the third Boston Smyphony concert, with Mischa Elman as soloist. Elman will play Beethoven's great concerto. Interest in the concert, however, will be centered on the symphony by Sir Edward Elgar, which proved to be one of the sensations of last year in music. The other numbers will be the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

rom AMERICAN STAR
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate JAN 13 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT AT THE LYRIC

Orchestra Entertains Large Audience Assisted By Mischa Elman, Violinist.

Before an audience which taxed the capacity of the Lyric to the utmost, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its third concert of the present season. Mischa Elman, the youthful violinist, was the soloist.

Elgar—
Symphony in A-flat major, Op. 55.
I. Andante nobilmente e semplice —Allegro.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Lento—Allegro.

Beethoven—
Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, Op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.

Wagner—
Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The first work presented by the orchestra was the symphony in A flat major, by Edward Elgar, an English composer, who is now living at Malvern, England. Much has been expected of the composition, which had its first reading in this city last night at the hands of Herr Max Fiedler, and a very spirited and intelligent reading it was. But the work itself proved to be a disappointment. It is extremely technical and complex, and lacks unity and coherence, mainly for the reason that liberties have been taken with the classic form of the symphony, and in the confusion resulting the musical thought is overshadowed. The absence of a consistent theme was felt throughout the entire work. At one place in the second movement a genuinely beautiful theme appeared, but it was not consistently developed, and was soon lost in a technical maze. In the sum total of its effect, the symphony gave an impression of incoherence.

The second number, the Beethoven concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, proved to be a complete triumph for young Mischa Elman, an artist destined both because of his marvelous technique and his soulful expression to become one of the first violinists of the present day. He played the difficult work with an assurance which clearly evinced him to be at all times master of the most difficult passages of the composition, while his expressive reading sounded all the depths of the noble composition, The audience applauded him to the echo, refusing to let him go for fully five minutes after the last note had died away. The young virtuoso was forced to respond to more than a dozen encores, and the audience even continued to applaud for some moments after the orchestra had made ready to give the third number.

The third and last number was the well-known prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, and served as a perfect contrast to the first number. The distinguishing mark of the work is its concreteness and unity of structure. There are no loose ends and irrelevant fragments in the composition. Every bar has its own meaning and relation in the thought, making it perhaps the most enjoyable number on the program.

NEWS
ess Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony In E Flat To Be Given At The Lyric.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight is of more than ordinary interest from the fact that Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony in E flat will have its first hearing in this city.

Elgar is now considered among the foremost modern composers, and the introduction of his symphony to local musical circles is a matter of no small significance. It is said to be a very beautiful work and has aroused enthusiasm wherever it has been played. Elgar was knighted by the present King of England.

The soloist of the evening will be Mischa Elman, the extraordinary boy violinist, who made his debut here last winter with the same organization, playing at the time the Tschaikowsky concerto. He made a favorable impression both from the solid quality of his technic and the surprising maturity of his interpretative powers.

Tonight he will be heard in the great Beethoven concerto for violin and orchestra, Op. 61, and much curiosity has been expressed as to how he will handle the number, which is considered the greatest of all works of its class.

The final number of the program will be the "Prelude" and "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"—two of the most familiar numbers from the great music drama.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PRESS ... BALTIMORE, MD.

JAN 13 1910

ELMAN AN INSPIRATION

Mischa Elman appeared as the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric last night. The house was crowded; the audience expectant when it arrived, absorbed while there and in a flutter of delighted satisfaction as it left.

Elman was an inspiration. He believes so thoroughly in himself; believes so thoroughly in the music he attempts that the meaning is forced on the listner quite regardless of whether there is a desire to understand or not. Elman is young, and the enthusiasm of youth, the sheer delight in his own successful work is evident not only in the tones which he produces, but also in all the physical movements used in the production of those tones. In handling a passage of majestic grandure his head goes up, his eyes seek the ceiling, his instrument is elevated to a sharp angle. As he passes to something more on the common plane of life the violin gradually sinks again to the level position, the head comes down with it, the eyes wander over the audience. When it reaches a point where the musical inspiration is made almost entirely subservient to an exhibition of mere virtuosityq the violin is dropped to a decided downward angle, his head is loweerd and all attention seems concentrated on the exact execution of the work at hand. Thus Elman manages to give his audience, not only a poem in sound, but a poem in movement as well. That this is not an affectation is proved by the entire lack of all exaggeration and the utmost unity between the movement and the tones. Any attempt at a technical critcism of the young artist would be worse than useless, for the very simple reason that, all points considered, he is acknowledged to be the greatest exponent of the violin now before the public. Further than this he has a reputation of taking liberties with the works he performs that have hardly been dared before, which really prevents any intelligent comparison. Whether he does this in a spirit of half satire to puzzle the critics, or whether because he believes that such should be the real meaning, has never been settled.

The dampness in the atmosphere last evening was not conducive to brilliancy in tone from any of the stringed instruments, and while it seemed to irritate Elma, it apparently offered no handicap.

The opening symphony of the evening was a new one to the local musical world, the "A flat major, Op 55," by Elgar. This number had been eagerly waited for in Baltimore, and in no way proved a disappointment. Its first presentation in England caused a tremendous furor. It was excessively popular for some time and then it became more of a contemplative study. This, it seems, will be the reverse of its fate in Baltimore. It was received with a contemplative attention last evening. It will be studied hereafter, will probably cause much enthusiasm the next time it is heard and end in becoming a great triumph. That the thought and soul is there cannot be gainsaid even after the first hearing. It is supposed to represent life, to be a sort of tone picture of the "seven ages of man."

"I can't get it, he is wandering helplessly, he is arriving at no conclusion," was a hushed comment last night after the second movement.

If one considers the length of time that the average man wanders helplessly in life, arriving at no conclusion, getting no where this comment can be nothing less than a great compliment to the composer, showing just how clearly he made his meaning prain. Certainly in the following movements, after the human soul tipified, found itself discovered its own capabilities and its mission there is no more hesitancy or wandering. It closes in triumph.

As is always the case with Conductor Max Fiedler his control and handling of the vast orchestra was the acme of leadership.

The program follows:

Symphony A flat major, Op 55....Elgar
Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, Op. 61.....Beethover
Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES IN CONCERT

Mischa Elman Rises To Supreme Test And Removes Any Doubts As To Excellence—Orchestra Is Admirably Conducted By Mr. Fiedler.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Lyric, with Mischa Elman as soloist, Mr. Fiedler presented an exceptionally satisfying program. It follows:

Elgar.....Symphony in A-flat major, Op. 55
I. Andante nobilmente e semplice—Allegro.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Lento—Allegro.
Beethoven....Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
Wagner.....Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Elgar is a remarkably resourceful composer. He writes for voices with refined masterfulness, and mixes orchestral colors with fine sense and seemingly exhaustless invention. Elgar is, however, not a true symphonic creator, for his diction is more kaleidoscopic than it is logically sustained. He announces attractive themes, and then instead of developing them to full fruition he flits onward, always euphonious and usually delicious, but not logically sequential. This lack of continuity was more apparent in the first movement of the symphony—when it would naturally be most felt—than it was in the succeeding parts. Let us, however, be thankful that we have an Anglo-Saxon composer who, in spite of his exceptional fertility of invention, is true to the principles of art. He is always sane and evidently esteems beauty at its true value.

This A-flat major symphony of Elgar is something of a conglomerate, for its themes and their treatment mirror the spirits and styles of a long series of musical periods—from Bach to Wagner, inclusive. He has not appropriated material, but those immortal products of past periods which the world reveres cast their shadows across some of his pages, veiling individuality. The symphony was beautifully presented.

Mischa Elman astounded Baltimore last year by his reading of the Tschaikowski Concerto, and some who were most enthusiastic in regard to that exhibition of high artistry feared that he would prove less convincing if called upon to interpret music which was more dignified and severe and less emotional than that of the great Russian.

Last evening's performance of the violinist's supreme test—the Beethoven Concerto—removed all doubts as to Elman's excellence. He is not a specialist but a broad artist with a comprehensive grasp. The Beethoven affords fewer opportunities for the display of tone than does the Tschaikowski, and it contains many awkward and thankless difficulties; but the young artist played it without any of the false intonations to which we are accustomed and with impressive reverence.

The Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" was most effectively read by Mr. Fiedler. Altogether the evening was memorable. O. B. B.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

BEGIN REHEARSING FOR NINTH SYMPHONY

Only Two Weeks For Oratorio Chorus To Practice.

With only two weeks in which to complete the mastery of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will be given at the Lyric on February 22 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Baltimore Oratorio Society, members of the chorus of the Society will tonight begin a series of rehearsals which will continue until the very day the great work is produced.

The ladies who constitute the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, which, like the Oratorio Society, is under the direction of Joseph Pache, have volunteered their aid for the special occasion and they will meet for a special rehearsal in the assembdy rooms of Harlem Park Methodist Episcopal Church at 4.15 o'clock Thursday afternoon, when the difficult parts of the choral scored for female voices will be tried out in connection with the female voices of the Oratorio Society. The members of the Philharmonic, 40 strong, are all accomplished musicians, most of them being well-known soloists, and their co-operation is expected to be of the greatest assistance in the preparation and the production of the Symphony.

On Thursday night at the Peabody Institute, where all the general practice meetings are held, there will be a full rehearsal, all the choirs taking part.

Director Fielder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Baltimore on Monday night, February 21, to superintend the rehearsal, and at 10.30 o'clock of the morning of February 22 there will be the first and only rehearsal with the Orchestra. Mr. Fielder has said that it will be absolutely necessary for every member of the chorus who is to be on the stage that evening to attend this rehearsal.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Preparing for the production of Beethoven's ninth symphony, which will be given at the Lyric on Washington's birthday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Oratorio Society, members of the chorus of the society will this week begin a series of extra rehearsals. The regular practice will be held in the Lyric tonight. On Thursday afternoon in the assembly rooms of Harlem Park Methodist Episcopal Church there will be a ladies' rehearsal. On this occasion the female choirs and the 40 members of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, of which Mrs. Charles Morton is president, will be drilled in their parts by Joseph Pache, director of both organizations, under whose leadership the work is being prepared.

On Thursday night there will be a mixed rehearsal at the Peabody Institute

[82]

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

ORATORIO MEMBERS REHEARSE TONIGHT

To Begin Preparatory Work On Production Of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Members of the Baltimore Oratorio Society begin today their work on Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which they will give with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on Washington's Birthday. A rehearsal will take place at the Peabody Institute. The ladies who constitute the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, of which Mr. Pache is likewise director, will assist.

American
Baltimore
FEB 13 19

Conductorship of Boston Symphony.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductors this year are Mr. Max Fielder, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Max Fielder Will Remain.

Boston, Mass., February 5.—[Special] Max Fielder will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the seasons of 1910-1911 and 1911-1912. The announcement disposes of the report that he was to conduct the Manchester, Eng., Symphony Orchestra next season.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.

Rehearsing For Ninth Symphony.

Under the direction of Mr. Joseph Pache members of the Oratorio Society will tonight begin extra rehearsals in final preparation of the choral part of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," which the society will give in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric February 22. The rehearsal tonight will be at the Peabody Institute and all the choirs will take part.

Thursday afternoon at 4.15 there will be a ladies' rehearsal in the assembly rooms of the Harlem Park Methodist Episcopal Church, which have been granted for the purpose by the trustees. At this meeting the female choirs of the society and the 40 members of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, which is assisting in the production, will be drilled in their parts.

On the evening of the same day at the Peabody there will be another mixed rehearsal, and all who are to sing in the symphony have been urged to be present. The orchestra rehearsal will take place at 10.30 o'clock on the morning of Washington's Birthday.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Conductorship of Orchestra.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra has issued a statement that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered, declares Manager C. A. Ellis.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 1 3 1910

BOY VIOLINIST COMING

Mischa Elman, the remarkable boy violinist, who made such an impression when he appeared here recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a recital at the Lyric Theater on Tuesday, March 8.

The event is one that is likely to attract a large number of lovers of fine music in this city, for Elman on his recent visit proved that he is one of the most unusual violinists appearing on the concert stage today.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Lyric Theater Tuesday evening, February 22, instead of the customary Wednesday. This change in day affects only this particular concert.

The concert assumes exceptional importance in that for the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore Beethoven's Monumental Ninth Symphony, with the choral movement at the end. For the last movement the services of the Baltimore Oratorio Society have been enlisted, and a quartet of singers of highest rank has been engaged. The quartet will comprise Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor; Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 1 3 1910

SOLOISTS NAMED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Artists Will Appear With Oratorio Society February 22.

The soloists for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will be given at the Lyric on Washington's Birthday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Baltimore Oratorio Society, have been announced, the list including Mme. Corrinne-Rider Kelsey, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto, Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass. Willy Hess, violinist, will also be one of the soloists of the evening, his number occupying another place on the program.

These artists are all well known in Baltimore. Mme. Rider-Kelsey has frequently sung here in concerts, her last appearance being last winter with the Oratorio Society, when she sang Delilah with great success in Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." Miss Spencer was the contralto soloist at the first appearance of the Society this season in "Israel in Egypt," creating a very favorable impression, and both Mr. Beddoe and Mr. Cunningham have sung here time and again on various occasions.

Of all violin virtuosi Willy Hess, concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of the most popular in Baltimore. He has not appeared with the organization as soloist for several seasons, although he was heard here early this year at the debut of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, the new musical organization which, like the Oratorio Society, is under the direction of Joseph Pache. At the coming concert Mr. Hess will play the big Mendelssohn concerto.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 18 1910

SPECIAL REHEARSAL FOR MALE CHOIRS

Oratorical Society Decides On Extra Practice For Ninth Symphony.

After a consultation of the leaders of the Oratorio Society, which is at present head over ears in the work of preparing for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to be presented with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday night, it has been decided that a special rehearsal for the male choirs will be held at the East Hall of the Peabody Institute on Saturday night.

Not that the men are in a weak or wabbly condition, vocally speaking, it was explained, but the special rehearsal is called to give an opportunity for an extra practice spiel to those who have been unable to get to all the rehearsals.

Director Pache is more than anxious, and so are all his singers, for that matter, that there should not be a solitary rough spot in the choral work when Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rehearses the chorus on Monday night. Mr. Fiedler will come to Baltimore for this especial purpose, and on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock at the Lyric the first and only rehearsal with the orchestra will take place. It has been announced that there will be positively no visitors admitted to this rehearsal.

The demand for seats for the concert is almost unprecedented, it is said, and the house is already nearly sold out. Besides the symphony, the orchestra will play Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Orchestra, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

Despite the pouring weather last night there was a full attendance of members of the Oratorio Chorus at the extra rehearsal, and their work in the colossal choral showed splendid finish and the results of careful drilling. It is being freely predicted that the coming occasion will go down in the musical annals of Baltimore as one of the most important and successful events ever given by a local body.

ITEM

PHILADELPHIA

NOV 27

Mr. Bantock's charming symphony, "The Pierrot of the Minute," which has recently performed in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is founded on the exquisite little dramatic poem of the same name written by the talented Ernest Dowson. This charming poem, which interprete so perfectly the best spirit of the French eighteenth century, is attaining considerable notoriety at present among music lovers. It is shortly to be read to the accompaniment of string and vocal music at the opening reception of the American playgoers. The text of the poem is included in "The Poems of Ernest Dowson," published by John Lane Company and is illustrated by drawings by Aubroy Beardsley.

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 27 1909

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and George Longy, the leading oboe player of the orchestra. The former will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy is to play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, and the orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischuts," Brahm's Second Symphony, in D-major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[illegible]

28 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Brahms' Second Symphony in D major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[illegible] PHILADELPHIA, PA

NOV 28 1909

Paderewski's symphony, which had its first performance in Boston last winter and was played in various cities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the East and in Chicago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in the West, had its first performance in London on Monday, November 8, at Queen's Hall. The orchestra was the London Symphony Orchestra and the conductor was Hans Richter. Reports that have been received show that the symphony excited admiration of the connoisseurs of London as it had already done in America. Paderewski himself was soloist, playing the "Emperor" concerto, by Beethoven.

♣ ♣ ♣

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA

NOV 28

Madame Olga Samaroff, who recently played with much success here as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, is this month to play twice with the Boston Symphony at its regular concerts in Boston, when she will again play the Rubenstein concerto, and she has also volunteered her services as one of the soloists at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when she will play the Schumann concerto. In December, she is to play with the Pittsburg and Chicago Orchestras, in addition to a large number of recitals.

♣ ♣ ♣

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the Viteilia recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahms' second symphony in D major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

♣ ♣ ♣

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date DEC 4 - 1909

With two soloists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy—the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, Mr. Fiedler having arranged for this occasion a very attractive program. The Great German contralto will be heard in two numbers, the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, 'Sapho." Mr. Longy, who is regarded as the most famous member of the Boston Orchestra's wood-wind section, being the principal oboe player, is to make his first appearance in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. Mr. Lingy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. After filling several important positions with some of the leading orchestras of Europe, he came to this country. In 1898 he joined the Boston Symphony, a year later founding the Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States. Monday night's program, in addition to the solo features, will have the following orchestral numbers: Overture to "Der Freisohutz," Weber; Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, Brahms; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

From TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the Orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the Orchestra here, and she will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" Recitative and Aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great Aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section which probably cannot be matched for beauty of tone, for musicianship and for technique by any orchestra in the world. The most noted member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, and after a distinguished career in his native land, became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later founded the Longy Club of wood instruments which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Brahmas' Symphony No. 2 in D. Major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[93]

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 5 - 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here, and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers, the "Vitellia" Recitative and Aria from Mozart's opera "Titus," and the great Aria from Gounod's opera "Sapho."

The program in full is as follows:

1. Weber,
   Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
2. Brahm's, Symphony No. 2 in D major. Op. 73
3. Mozart,
   Recitative and Aria "Vitellia," from "Titus"
4. Handel,
   Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra
5. Gounod.....Stances de Sapho"
6. Wagner.....Overture to the opera "Rienzi"

Soloists—Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Georges Longy.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 5 - 1909

Boston Symphony Concert.

Still another concert will add to the activities of the orchestra's busy week. This will be the third one of the University's series in Weightman Hall, to be given tomorow night. The program will be:

Camille Saint-Saëns—"Phaeton," Symphonic Poem, Op. [illegible] in C major.
Ludwig Van Beethoven—Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92.
Tedeschi—"Batuglia Spagnuola."
Edmund Schuecker—Mazurka, No. 1.
Joseph Schuecker.
Richard Wagner—Vorspiel, "Meistersinger."

The Boston Symphony will give its second concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. The concert will present a novelty in offering two soloists. These will be Madame Schumann-Heink, the contralto, and Georges Longy, the orchestra's remarkable oboe player, one of the world's masters of his difficult instrument.

Mr. Longy was born in Abbeyville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet.

In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe, and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart, teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique, he re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera.

Mr. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later he founded the Longy Club of Wood Instruments, which is the most noted organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The program in full is:

Weber.Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
Brahms..Symphony No. 2 in D majpor, Op. 73
Mozart
Recitative and Aria "Vitellia," from "Titus"
Handel..Concerto for oboe and string orchestra
Gounod.....Stances de Sapho"
Wagner.....Overture to the opera "Rienzi"

Hess-Schroeder Quartet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date DEC 5

Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his remarkable programmes for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" Recitative and aria from Mozart's opera "Titus" and the great aria from Gounod's opera "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section, which probably cannot be matched for beauty of tone, for musicianship and for technique by any orchestra in the world. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of five, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The program in full is as follows:—

1. Weber,
   Overture to the opera, "Der Freischuts"
2. Brahms. Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
3. Mozart,
   Recitative and aria, "Vitellia" from "Titus"
4. Handel,
   Concerto for oboe and string orchestra
5. Gounod—.....Stances de Sapho"
6. Wagner.....Overture to the opera, "Rienzi"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BEGGS

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 5 -

Max Fiedler has arranged a fine program for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here. She will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet. In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart (teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique, Longy re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898 and a year later he founded the famous Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The program in full is as follows:

1. Weber—Overture, "Der Freischuetz."
2. Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date DEC 5 - 1909

Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his remarkable programmes for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here, and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet. In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart (teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique) he re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera. Mr. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later he founded the Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Wagner's overture, "Der Freischuetz," Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
"Vitellia" from "Titus" ..... Mozart
Recitative and aria.
Concerto ..... Handel
For oboe and string orchestra.
"Stances de Sapho" ..... Gounod
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 18 1910

SPECIAL REHEARSAL FOR MALE CHOIRS

Oratorical Society Decides On Extra Practice For Ninth Symphony.

After a consultation of the leaders of the Oratorio Society, which is at present head over ears in the work of preparing for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to be presented with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday night, it has been decided that a special rehearsal for the male choirs will be held at the East Hall of the Peabody Institute on Saturday night.

Not that the men are in a weak or wabbly condition, vocally speaking, it was explained, but the special rehearsal is called to give an opportunity for an extra practice spiel to those who have been unable to get to all the rehearsals.

Director Pache is more than anxious, and so are all his singers, for that matter, that there should not be a solitary rough spot in the choral work when Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rehearses the chorus on Monday night. Mr. Fiedler will come to Baltimore for this especial purpose, and on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock at the Lyric the first and only rehearsal with the orchestra will take place. It has been announced that there will be positively no visitors admitted to this rehearsal.

The demand for seats for the concert is almost unprecedented, it is said, and the house is already nearly sold out. Besides the symphony, the orchestra will play Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Orchestra, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

Despite the pouring weather last night there was a full attendance of members of the Oratorio Chorus at the extra rehearsal, and their work in the colossal choral showed splendid finish and the results of careful drilling. It is being freely predicted that the coming occasion will go down in the musical annals of Baltimore as one of the most important and successful events ever given by a local body.

ITEM

PHILADELPHIA PA

NOV 27

Mr. Bantock's charming symphony, "The Pierrot of the Minute," which has recently performed in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is founded on the exquisite little dramatic poem of the same name written by the talented Ernest Dowson. This charming poem, which interprete so perfectly the best spirit of the French eighteenth century, is attaining considerable notoriety at present among music lovers. It is shortly to be read to the accompaniment of string and vocal music at the opening reception of the American playgoers. The text of the poem is included in "The Poems of Ernest Dowson," published by John Lane Company and is illustrated by drawings by Aubroy Beardsley.

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 27 1909

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and George Longy, the leading oboe player of the orchestra. The former will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy is to play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, and the orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischuts," Brahm's Second Symphony, in D-major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Brahms' Second Symphony in D major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

om

ldress

ate

Paderewski's symphony, which had its first performance in Boston last winter and was played in various cities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the East and in Chicago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in the West, had its first performance in London on Monday, November 8, at Queen's Hall. The orchestra was the London Symphony Orchestra and the conductor was Hans Richter. Reports that have been received show that the symphony excited admiration of the connoisseurs of London as it had already done in America. Paderewski himself was soloist, playing the "Emperor" concerto, by Beethoven.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Madame Olga Samaroff, who recently played with much success here as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, is this month to play twice with the Boston Symphony at its regular concerts in Boston, when she will again play the Rubenstein concerto, and she has also volunteered her services as one of the soloists at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when she will play the Schumann concerto. In December, she is to play with the Pittsburg and Chicago Orchestras, in addition to a large number of recitals.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the Viteilia recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahms' second symphony in D major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

With two soloists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy—the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, Mr. Fiedler having arranged for this occasion a very attractive program. The Great German contralto will be heard in two numbers, the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, 'Sapho." Mr. Longy, who is regarded as the most famous member of the Boston Orchestra's wood-wind section, being the principal oboe player, is to make his first appearance in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. Mr. Lingy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. After filling several important positions with some of the leading orchestras of Europe, he came to this country. In 1898 he joined the Boston Symphony, a year later founding the Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States. Monday night's program, in addition to the solo features, will have the following orchestral numbers: Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, Brahms; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

om TELEGRAPH

ldress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the Orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the Orchestra here, and she will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" Recitative and Aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great Aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section which probably cannot be matched for beauty of tone, for musicianship and for technique by any orchestra in the world. The most noted member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, and after a distinguished career in his native land, became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later founded the Longy Club of wood instruments which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Brahmas' Symphony No. 2 in D Major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[83]

NOV 28 1909

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Still another concert will add to the activities of the orchestra's busy week. This will be the third one of the University's series in Weightman Hall, to be given tomorow night. The program will be:

Camille Saint-Saens—"Phaeton," Symphonic Poem, Op. 39, in C Major.
Ludwig Van Beethoven—Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92.
Tedeschi—"Paruaglia Spagnuola."
Edmund Schuecker—Mazurka, No. 1.
Joseph Wieniawski—Polonaise.
Richard Wagner—Vorspiel, "Meistersinger."

The Boston Symphony will give its second concert of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. The concert will present a novelty in offering two soloists. These will be Madame Schumann-Heink, the contralto, and Georges Longy, the orchestra's remarkable oboe player, one of the world's masters of his difficult instrument.

Mr. Longy was born in Abbeyville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet.

In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe, and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart, teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique, he re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera.

Mr. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later he founded the Longy Club of Wood Instruments, which is the most noted organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The program in full is:

Weber..Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
Brahms..Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
Mozart
Recitative and Aria "Vitellia," from "Titus"
Handel..Concerto for oboe and string orchestra
Gounod......"Stances de Sapho"
Wagner.....Overture to the opera "Rienzi"

~~Hess-Schroeder Quartet.~~

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DEC 5 - 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here, and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers, the "Vitellia" Recitative and Aria from Mozart's opera "Titus," and the great Aria from Gounod's opera "Sapho."

The program in full is as follows:

1. Weber,
Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
2. Brahm's, Symphony No. 2 in D major. Op. 73
3. Mozart,
Recitative and Aria "Vitellia," from "Titus"
4. Handel,
Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra
5. Gounod....."Stances de Sapho"
6. Wagner.....Overture to the opera "Rienzi"

Soloists—Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Georges Longy.

m lress

e

Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his remarkable programs for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" Recitative and aria from Mozart's opera "Titus" and the great aria from Gounod's opera "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section, which probably cannot be matched for beauty of tone, for musicianship and for technique by any orchestra in the world. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of five, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The program in full is as follows:—

1. Weber,
Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz"
2. Brahms. Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
3. Mozart,
Recitative and aria, "Vitellia" from "Titus"
4. Handel,
Concerto for oboe and string orchestra
5. Gounod—....."Stances de Sapho"
6. Wagner.....Overture to the opera, "Rienzi"

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Max Fiedler has arranged a fine program for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years since the great German contralto has been heard with the Orchestra here. She will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet. In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart (teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique, Longy re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898 and a year later he founded the famous Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The program in full is as follows:

1. Weber—Overture, "Der Freischutz."
2. Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his remarkable programmes for the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Contrary to the usual custom of the orchestra, there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy. It is several years now since the great German contralto has been heard with the orchestra here, and her presence will be welcomed warmly. She will sing two numbers—the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and the great aria from Gounod's opera, "Sapho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its wood-wind section. The most famous member of this section is Georges Longy, the first oboe, who is to appear for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Longy is a Frenchman, having been born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. He began the study of music at the age of 5, taking up the violin, piano and oboe, the latter instrument being his special study. In 1882 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying harmony under Taudou and the oboe under Gillet. In 1886 he won the first prize for the oboe and the same year was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and the next year he was chosen first oboe soloist of the Colonne Orchestra. With the assistance of his intimate and esteemed friend, Prosper Mimart (teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique) he re-established in 1895 the Society of Chamber Music for Wood Instruments, which had been dissolved when Taffanel had been appointed as conductor at the Paris Grand Opera. Mr. Longy resigned these positions when he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898, and a year later he founded the Longy Club of wood instruments, which is the most famous organization of its kind in the United States.

The strictly orchestral numbers will be Wagner's overture, "Der Freischuetz," Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
"Vitellia" from "Titus" ..... Mozart
Recitative and aria.
Concerto ..... Handel
For oboe and string orchestra.
"Stances de Sapho" ..... Gounod
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 7 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Second of Local Series Has Novelty of Two Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the second concert of this year's schedule for Philadelphia, last night at the Academy of Music, covered itself, as it usually does, with glory and honor. The disappointment occasioned by Madame Schumann-Heink's inability to appear owing to illness was so admirably allayed by the excellence of Miss Margaret Keyes' singing, that even this unexpected departure from the programme failed to constitute the proverbial fly in the ointment or mar the very evident and genuine enjoyment of the large audience present. From the opening note of the first number to the closing bar of the last such unvarying superiority in every respect was preserved that not one word of criticism, in the usual acceptation of that term implying some measure of fault-finding, can be said; only the highest commendation and unqualified praise can be bestowed on the work of the orchestra, which played throughout with that finish that comes only of long years of association and corporate practice. A musically untrained but highly appreciative person present put it rather neatly when he spoke of "the sand-papered precision" of execution. Every member of the Symphony seemed stirred up to do the best that was in him; they played with positive inspiration.

In the overture to "Der Freischutz" the even crescendos with their organ-like firmness and solidity and the smoothness and delicacy of shading did credit to Mr. Fiedler's capabilities as a conductor. The movement could not have been better played. The wonderful bell-like clearness of tone of the strings, especially of the 'cellos, was wondrously beautiful, while the absolutely uniform bowing was as fascinating to the eye as was the tone to the ear. The brasses were never in the least blatant, but always refined. They were not, however, in any way lacking in power nor volume and always conveyed a pleasing sense of reserve strength.

The stormy enthusiasm evoked by the Brahms Symphony in D major proved conclusively that musical appreciation in America has increased since that most estimable composition was characterized at its first rendition as "perplexing and cryptic." The second movement is especially striking, where for a time the 'cellos carry the melody in some passages strongly suggestive of parts of Bach's aria for the G string. The adagietto, with its graceful minuet-like passages, where the bowed violins and the wood-wind—and how superb the Boston Symphony's wood-wind is!—sing the tune against the pizzicato accompaniment of the 'cellos and basses, gave universal delight.

The Handel Concerto for oboe and strings was a departure from the usual make-up of programmes and a complete revelation to many. The effect of all four movements was exhilarating. The radiant beauty of it all made one listen with bated breath. There is no complexity of style in the composition of this concerto, but the downright positiveness and virility of conception, its substantiality, combined with simplicity and a grace both courtly and tender, hold the listener spellbound. M. Longy brings a wonderful purity and smoothness of tone from his instrument; his masterly performance has won for him a large place in the affections of Philadelphia's music-lovers. The vogue of the oboe as a solo instrument bids fair to increase. May we not hope to hear an occasional oboe solo at our own orchestra concerts?

Miss Keyes acquitted herself with distinction under very trying circumstances. On very short notice she came from New York and filled Madame Schumann-Heink's place on the programme. Her voice is most pleasing, of a full, rich quality, and her tone production and technique proved her a skilled artist.

The "Rienzi" overture, with its massive and reposeful strains, calmed the mind held somewhat in suspense by the preceding numbers, observing that true principle of art never to leave the listener or spectator in a state of uncertain expectancy. It made an eminently fitting ending to an artistically arranged and rendered programme.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

THE MUSICAL SEASON

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Philadelphia yesterday and gave a concert at the Academy of Music last evening, which was an unalloyed delight. Brahm's second symphony in D major, op. 73, was the chief feature of the program, and the interpretation of that lovely work, in its clarity and eloquence and balance, in the admirable manner in which the inner voices of the complicated score were exhibited, and the sanity and sincerity with which the significance of the whole composition was expressed, and its poetic and spiritual message delivered, was one of extraordinary interest and value.

There was no attempt on the part of the conductor to exploit himself by any originality of reading or exaggerations of expression. He was content to communicate and elucidate the conceptions of the composer, and that was indeed enough. Other orchestral numbers were the "Oberon" and "Rienzi" overtures, which, as may be supposed, were both beautifully played. There were two assisting artists. M. Georges Lougy, who was heard in an exquisite performance of a concerto by Handel for Oboe and string orchestra, and Mrs. Margaret Keyes, who appeared in the place of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was indisposed. Mrs. Keyes made a very favorable impression. Her numbers were the "O, donfatal," from Verdi's opera of "Don Carlos," and songs by Brahms, Strauss and Higo Wolf. The audience was large and very friendly, and after the symphony the applause was so prolonged that the conductor had the musicians rise and bow their acknowledgments.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 7 - 1909

OBOE PLAYER THE STAR IN FIEDLER CONCERT

George Longy Appears as Soloist in Concerto by Haendel.

SCHUMANN-HEINK ILL

Margaret Keys Appears on Short Notice in Creditable Substitution.

By H. T. Craven

GEORGE LONGY the oboe player who has for many seasons been contributing materially to the perfection of the wood winds of the Boston Orchestra, assumed a role of stellar prominence in a concert that presented several unusual features, given by Herr Fiedler's symphony organization last evening in the Academy of Music. He was the virtuoso in an uncommon sort of concerto by Haendel, scored for strings and oboe.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was also to have been a soloist of the occasion. Illness, however, prevented her appearance, and her place was taken on very short notice by Margaret Keys, a New York contralto, who proved an entirely creditable substitute. She added her share to the general novelty of the entertainment by singing with excellent vocal quality, but not a great deal of tonal volume, an aria from one of Verdi's most obscure operas, his "Don Carlos," a work written in the rather unfortunate transition period between "Un Ballo in Maschera" and "Aida." She also interpreted a group of lieder by Wolf, Strauss and Brahms.

The oboe concerto was more of a curiosity than anything else. It contains some graceful chamber music, skilfully written for the oboe's resources, but served best to reveal to the public, in propria persona, just who has been instrumental in making the wood winds of the Boston Orchestra give forth such marvels of tonal beauty. The "sarabande" movement best exhibited M. Longy's technical mastery of the instrument.

Thanks should be accorded Max Fiedler in presenting the first Brahms symphony of the season. The composition was the No. 2, in D major, a work of gracious Mozartian loveliness, written with the contrapuntal mastery and extraordinary touches of subtlety, typical of Brahms, in his best manner.

The charming adagietto movement displayed the proficiency of the orchestra in the handling of delicate effects, while the finale was read by Herr Fiedler in a mood of captivating gaiety and high spirits. Throughout the performance a crystal clarity of interpretation prevailed, that is an absolute essential in offering a Brahms symphony.

The overture to "Der Fruschuetz," in which the horns were rather surprisingly a shade ragged, opened the concert, while Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, admirably given, was selected as a finale.

GOOD ATTRACTIONS
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the third time this season at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, January 10, with Mischa Elman, the violinist, as soloist. The program will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica;" Brahms's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA.
JAN 2 - 1910

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist, Elman then making his first appearance this season. The management of the Boston Symphony made arrangements last year by which Elman should have no less than twelve consecutive appearances with the orchestra this month, and he plays nowhere else until he has finished with the Boston Symphony.

The program will comprise Beethoven's Symphony "Eroica," Brahms' concerto for violin and orchestra and Duka's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

* * *

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA, PA

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Schumann-Heink Unable to Be Present Because of Illness.

The safe arrival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after many trials en route from Boston, and the organization's appearance at the Academy of Music last night, were fully appreciated by the large audience assembled, many of whom were prepared for a disappointment, owing to the rumor of wreck of the orchestra's train. The disappointment, however, was not in the non-appearance of the Orchestra, but of Madame Schumann-Heink, who was unable to appear owing to illness at short notice Margaret Keyes, of New York, took the famous contralto's place, singing an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos" and a group of songs from Strauss, Wolff and Brahms. The popular overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" was the opening number, followed by Bramms' much-discussed Symphony No. 2, in D major. While there must always be a division of opinion on the relative merit of Brahms symphonic works, there can be no two opinions on the excellency of Max Fiedler's interpretation. The remarkable clearness and incisiveness of his readings in general, would naturally prepare one for a scholarly interpretation of Brahms, who is at once so intricate, subtle and elusive. Under the capable and artistic leadership of Fiedler the symphony was revealed in all its wonderful beauty, and with perfection of directness and simplicity. At the close he was recalled five times, and he finally invited his superb orchestra to share the ovation.

What was a distinct novelty was the Handel Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. The peculiar, plaintive quality of the oboe makes the music evolved from it of a particularly appealing character. While the old-fashioned airs from Handel were admirably suited to that style of instrumentation, Longy, the soloist, is a most distinguished and capable artist and was warmly applauded.

Miss Keyes was given a reception which put her at once at ease. Her voice is of very fine quality, splendid range and is sufficiently powerful to fill the Academy with melodious sound. Her earnestness of manner and fine interppretative qualities won her instant recognition, and, while Schumann-Heink was missed by her many admirers, her place was admirably filled.

The concert concluded with a splendid interpretation of Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

EVENING BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Night's Brilliant Concert at the Academy of Music.

Notwithstanding the disappointment which awaited last night's audience at the Academy of Music, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was to have been one of the soloists, being unable to appear, there was ample compensation in the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its second concert of the season, the appearance as soloist of Georges Longy, the principal oboe player of the orchestra, and the substitution of Margaret Keyes, an excellent contralto, of New York, for the famous German singer.

The program was opened with the "Der Freischutz" prelude of Weber, which the orchestra played with splendid richness of tone and perfect precision, the many instruments uniting as one in a manner that seemed to give the famous overture new beauty. The horns sang with rare mellow sweetness of tone the solemn opening tune, to which have been set the words of a familiar hymn, and the violins led the way with shimmering radiance to a grandly impressive finale. This was followed by Brahms's second symphony, in D. major, Op. 73, that serene and sympathetic composition which seems almost to have sounded something new in the way of symphonic music. It is not deeply complex, after the manner of many of its kind, but is imbued with a beauty that seldom is clouded with mystery or overburdened with perplexing intricacies of harmonization. It has, on the whole, a directness, a simplicity, and an appealing melodiousness of charm that gives enjoyment even to the casual listener who boasts of no real comprehension of what is known as "classical music." This second symphony of Brahms, in direct contrast to his first, comes into the open and reflects the sunshine of life, with comparatively little of its gloom, the most radiant of the four movements being the third, adagietto grazioso, and the allegro con spirito finale. It was rendered so superbly that the audience would not cease applauding until Mr. Fiedler, after several times bowing his acknowledgments, signaled all the musicians to rise and do likewise.

In place of Mme. Schumann-Heink, whose illness precluded her appearance, Margaret Keyes was rushed over from New York to supply the vocal deficiency. This she did with marked success, considering the disappointment which she was expected to appease, and it was vastly to her credit that she made her listeners quite happy and content. Miss Keyes's voice is a contralto of good range, fair volume, and of a freshness and rich sympathetic quality of tone that makes it unusually pleasing. She sang feelingly and in an artistic manner the dramatic aria, "I che se fai," from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and, for her second number, a group of songs by Wolfe, Strauss and Brahms. The other solo feature was in the way of a novelty, as the unobtrusive voice of the modest oboe seldom is heard alone. It has not the power of the clarinet, nor the birdlike quality and flexibility of the flute, but it sounds the plaintive note of the shepherd's pipe and in its reedy sweetness of tone touches a responsive chord of sympathy, especially when played by such a master as Mr. Longy. His playing of Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra was rarely dexterous and artistic. The last number was the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," brilliantly closing a concert which, even with its disappointment, was one to be put down as memorable. The Boston Orchestra will play again on Monday evening, January 10, with Misha Elman, the violinist, as assisting artist.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC.
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 7 - 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Handel's Oboe Concerto Played by Georges Longy.

PROGRAMME.

1. Weber: Overture to "Der Freischuetz."
2. Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major.
3. Aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos."
   Miss Margaret Keyes.
4. Handel: Concerto for oboe and string orchestra.
   Mr. Georges Longy.
5. Songs of Wolff, Strauss and Brahms.
   Miss Margaret Keyes.
6. Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

There was a disappointment for the large audience that assembled to hear the Boston Orchestra at the Academy last night, in the fact that owing to illness Madame Schumann-Heink, who was to have sung two airs from Mozart's "Titus," was unable to appear. The orchestra, despite the vicissitudes of the journey from Boston—for the train was held up by a freight wreck—was in fine fettle, and the quality of its performance was not impaired by the contretemps. After the symphony, it was announced to the delight of the audience that Miss Margaret Keyes, of New York, would take Madame Schumann-Heink's place on the programme.

First performed at Berlin more than fourscore years ago, the "Freischuetz" overture, which even then was "vehemently encored," has not yet lost its perennial charm. Some laborious statistician has counted "measure for measure" through Weber's famous work, and finds 219 of the 342 measures of the overture utilized in the opera itself, and yet the critic Mees is quoted as saying—and the less discerning listener will agree—that Weber's overture, far from being a kaleidoscopic series of tunes, is absolutely symmetrical in form.

That great master of orchestration, Berlioz, found words insufficient to voice his admiration of Weber's use of the clarinet to produce the effect of melancholy and foreboding, and he concluded a long dithyramb on the subject of this overture with "O Weber!" Nothing in the superlative interpretation by Conductor Fiedler and his company of players was more impressive than the three or four enormous chords in the concluding measures, which were like the full, triumphant voice of the organ with the 16-foot diapason.

In the Brahms symphony one had peculiarly the sense of a single instrument playing: the performance of the several subdivisions of the orchestra was always contributory to the general effect, never to the emphasis of individual excellence.

The work, when first performed in Boston 30 years ago, according to Philip Hale, was found "perplexing and cryptic," but it is hard today to see how such a delightful bit of pastoral naivete as the "Adagietto" could have furrowed the brows of the Athenians of 1879. Some of these naissance-de-siecle Frenchmen are much more difficult to listen to. Of course, one reason why this symphony, once coldly received even in Leipsic, was so agreeable even to the musical layman last night was that the orchestra scarcely recognized technical difficulties, the first violins sliding smoothly over the most formidable obstacles, the brasses marching undauntedly through devious and intricate passages.

The oboe concerto was a decided novelty. Few of the audience had even heard of hearing an oboe player as solo virtuoso. The orginal title of the work was "Concerto for oboe with accompaniment of two violins, viola, violoncello or double bass." Mr. Longy handled the reed last night as flexibly as though the instrument were a violin. It was impossible almost to tell where he paused to take breath; his prolonged notes were of flawless purity, like the sustained tones of a singer, and in his runs he pirouetted nimbly over the keys of what Grove styles "by far the most elaborate and complicated of wind instruments." Indeed, a glance at the apparently erratic distribution of the keys along the tube is enough to convince any one that Grove is correct. The slow "sarabande" was of appealing pathos.

Miss Keyes's contribution to the musical refection offered was the more appreciated, in view of the haste of her summons; it was brave of her to appear practically without notice. She sang extremely well, betrayed no nervousness, whatever may have been her sense of an ordeal, and was recalled again and again after her numbers. The "Rienzi" overture was the concluding number of the programme—the snare drum with its prodigious reveille, and the horns with their reiterated clarion-peals, were particularly to be commended.

Fiedler's direction of the whole performance, as usual, was that of masterful musical field general, gifted with constructive imagination.

[84]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 2 - 1910

In the New York Tribune H. E. Krehbiel scores D'Indy in the following manner:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert for this season in Carnegie Hall last night. Mme. Olga Samaroff came to lend the charm of her presence and her playing to the occasion, and was particularly welcome because, with Schumann's pianoforte concerto she did much to remove the painful impression left by D'Indy's symphony in B flat which opened the concert, and which, though played with amazing brilliancy, and with all the devotion and sympathy which inspire in a devotee of the modern French master, sounded largely like an apotheosis of tonal higgledy-piggledy. Why should a music-flooded public be asked to listen to so many keys at once?"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 2 -

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist, Elman then making his first appearance this season. The management of the Boston Symphony made arrangements last year by which Elman should have no less than twelve consecutive appearances with the orchestra this month and he plays nowhere else until he has finished with the Boston Symphony. The program will comprise Beethoven's Symphony "Eroica," Brahms' concerto for violin and orchestra and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

As the Duke in "Rigoletto."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN - 1910

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of the season here in the Academy of Music on the evening of January 10. Mischa Elman, the young violinist, will be the soloist. He will play the Brahms concert.

The rest of the program will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

A musical event of particular interest will be the appearance of Gustav Mahler, formerly director of the German operas in the Metropolitan Company, at the head of the New York Philharmonic Society in a concert to be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of January 17.

The program is of special attractiveness. It will comprise Richard Strauss' symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." Mr. Mahler used to direct both these last works for the Metropolitan.

Preparations for the production of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci" by the Philadelphia Opera Society in the Academy of Music are nearly completed. The popular double bill will be offered on the evening of January 26. S. Beherns will direct the orchestra, A. W. Newman the ballet, while the stage direction has been intrusted again to Edward S. Grant, who put on the first production of the society. There will be a chorus of 200, a ballet of thirty-two and an orchestra of sixty.

These are the casts for the operas:

"CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA."

Santuzza.....Miss Nancis E. France
Lola.....Mrs. Lola Chalfont Parker
Mamma Lucia.....Miss Rebecca Conway
Turridu.....George Dundas
Alfio.....Lewis Kreidler

"I PAGLIACCI."

Nedda.....Mrs. Harriette Woods Bawden
Canio.....Paul Volkmann
Tonio.....Dr. S. H. Lipschutz
Silvio.....Horace R. Hood
Beppo.....Edward Shippen Van Leer

The People's Choral Union will present Haydn's "The Creation" in the Academy of Music on the evening of January 27. Selden Miller will be the conductor. The soloists will be Florence Hinkle, soprano; Nicholas Doty, tenor, and Tom Daniel, bass.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date JAN - 1910

Violin Solo: Thaddeus Rich.
5. Franz Liszt.....Rakoczy March
6. N. Rimsky-Korsakow. Spanish Caprice, op. 34

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist, Elman then making his first appearance this season. The management of the Boston Symphony made arrangements last year by which Elman should have no less than 12 consecutive appearances with the orchestra this month, and he plays nowhere else until he has finished with the Boston Symphony.

The programme will comprise Beethoven's Symphony "Eroica," Brahms's Concerto for violin and orchestra, and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 2

The third Boston symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist, Elman then making his first appearance this season. The management of the Boston Symphony made arrangements last year by which Elman should have no less than twelve consecutive appearances with the Orchestra this month, and he plays nowhere else until he has finished with the Boston Symphony. The program will comprise Beethoven's Symphony "Eroica," Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

* * *

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 5-

MERGER OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLANNED

Consolidation of Leading Organizations of Country is Contemplated.

DAMROSCH LEADS MOVE

Special Dispatch to The North American.

NEW YORK, Jan. 4.

Following fast upon the heels of rumors of an operatic merger comes the still better authenticated report of an effort to consolidate the orchestral enterprises in America, with a view to advancing the financial and artistic interests of all the symphony organizations throughout the country.

The initiative in the matter has been taken by Walter Damrosch, the director of the New York Symphony Orchestra. At a dinner held at his home here on Monday evening there were present representative directors of all the leading symphony orchestras of the United States. The Philadelphia Orchestra was represented by one of its most influential managers. There were delegates also from the Chicago, Boston and Pittsburg Orchestras.

The plan, as said to have been suggested at this informal first meeting, is nothing less than a mutually beneficial arrangement whereby a certain territory and a certain sphere of activity will be confined and restricted to each important symphonic organization of America. Thus under the scheme as tentatively broached the Boston Symphony will very probably be excluded from Philadelphia, leaving the field to Mr. Pohlig's men, who may also be accorded special privileges in Baltimore and Wilmington.

Mr. Stock's Chicago Orchestra will very probably be given a monopoly of the western territory. Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, and Gustav Mahler and the Philharmonic Society may acquire certain rights in New York city.

The Boston Symphony will hold sway particularly in New England, although it is extremely unlikely that its highly profitable New York visits will be abandoned. The plan as put forward is simply an indication that the musical activities of America have now reached a stage where some systemizing is necessary. The various "booking" systems of the theatrical world have long regulated the supply of entertainment throughout the country. Musical enterprises have been developing independently with scarcely enough regard for a division of territory and interests such as might prove of immense benefit from both the financial and artistic viewpoints.

The first step in this new and important move has been taken by Mr. Damrosch, who is about completing his quarter century as orchestral and operatic director. It is more than likely that a definite working agreement in the matter will be reached before many weeks have passed.

From EVE. BULLETIN
Address Philadelphia, Pa
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Academy of Music for the third time this season next Monday evening, offering an interesting program, with Mischa Elman, the distinguished young Russian violinist, whose appearances last year were among the important musical events, as soloist. The orchestra's numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Dukeas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," while Elman is to be heard in Brahm's Contesto for Violin and Orchestra.

rk,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 6 - 1910

ORCHESTRA NOT IN COMBINATION

Proposed Merger and Division of Territory Not Likely to Affect Phila. Symphony

PLAN PURELY COMMERCIAL

The Philadelphia Orchestra, not being a purely commercial enterprise as its contemporaries of other cities, is not likely to be affected by the proposed merger. This merger is in reality an apportionment of territory by the principal symphony orchestras of the country. It came up at a dinner gien in New York by Walter Damrosch last Monday night.

Charles A. Braun, an active member of the Executive Committee of the Philadelphia Orchestra doesn't believe the merger will have any local effect.

Mr. Braun stated that he believed that if the proposed merger were actually put through it would affect only the orchestras of New York, Boston and the Western cities, which are purely commercial enterprises and which do so great an amount of touring as to make the apportionment of terriory a matter of importance. The Philadelphia Orchestra plays only at a few nearby cities and then only by request, with transportation expenses guaranteed.

Mr. Braun stated that the matter had never been before the Board of Directors or the Executive Committee, and that it was news to him. Andrew Wheeler, secretary of the Philadelphia Orchestra attended the Damrosch dinner, and his presence led to the report that the local organization was included in the apportionment plans. Mr. Braun pointed out that without the sanction akghth gt dbobine F..,EEtfifu-g of the Board of Directors, Mr. Wheeler could hardly have attended in his official capacity.

Mr. Wheeler himself refused to confirm or deny any part of the report, including the rumor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be barred from this city.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 8 - 191

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music Monday evening will mark the local readvent of Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist. Last year he made his first appearance in Philadelphia with the orchestra, playing a Tschaikowsky concerto, and this year he will use as the medium for his reappearance Brahm's Concerto in D major. This is a work with which he won high praise in New York last year and those who heard him in the Tschaikowsky number will get a better idea of his art by hearing him play a work so radically different from that of the great Russian. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the other number on the programme Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
Philadelphia, P
JAN 9 - 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to-morrow night, will mark the reappearance of Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist. This remarkable violinist returned to America two weeks ago. Last year he made his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Orchestra playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto, and this year he will play

MISCHA ELMAN.

Brahm's Concerto in D Major. This is a work with which he won the highest praise in New York last year. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the other number will be Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

* * *

On Wednesday evening, in the Academy of Music, the Fortnightly Club will give a concert under direction of Maurits Leefson, with the assistance of Laura Combs, soprano, and Marie Nichols, violinists. The program is as follows:

1. Awakening of the Woods.....Haug
2. (a) Briar Rose.....Debois
   (b) Farewell Faint Heart.....Brahms
3. Ode of Music.....Lachner
4. Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
5. (a) If with all those endearing young charms, Arranged for soprana solo and Male Chorus by Maurits Leefson.
   (b) Love's Reminder.....DeBois
6. Young Robin.....Hegar

* * *

m PRESS
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
te JAN

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening, January 10, will mark the reappearance of Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist. This remarkable violinist returned to America two weeks ago. Last year he made his first appearance in Philadelphia with the orchestra, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto, and this year he will use as a vehicle for his reappearance Brahms' Concerto in D Major. This is a work with which he won the highest sort of praise in New York last year when he played it with the Boston Symphony, and those who heard him play the Tschaikowsky will get a better idea of his great art by hearing him play a work so radically different from that of the great Russian. The symphony will be Beethovan's 'Eroica,'' and the other number will be Dukas' Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

m INQUIRER

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third concert of the Bostom Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, January 10, will mark the reappearance of Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist. This remarkable violinist returned to America two weeks ago. Last year he made his first appearance in Philadelphia with the orchestra, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto, and this year he will use as a vehicle for his reappearance Brahm's Concerto in D major. This is a work with which he won the highest sort of praise in New York last year, when he played it with the Boston Symphony, and those who heard him play the Tschaikowsky will get a better idea of his great art by hearing him play a work so radically different from that of the great Russian.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the other number will be Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 8 - 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, January 10, will mark the reappearance of Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist. This remarkable violinist returned to America two weeks ago. Last year he made his first appearance in Philadelphia with the orchestra, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto, and this year he will use as a vehicle for his reappearance Brahms's concerto in D major. This is a work with which he won the highest commendation in New York last year when he played it with the Boston Symphony, and those who heard him play the Tschaikowsky concerto will get a better idea of his great art by hearing him play a work so radically different from that of the great Russian.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and the other number will be Dukes's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

n

ress

ELMAN HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mischa Elman, the young violinist, appeared at the Academy of Music last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the combination drew one of the largest orchestra audiences of the season. Almost every seat was taken.

Elman was announced to play the concerto in D minor, opus 77, of Brahms, but, instead, played the widely different concerto in A minor by Dvorak. Although Mr. Elman shows wonderful technique, and was vigorously applauded, there is much lacking in his playing to make him a great violinist.

The orchestra played Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, under Max Fiedler's splendid leadership, who stole some of Toscanini's thunder by conducting without a score. The program concluded with Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo.

EVE. BULLETIN

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of the Season, With Elman as Soloist.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last night, proved a great personal triumph for Misha Elman, the soloist of the evening.

Elman only recently returned from Europe, and his appearance last night was his first in Philadelphia during the present season. He was announced to play the Brahms concerto in D Major, for violin and orchestra, which was written for the great Joachim, but instead gave Dvorak's concerto in A-minor. His clarity of expression and mellow tones, combined with his well nigh faultless style, won the admiration of the large audience. He showed improvement over his playing of last year and very evidently employed his time to advantage while in Europe. His coloring is richer and more mature, yet not one whit of the almost "boyish" enthusiasm which has always marked his playing, was lacking.

At the close of the Dvorak number, which was the only one he played during the evening, the audience gave him an ovation, the effect of which was sadly marred, however, by the "encore fiends," who insisted, even after Elman had responded to eighteen calls and had bowed his thanks, in striving to force him to play still more.

Aside from Elman, the concert was notable for the magnificent rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The work, whose dimensions are well nigh appalling to any except the most highly trained organizations, was interpreted by Mr. Fiedler and his forces with a breadth and depth of meaning seldom heard on the American concert stage. This was particularly true of the funeral march, which was given with a solemnity and dignity, yet with a beauty of rythm, that precluded dolefulness. The tripping measures of the scherzo were played with delightful contrast effects, the strings, under Willy Hess, the concertmaster, singing the song of the trio in exquisite style.

Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe), closed the program. The work is fully as fantastic in its structure as the "Witches' Sunday," by Berlioz, and even more chromatic. It revels in prismatic effects, now racing, only to halt; now leaping with abandon, only to die away with a suddenness positively startling.

It afforded the orchestra plenty of latitude for a display of its powers—a fact duly appreciated and used to its fullest

om INQUIRER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Concert Drew a Big Crowd to the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of one of the largest audiences that has assembled there this winter. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was the chief number on the program and this familiar music was performed under Mr. Max Fiedler's direction in a manner that was safe, sane and sober without being particularly noteworthy or deeply impressive. Mr. Mischa Elman was the assisting artist. He had been announced to play Brahms' noble concerto in D minor, Op. 77, but instead of that he actually did play the widely different concerto in A minor by Dvorak. Although it contains something of that melodic beauty which is never absent from the Bohemian composer's productions, this is rather a tawdry and meretricious piece of work when judged by the standards which he himself has established, and Mr. Elman played it in a manner very well befitting its contents.

He is a great executant, but he has not yet come in sight of being a great artist and he betrays a growing proclivity to ad capandum effects that is enough to make the judicious grieve. Those qualities of dignity, of distinction, of high intelligence and of repose by which the very finest violin playing is and must be marked have not yet been brought within the scope of his achievement and while there can be no denying the brilliancy of his technique, perhaps it is just as well that he made the substitution which has been mentioned. One would prefer to hear Brahms through the instrumentality of a somewhat more intellectual interpreter. It is, however, only fair to say that Mr. Elman was enthusiastically applauded.

The concert closed with a spirited rendering of Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo, in which the virtuosity of the orchestra was effectively exhibited.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1

ess

RETURN OF ELMAN

Young Violinist Has Triumph in Boston Symphony Concert.

The Academy of Music was the centre of musical activity last night. The appearance of the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, as soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attracted an audience that in numbers and enthusiasm equalled that which made the reception of this young man last season so unique.

The Beethoven Symphony which opened the program, was listened to with interest and appreciation. This work, through the interpretations given it by the Philadelphia Orchestra, has become one of the favorite symphonic offerings. Max Fiedler's reading of the "Eroica" is classic in the extreme. The contrast between the "Marcia Funehe" and the sparkling "Scherzo" was wonderfully impressive. The playing of the orchestra in the final movement was so superb that the resulting applause was only stilled by the men rising to bow.

The appearance of Elman was the opportunity for his admirers to extend to him a reception that was curtailed in extent only by the desire to hear again the sound of his violin. The Brahms' Concerto, which had been announced, was withdrawn and the Dvorak, in A minor was substituted. This was probably due to the fact that Elman played the Brahms' Concerto on his appearance last season with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Elman's playing remains the peculiar, startlingly strong and original type that enslaved the public last year. Technically it would be idle to enter into any attempt at analysis or discription. His genius is so portential he must remain a law unto himself. His personality is so attractive, strong and, at times, almost weird, that it invests everything he does with more or less of a mysterious glamor. Fiedler's art in accompanying was never more noticeable. Every note of Elman's violin was distinctly audible. It soared above the orchestra like a marvelous human voice.

The pandemonium which reigned at the close of the concerto appproached a storm. Elman appeared until he was probably exhausted from bowing, and yet the audience refused to stop the insistent applause.

The program concluded with an orchestral Scherzo, by Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which met with instant favor.

RECORD

Philadelphia, J

ess

MUSIC NOTES

—Mischa Elman was the magnet which made a record for financial success for the recent tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Elman played nine concerts with the orchestra while en tour, and the young Russian was greeted by a capacity audience on every occasion. New York was a notable success, there being more than 300 "standees" at each of the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. Elman is to return to Philadelphia for a recital in the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon, Feb

om NORTH AMERICAN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS AT THE ACADEMY

Phenomenon Disarms Criticism by Emotion in His Art.

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Enthusiasm Aroused by the Performer's Youth, Not by His Skill.

MISCHA ELMAN, the reigning musical "wunderkind" of last season, made his first appearance here this winter at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening in the Academy of Music.

A year has wrought few changes in the art of this extraordinary and youthful prodigy. Young Mr. Elman's art is of the romantic emotional quality that is sometimes likely to disarm the calmest criticism. Granted the unusual perfection of his technique, there is a lyric and rhapsodic element in his playing that captivates and charms even the most stolid listener.

An impassioned Slavic eloquence is its keynote; and this was frequently sounded last evening in his interpretation of Dvorak A minor concerto, substituted for the Brahms concerto, originally announced. It was a most ingratiating performance.

Full adult stature, however, the art of Mr. Elman has naturally not attained, and comparisons of his achievements with those of a Kreisler or an Ysaye indicate more a cordial enthusiasm for a musical phenomenon than a discriminating outlook on his real position in the art world. The subtle and fluent bowing, and the lyrical abandon that is so winning in his work, exercised, however, their usual charm.

The two strictly orchestral numbers were the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, read with a superb appreciation of its noble dignity and poetry by Conductor Fiedler, and Paul Dukas' unique and fantastic scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The former was directed by Mr. Fiedler, after the Toscanini fashion, without a score.

The concluding work by one of the most interesting of contemporary French composers is a deliciously appropriate musical setting of the quaint old legend, made into ballad form by Goethe, in which an inspiring young magician attempts to exercise some of the black art of his master and comes to grief in the experiment. The score is melodious and filled with original effects, especially in some passages for the bassoon, that harmonize completely with the spirit of the theme.

No opera audience of the year has been any larger than the one that heard young Mr. Elman and Mr. Fiedler's orchestra last evening.

om TELEGRAPH

ldress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

ELMAN'S READVENT

Young Violinist Solo Artist at Boston Symphony's Third Concert.

The mere announcement of Mischa Elman as soloist of the occasion, without regard to the excellence one always expects of the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would have been sufficient to attract a notable gathering of music-lovers to the Academy of Music last night for the third concert of the Philadelphia series. Three composers were represented on the programme; Beethoven by the Third Symphony in E flat major, the "Eroica," Dvorak by the Concerto in A minor for violin and orchestra (in place of the Brahms Concerto previously scheduled), and Dukas by a scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," founded on a ballad by Goethe.

The first two movements of the symphony were played with perhaps a little less inspiration than we are accustomed to look for in the Boston Symphony's renderings, but then, "even Homer nods," and one can scarcely expect an unvaried maintenance of the superlative degree. By the time the scherzo was reached the orchestra was fully up to its highest standard and conveyed in its playing the exaltation of genius. The superb quality of M. Longy's oboe tone pervaded the whole estimable wood-wind choir. The exquisite tone production and blending of the strings demand especial mention, too.

In the Dvorak Concerto Mr. Elman's wonderful playing was the great feature of the evening. Since his last appearance here the mellowing effect of time has added a certain poise that enhances the charm of his masterly execution. The appealing tenderness and marvellous purity of his tone, combined with its virile strength and his ability of interpretation, mark him as an artist of the highest rank. There is an entire absence of any offensive simian virtuosity in his execution. Dvorak's noble composition lent itself admirably to the display of his many excellences. The conclusion of the work was the signal for salvo on salvo of well-deserved applause. The amphitheatre was so overwhelmed with delight that it brought its feet into the demonstration, and Mr. Elman was recalled again and again and kept bowing until he must have felt like a veritable Chinese mandarin. Quite ignoring the orchestra's inexorable rule of "no encores," the enthusiasts aloft really became annoying, and thrice when Mr. Fiedler would have begun the Dukas number he was stayed. The Dukas scherzo is founded on an old legend that most of us probably know best as "The Lay of St. Dunstan" in the "Ingoldsby Legends." The antics of the unruly broom are most happily treated in a humorous vein. The composition was a pleasing contrast to the more serious numbers, and was ably interpreted by Mr. Fiedler, whose skilful conducting fully brought out its jocose side.

rom PUBLIC LEDGER

ddress Philadelphia,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman the Soloist in Dvorak Violin Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony, "Eroica" ..... Beethoven
Concerto, A minor, Op. 53 ..... Dvorak
For violin and Orchestra, Mischa Elman.
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"..Dukas

Long before the concert of the Boston Orchestra began at the Academy last night there were patient waiting lines of applicants for admission, and many of Elman's Russian compatriots were turned away from the stairway leading to the topmost gallery. According to the suggestion on the title page of the symphony when it was published a century ago the great work commemorative of Napoleon's glory was played at the beginning of the programme. It lasted an hour and never for a moment became wearisome. The choral quality of tone outpoured by the strings could only have been achievable by fine old Italian instruments; the refinement and purity of sound evoked were such as are rarely attained in the insufficient salaried orchestras of Europe. It is quite evident that the Boston violinists do not carry their "second best" instruments on their tours.

The second movement of the symphony —the funeral march—was an impressive revelation of Conductor Fiedler's scholarly understanding of musical dynamics; the climaxes were majestic without the overemphasis that might destroy the elegiac character of the movement. The first part of the scherzo was an exquisite sotto-voce utterance of the strings, upstarting suddenly into a full-blooded chant, involving all the instruments; the second horns, as usual, had "troubles of their own" in the difficult reiterated passage toward the close. The finale began with a whirlwind and concluded with a driving hailstorm, the double basses in a fine frenzy of activity.

In this movement the performance of the first flute was noteworthy, and here and throughout the evening the rich contralto quality of the oboe of M. Longy was deliciously in evidence. When the last strains died away the orchestra rose en masse in deference to the outspoken approbation of the audience.

Mischa Elman as usual had his hearers quite at the mercy of his precocious genius. The Dvorak concerto he played was substituted at the last moment for the Brahms Concerto in D major. It was much the same boyish and impetuous Elman that created a furore here last year in his appearances with the Boston orchestra and our own company of players; albeit the intervening year in his young life has somewhat sobered and chastened his art and brought him advantageous equipoise and maturity of manner without destroying his captivating spontaneity. No billiard player ever handled his cue more deftly than Elman manipulates his bow through the technical complexities of a concerto which, with its first two movements combined in one, is a feat merely to memorize, to say nothing of the performance.

The harmonics were as clear and brilliant as winter starlight, the double stops at the heel of the bow were delivered with the finished assurance of a player to whom his art has become second nature. There were fourteen recalls afterward, and a display of musical hooliganism on the part of a handful of persons in the upper galleries was narrowly averted by the good sense of the majority in refraining from further importunity against the sensible rule of no encores that is the tradition of these concerts.

The Dukas scherzo is intrinsically more interesting than the same composer's Symphony in C major, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra several weeks ago. In the work performed last night the composer has not been compelled to take himself so seriously, as one must who essays the larger musical forms. He has taken for his text a ballad of Goethe, based on a legend still older, in which a broom is magically endowed with human attributes, and "cuts up" outrageously until the return of the sorcerer, its master. The bassoon is the chief mischief maker, and last night the effect of the sub-cellary colloquy of the three bassoons was irresistibly humorous.

The Boston Orchestra will return on the evening of February 23, when Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will be the soloists.

[86]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ITEM
ess PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 27 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WANTS TOSCANINI

New York, Jan. 27.—It has been settled that Max Fiedler is to retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season, as he will be at the head of the Manchester orchestra [illegible] October.

In Manchester he will succeed Hans Richter. It has not yet been decided who will take Herr Fiedler's place as conductor of the Boston organization. It is rumored that the management has been trying to get Arturo Toscanini.

The Italian conductor is fond of conducting symphonic concerts, but so far has made no answer.

In case he is not selected it is regardedascertain that Carl Muck will be released to go back to Boston and become conductor of the orchestra for a term of years.

ITEM
om
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 30
te

It has been settled that the tedious and over-rated Max Fiedler is to retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season, as he will be at the head of the Manchester orchestra from next October.

In Manchester he will succeed Hans Richter. It has not yet been decided who will take Herr Fiedler's place as conductor of the Boston organization. It is rumored that the management has been trying to get Arturo Toscanini.

The Italian conductor is fond of conducting symphonic concerts, but so far has made no answer.

In case he is not selected it is regardedascertain that Carl Muck will be released to go back to Boston and become conductor of the orchestra for a term of years.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ITEM
ss PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 6

Philip Hale notes that at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston the saxophon solo in Bizet's Suite No. 1, taken from the music to "L'Arlesienne," was played by Mrs. R. J. Hall, not a member of the orchestra, but a woman of wealth and social position, who has devoted much time to an instrument described by some as ungrateful, and for some years has been the inspirer and supporter of a large orchestra in Boston that, under the direction of Mr. Longy, brought out many works by French composers. "Why," he asks, should there not be women in our leading orchestras, if they are proficient? There are women violinists in leading orchestras of Europe, as in Paris, for instance, in Colonne's."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ITEM
s PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 10

Philip Hale notes that at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston the saxophon solo in Bizet's Suite No. 1, taken from the music to "L'Arlesienne," was played by Mrs. R. J. Hall, not a member of the orchestra, but a woman of wealth and social position, who has devoted much time to an instrument described by some as ungrateful, and for some years has been the inspirer and supporter of a large orchestra in Boston that, under the direction of Mr. Longy, brought out many works by French composers. "Why," he asks, should there not be women in our leading orchestras, if they are proficient? There are women violinists in leading orchestras of Europe, as in Paris, for instance, in Colonne's."

EVENING BULLETIN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 12 1

Among the concerts to be given in the near future are a recital by Mirko Belinsky, violoncellist, formerly of the Philadelphia Orchestra, but now with the Boston Symphony, at the Bellevue-Stratford, Monday afternoon, February 28; the second concert of the season by the Mendelssohn Club, with Thaddeus Rich, violinist, as soloist, in the ball-room of the Bellevue-Stratford, Thursday evening, February 24, instead of the 23d, as announced; the meeting of the Manuscript Society, with an interesting program made up of numbers by Philadelphia composers, at the Orpheum Club rooms, Wednesday evening; a recital by Dr. Ludwig Wüllner, the celebrated German [illegible] and lieder singer, at Witherspoon Hall, Friday evening, February [illegible] string [illegible] day evening, February [illegible] of the Haydn [illegible] Hall on Fri[illegible]

EVENING BULLETIN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 12 1

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held on Wednesday evening, February 23, at the Academy of Music, instead of on Monday evening, as usual. There will be two soloists, Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet. These two are to play Brahms's Double Concerto for Violin and 'Cello, while the orchestral interest will centre in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the other numbers being Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel and His Merry Pranks."

From Address INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA PA
Date FEB 13 1910

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the positive announcement that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has been engaged for two years longer, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached or thought of.

1884

---

om INQUIRER
ddress PHILADELPHIA
FEB 13 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The attention of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts is once more called to the fact that the fourth concert in Philadelphia will be given on Wednesday evening, February 23, instead of the usual Monday evening. This change has been made necessary for this one concert by local conditions in Washington.

There will be two soloists, Mr. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the admired 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and of the Kneisel Quartet. These two will play a work rarely heard—Brahm's double concerto for violin and 'cello. The orchestral interest will centre in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was recently played in Boston under the direction of the composer with really sensational success.

The program begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and ends with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

RECORD
ess Philadelphia,
FEB 13 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Philadelphia will be given on Wednesday evening, February 23, instead of the usual Monday evening. This change has been made necessary for this one concert by local conditions in Washington. There will be two soloists, Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and of the Kneisel Quartet. These two will play a work rarely heard—Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and 'cello. The orchestral interest will centre in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was recently played in Boston under the direction of the composer with really sensational success. The program begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and ends with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

NORTH AMERICAN
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 13 1910

Director Fiedler is Re-engaged.

Putting an end to the report recently current that the Boston Symphony was contemplating engaging Arturo Toscanini, of the Metropolitan Opera House, as its new conductor, it is officially announced by the management that Max Fiedler, the present director, has been re-engaged for a term of two years. No other leader, save him and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, has been under consideration. The orchestra's next concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of February 23.

There will be two soloists, Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the cellist, formerly of the orchestra and of the Kneisel Quartet. These two will play a work rarely heard, Brahms' double concerto for violin and cello. The orchestral interest will center in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was recently played in Boston under the direction of the composer. The program begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and ends with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Henry Gurney, the Philadelphia tenor, recently studying abroad, will give a song recital in Griffith Hall on the evening of February 28. Mr. Gurney has been singing in grand opera in several of the Italian cities and in oratorio in England.

The third concert by the Hahn Quartet will be given at Griffith Hall on Friday evening, February 25. Following is the program:

Quartet ..... Tschaikowsky
Kayser Variations ..... Haydn
Four Bohemian Folk Songs ..... Suk
(By request)
Piano Quartet ..... Arthur Foote
(First public performance in Philadelphia.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 15 1910

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin.

No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

♣ ♣ ♣

INQUIRER
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 20 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An unusually interesting program has been arranged by Max Fiedler for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Wednesday evening, February 23. In this connection it is interesting to note again that Mr. Fiedler has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony for a period of two years, and the renewal of this engagement has been greeted with universal approval by the patrons of the orchestra.

The two unusual works on the program will be Brahm's double concerto for violin and violoncello and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The Brahms concerto will be played by Mr. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who for so many years was the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and for even more years the admired 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet. The work is seldom played, and its revival in Boston some weeks ago by these two artists created a great deal of interest.

The other numbers on the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Richard Strauss' scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks."

The M[illegible] Club

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa
Date FEB 20 1910

An unusually interesting programme has been arranged by Max Fiedler for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Wednesday evening, February 23, at 8:15. In this connection it is interesting to note again that Mr. Fiedler has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony for a period of two years and the renewal of this engagement has been greeted with universal approval by the patrons of the orchestra.

The two unusual works on the programme will be Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The Brahms concerto will be played by Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, who for so many years was the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and for even more years the admired 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet. The work is seldom played and its revival in Boston some weeks ago by these two artists created a great deal of interest.

---

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 20 1910
:e

It is probable that no visiting artist in several years made a more favorable impression in Philadelphia than Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who made his debut here in November with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later appeared as pianist and composer with the Philadelphia Orchestra. With the exception of his new concerto for the pianoforte, his symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," is the latest of his larger works. Under his direction it has been played in Boston, New York and Chicago, and everywhere it has enjoyed the most extraordinary success. It is one of a number of orchestral works which have had their inspiration in the dramatic and imaginative pictures of Arnold Pocklin, the greatest of Swiss painters of our time, and one of the most interesting figures in the art of the last century. The picture in question, the German title of which is "Toteninsel," is, on account of its many reproductions in photograph and photogravure, perhaps the most familiar of his works. In the midst of a still sea, in the evening light, stands a rocky islet, dark with funereal cypresses. Approaching it, vague and indistinct, is a skiff in which is a coffin and a ferryman, and standing in the stern a white-clad figure of a mourner. The picture is generally regarded as Bocklin's masterpiece, showing all sides of his genius to best advantage. That it would inspire music is not to be wondered at, for it is so filled itself with poetry and imagination. Rachmaninoff, while a modern, is not a modern in the sense of Strauss and Debussy. He is more a follower of Tschaikowsky and Liszt.

The other numbers on the programme will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Richard Strauss's scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The programme in full is as follows:

Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..Schubert
Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello ..... Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "The Isle of the Dead" ..... Rachmaninoff
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" ..... Richard Strauss

Soloists—Mr. Willy Hess, violin; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cello.

EVENING MAIL
s New York City.
DEC 4 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its second visit of the season this week. Thursday evening, in Carnegie hall, the first concert of the pair will be given. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto. The symphony will be D'Indy's No. 2 in D flat major, heard before in New York in 1905, under the direction of the composer, with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Saturday afternoon Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria 'Sextus" from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sappho." Georges Longy, the solo oboe, regarded as the leading player of oboe in the world, will play Handel's concert for oboe and string orchestra.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4, in F minor, the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" will open the programme, and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" will close it.

---

om EVENING POST
ddress New York City.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tchaikovsky's charming ballet suite "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired solo oboe of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride," and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

---

n GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
ress New York City.
e

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann piano concerto. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major No. 2, last heard here four years ago when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's ballet suite "Nut Cracker." Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme Schumann-Heink will sing recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," and Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestra works will be Smetana's overture "The Sold Bride," a Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

EVENING WORLD,
ess New York City.
e

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Olga Samaroff, pianist, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major, No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. The orchestral works will be Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

---

rom EVENING MAIL
ddress New York City.
Date DEC 7

Margaret Keyes, a talented young contralto of New York, replaced at a few moments' notice Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was too indisposed to fill her engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Philadelphia last night. Miss Keyes was notified at 4.30 and she caught a train in time to bring her to Philadelphia as the concert was about to begin.

[87]

EVENING SUN,

New York City.

ess ..... DEC 4 - 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays a second visit to New York next week.

Olga Samaroff is soloist at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening in Schumann's piano concerto in A minor. The symphony is Vincent d'Indy's, which the composer led here four years ago, and the third number is Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" ballet.

Samaroff also plays with the orchestra on Friday in Brooklyn.

Schumann-Heink at the Carnegie Hall Saturday matinée will sing Mozart's aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." George Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe, and the orchestral works will be Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" and Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony.

WORLD

ss ..... New York City.

DEC 5 - 1909

Boston Symphony Plans.

This week brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Dec. 9, and in the same place Saturday afternoon, Dec. 11. For the evening concert the orchestra will present as assisting artist, Madame Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto. The symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2 in B flat major. This work was last heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" Suite.

On Saturday afternoon there two assistant artists—Mad mann-Heink ... Mr. Georges solo oboe ... estra. Schumann ... th and Aria ... and Goun ... Longy w ...

...oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in ...minor. The other numbers on the ...cond programme will be Smetana's ...erture to "The Gold Bride" and the ...enzi" overture.

NEW YORK HERALD,

om .....

New York City. DEC 5 1909

ldress .....

For the third Boston symphony concert here this season next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, will be the soloist, playing Schumann's concerto. Mr. Fiedler will direct Mr. Vincent d'Indy's Second symphony, which was heard here two years ago under the composer's baton, and Tschaikowsky's dainty "Nutcracker" suite.

On Saturday afternoon when the Bostonians' fourth concert will be given, Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an air from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," and Mons. Georges Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra, will play a Handel concerto for oboe and will be accompanied by string orchestra. Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," make up the orchestral part of the concert.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

DEC 5 1909

MME. SAMAROFF TO BE HEARD THIS WEEK

She Will Be Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert—Busy Institute Week.

Mme. Samaroff will be in Brooklyn next Friday evening as the soloist at the second Boston Symphony Concert of the season at the Academy. The remaining concerts of the series of five are set for January 14, at which Mischa Elman, violin, will be the assisting artist; February 25, at which Willy Hess, violin, will be the soloist, and March 25.

NEW YORK PRESS,

om .....

New York City. DEC 5

dress .....

This week brings the season's second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann Concerto. Since Mme. Samaroff last appeared here as a soloist she has spent a year abroad, where she played with much success.

The symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2 in B flat major. This work was heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. Fiedler recently put it on a Boston programme, and its performance excited such genuine enthusiasm that he repeated it at this last week's concert in Boston. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's charming "Nut Cracker" suite.

On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria "Sesto," from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho."

One of the chief glories of the Boston Orchestra has always been its wood-wind choir, and in Mr. Longy the orchestra possesses an artist of extraordinary proficiency. Therefore, it will be more than interesting to hear Longy in Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

MEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

lress .....

e ..... DEC 5 - 1909

BOSTON MUSICIANS TO GIVE CONCERTS

Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday.

JOSEPH MALKIN TO APPEAR

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, and the third next Saturday afternoon in the same auditorium. For the evening concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto.

The symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2 in B flat major. This work was last heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. Mr. Fiedler recently put it on a Boston programme and its performance excited such genuine enthusiasm that he repeated it at last week's concert in Boston. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's charming "Nut Cracker" suite.

On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists—Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria "Sesto" from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho."

SUN

om .....

dress ..... New York City.

te ..... DEC 5 -

This week brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it will give a concert in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, December 9, and in the same place on next Saturday afternoon, December 11. For the evening concert the orchestra will present as assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto. Since Mme. Samaroff last appeared here as a soloist she has spent a year abroad, where she played a number of times with much success. The symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2 in B flat major. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's charming "Nutcracker" suite. On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. He will be heard in Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

SUN

New York City.

DEC 5 - 1909

Mrs. Taft at Symphony Concert.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon. With her were her sister, Mrs. Laughlin; Mrs. Hale and Mrs. McClintock. In the audience were Mrs. Sherman, wife of the Vice-President; Mrs. Ernst, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Hinckley and Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Irwin, wife of Commander Irwin; Baroness Preusohen, Baron Ambroxy and Mme. Jusserand.

From TRIBUNE

Address ..... New York City.

Date ..... DEC 5 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This week brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For the evening concert the orchestra will present as assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto.

The symphony on Thursday night will be D'Indy's No. 2, in B flat major. This work was last heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. Mr. Fiedler recently put it on a Boston programme, and its performance excited such genuine enthusiasm that he repeated it at last week's concert in Boston. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" suite.

On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria "Sextus," from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4. The following are the two programmes in their proper order:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9, AT 8:15.

Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, Op. 57...D'Indy
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor, Op 54.....Schumann
Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nut Cracker," Op. 71 A.....Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 11, AT 2:30.

Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride,".....Smetana
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.....Tschaikowsky
Recitative and aria "Sextus" from "Titus."....Mozart
Concerto for oboe and string orchestra...Handel
Stances de Sapho.....Gounod
Overture to the opera "Rienzi".....Wagner
Soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy.

TIMES

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will give a concert in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Dec. 9, and in the same place on ... afternoon, Dec. 11. For the evening concert the orchestra will present as assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto.

The symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2 in B flat major. This work was last heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" suite.

On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria "Sesto" from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor. The following are the two programmes in their propert order:

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 9, AT 8:15.

1. Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, Op. 57.. d'Indy
2. Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor, opus 54.....Schumann
3. Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nut Cracker," Op. 71 A .....Tschaikowsky

Soloist—Mme. Olga Samaroff.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 11, AT 2:30.

1. Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana
2. Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.. Tschaikowsky
3. Recitative and aria "Sextus," from "Titus".....Mozart
4. Concerto for oboe and string orchestra.. Handel
5. "Stances de Sapho".....Gounod
6. Overture to the opera "Rienzi"....Wagner

Soloists—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy.

From TRIBUNE

m .....

lress ..... New York City.

DEC 8 - 1909

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Dec. 7.—The Boston Symphony concert at the New National this afternoon filled the theatre with persons well known in society. Mrs. L. Z. Leiter had in her box Mrs. Oswald H. Ernst, Mrs. Grinnell, the Rev. Roland Cotton Smith, Miss Margaret Smith and Miss Kellogg, of Utica, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons had with them Mr. and Mrs. Francis M. Jenks, of Baltimore; Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer and James Morris Johnston. Others occupying boxes and seats were Baron Ambrozy, Mrs. James McMillan, Mrs. I. T. Mann, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. T. H. Aldrich, Mrs. Joseph Audenreid, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. William J. Boardman, Mrs. Frederick A. Keep, Mrs. David J. Brewer, Mrs. A. C. Barney, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Clover, Mrs. Allisan Cushman, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Richard F. Ely, Mrs. E. H. Gheen, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Thomas T. Gaff, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mrs. Truman H. Newberry, Miss Newberry, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and Miss Tuckerman.

Miss Laura Clifford Wells and Lieutenant Julian Parsons Wilcox, United States Marine Corps, were married at 4 o'clock this afternoon in the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church in the presence of several hundred invited guests. J. Clifford Rosengarten, of Philadelphia, cousin of the bride, gave her away. Miss Allita Emery, of Morristown, N. J., was maid of honor, and Miss Marion Leutze, Miss Henrietta Fitch, Miss Esther Denny and Miss Antoinette Heckscher, of New York, were bridesmaids. The bridegroom was attended

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address ..... New York City.

OLGA SAMAROFF, solo pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night.

[88]

EVENING POST

New York City.

DEC 10 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There was a time when French composers were noted for their rich vein of melody. Boieldieu, Auber, Thomas, Gounod, Bizet—what treasures of tunes their names recall! Even Berlioz gave the world some lovely melodies; but it was he, on the other hand, who showed his countrymen how they could write effective music even when they hadn't a real musical idea in their heads. The Germans, too, learned the lesson from him. Richard Strauss is a descendant of Berlioz, and not, as many suppose, of Liszt or Wagner. The source of the modern French and German tonal orgies is to be found in Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, particularly the last two parts.

Last night, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Vincent D'Indy's second symphony. As it was not its first performance here, no description of it is called for; but one could not but muse again on the extraordinary and evil influence of Berlioz. Yet, paradoxical as it may seem, while Berlioz taught his successors how to sin esthetically, he himself was not a sinner! To be sure, he wrote nightmare music for his Fantastic Symphony, but then it was music which was intended to illustrate nightmares—the dream of a drugged artist that he is being taken to his execution, followed by another dream in which he is among demons and witches who have come to witness his burial. For such nightmare scenes the only appropriate thing is nightmare music, as a matter of course.

If M. D'Indy had written his second symphony to illustrate similar incidents, it might have its value despite its painful lack of melodic substance. But he has declined to provide any programme for this work—not even the appropriate title, "Cacophonic Symphony"; and all the hideous dissonances he hurls at the audience are therefore without sense. Modern ears are accustomed to any amount of tonal discord, but it must be in place, as in "Parsifal," when the magician Klingsor plans the undoing of the Knight, or in "Siegfried," when Alberich and Mime quarrel over the gold. To make a purely symphonic work little more than a concatenation of discords is not only offensive but silly, as well as suicidal. Fifty minutes of this sort of thing is enough to weary any audience; and last night there was no great applause even though the virtuosity with which the Boston band played this work was simply astounding.

The reason why so many present-day composers write musical nightmares is that any one who has studied harmony and orchestration can do this without much trouble, whereas the creation of melodies is a gift from above which cannot be acquired. Tchaikovsky had this gift. His delightfully melodious "Nutcracker" suite, at the end, made up for the dyspeptic groans of the symphonic incubus at the beginning of the concert; and how different was the applause! Between the two came the wonderful Schumann concerto, which was played with taste, intelligence, and excellent technique by Mme. Olga Samaroff.

---

om EVENING TELEGRAM,

dress New York City.

te DEC 10 1909

FOR the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night three works were given, each distinctive in character and representing widely varying schools of composition. D'Indy's Symphony in B flat minor is a work full of vague uncertain themes. After the elusive melodies Schumann's Concerto, played with rare skill and poetic power by Mme. Olga Samaroff, seemed more melodiously opulent than ever.

Tschaikowsky's delightful Nutcracker Suite, full of holiday gayety, brought the concert to a fitting close and seemed to carry to its auditors a Christmas greeting from the wonderful big band from Boston.

SUN,

New York City.

DEC 10 1909

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

EVENING MAIL

New York City.

DEC 10

Last night the Boston Symphony orchestra made its second visit to New York and a very large audience listened attentively and with appreciation to the programme provided and presented by Mr. Fiedler.

The first offering was the symphony in B flat major by Vincent D'Indy, heard here under the composer's direction in 1905. Between this number and Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite Mme. Samaroff played Schumann's concerto in A minor.

Mme. Samaroff is one of the young American artists who has made a position for herself on both continents, and her playing last evening justified her position in a world where merit counts. She has a fluent, sure technique, and she has gained something in nuancing since last she appeared on the concert platform. Her interpretation is that of a musician and her temperament is under an intelligent control.

The D'Indy symphony, while not new to the Boston Symphony audience, was the number of absorbing interest on the programme. D'Indy was known here before Debussy and after Cesar Franck, and chronologically this is as it should be. It is not to be denied that D'Indy is in many respects one of the most powerfully equipped men that France has produced, but so far as he has been heard there is little in his composition calculated to bring joy to those who love music.

While he is one of the greatest masters of instrumentation, counterpoint and, in a certain sense, construction, he is also a revolutionist to the degree of anarchy, and his warfare seems to be directed against beauty. Yet there is so much that could be beautiful in his work.

His melodic line, usually given to the wood-winds, and his treatment of the wood choir in general have both tenderness and beauty, the former in theme, the latter in support; but around this he builds an insufferable, cacophonous din, nerve racking and pitiless.

EVENING SUN,

rom

ddress New York City.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON ORCHESTRA, CARUSO AND "THE MUSIC MASTER."

Premier Symphony and Popular Tenor in the Social Double Event of the Week—Dancing Intermezzo at New Theatre's Double Opera Matinee.

Before a thousand carriages dispersed a Caruso crush at the Metropolitan last night, a more remarkable if not so appalling array of glittering vehicles one mile further uptown signalized the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second visit to New York this season. Max Fiedler's men, not without their operatic rivals at home, had chanced on the night of the week when the idol of the local stage was a foeman worthy of their most convincing demonstration. To an audience above praise, the premier band played again the most curiously sober symphony of France that Vincent d'Indy, the composer, had conducted four years ago. The young American pianist, Olga Samaroff, who owes more to her native Texas and present Boston favor than to the Russian name she would make famous, returned after a year abroad to play the poet Schumann's piano concerto. The concert ended happily in Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" dances.

Geraldine Farrar, in a billow of swan's down plumage, sat in a box until her friend, the courtly, crimson-trained pianist, completed an otherwise colorless rendering of Schumann. The tone-colors of to-morrow are in D'Indy's music, never before played as this orchestra played for Fiedler. The Russian celesta ballets of Arabia and Cathay showed they can make programmes in Boston now that any average human being delights to hear.

Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who through illness had missed a trip South with the Boston players earlier in the week, was still announced to-day as the star for to-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée. Her songs on the programme include the recitative and air, "Sesto," from Mozart's "Titus," an opera shortly to be revived in Germany, and Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho."

Georges Longy, whose auburn aura of golden hair, as well as his golden-voiced oboe, is "one of the chief glories of the Boston Orchestra," was announced as soloist from the band itself to-morrow in Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4, preceded by the "Bartered Bride" overture of Smetana, and the matinée ends with Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

---

rom

Address New York City.

Date DEC 10 1909

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SECOND CONCERT.

By Reginald de Koven.

Vincent d'Indy's Symphony No. 2, in B flat major, and Olga Samaroff's playing of the Schumann piano concerto, op. 54, were the features of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme also included the suite arranged from Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" ballet. To say that the d'Indy symphony, a comparatively unfamiliar work, having been played in New York by the Boston Orchestra on only one previous occasion, if memory serve, is more interesting and attractive in melodic contents than many of the latter day symphonies, is not saying much. Yet it might well seem too much to those to whom its yearning and striving eccentricity of theme, complexity of structure and recondite and often obtrusively unpleasant harmonies are not only practically unintelligible but almost disagreeably unbeautiful. Cast in four movements less varied in character than those of the ordinary symphony, the work is cleverly rather than spontaneously built up, without motto, suggested story or dramatic meaning, from two principal contrasted themes, which are developed and utilized in every possible way and brilliantly orchestrated with the skill of a master of technique.

In fact if the inspiration of the work were as marked as its technique, for the themes in themselves are rather elusive and unmelodic, it might have more importance and real musical value than I feel moved to accord to it. Still as showing the tendencies of modern French musical development, which, beginning with Cesar Franck has now reached Dubussy, it is of decided interest to the musical student and amateur if decidedly "caviare to the general."

If the magnificent performance given it by the Boston Orchestra could not make it effective—and the last movement at least certainly was effective, sonorous and impressive—it could be so in no other way. For me I must confess that music like this, whose labored melodic thought shrieks in giant leaps up and down and seemingly all around the scale, is a weariness to the flesh.

And then came Schumann, like the evening star after a skyrocket, to shed the benign light of genius o'er the murky obscurity of disordered eccentricity, and soothe our offended ears and quiet our shaken nerves with real music of the heart and not merely of the intellect. Mme. Samaroff's playing of the concerto, on the technical side, was brilliantly finished, rhythmic and forcible and from the interpretative standpoint showed an artistic appreciation of the poetic charm, color and spirit of this beautiful work. The accompaniment, which blended and became one with the solo instrument, without ever overshadowing it, was an inspiration in itself.

EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

DEC 10 1909

Boston Orchestra Plays D'Indy's Second Symphony

Appreciation of the Presentation Greater Than That of the Work—Olga Samaroff Soloist in a Schumann Piano Concerto.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

MAX FIEDLER remains true to his purpose of giving us a chance to hear the new music. At the first of the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening he conducted D'Indy's second symphony in B flat-major, which he interpreted better even than D'Indy himself when he was here a few years ago. The composition is ultra-modern in its complexity, its richness of orchestration and its departure from stereotyped forms. There is none of the suavity of the masters in its development. What story it tells, if any, is obscure to the ordinary listener. There are no leading strings to follow. Understanding and appreciation alike fall to the individual. That it won favor with last night's large and distinguished musical audience cannot be said. As a matter of fact it seemed to be heard with polite indifference that savored of boredom. In this the writer did not share. The work is fresh, novel, startling and suggestive. It moves far from the beaten track and is not easy to follow, but is full of suggestion, and in one man's opinion, at least, is worth hearing. Therefore, his thanks to Mr. Fiedler for the opportunity. Of the splendid work of this exceptional band in the elucidation of the work there can be no question. It was masterly playing by master musicians.

Olga Samaroff was the soloist in Schumann's charming piano concerto in A minor. Here there was no doubt of the approval of the composition or of the admiration for the individual player. Mme. Samaroff showed skill, taste, force and impressiveness without any undue projection of the solo instrument upon the orchestral palette. Tschaikowsky's dainty "Nutcracker" suite, exquisitely played, closed the concert and sent home in a happy frame of mind even those most disgruntled over the D'Indy symphony.

At the second concert of the pair tomorrow afternoon Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony will be played, and the soloists will be Schumann-Heink and Georges Lougy, the first oboe player of the orchestra.

---

n GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ress New York City.

The Boston Orchestra.

IT was the function of Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night to reintroduce to a New York audience Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major. This difficult and baffling work has been played here before by the Boston orchestra. Mr. Gericke conducted it nearly five years ago. Four years ago the composer himself conducted it. Of late years d'Indy's music has figured less in concert programmes than it did for a brief season. But this symphony seems to have vitality enough to justify continued performance.

Tame, indeed, this remark must seem in comparison with the recent declaration of faith by Philip Hale of Boston, the prophet of d'Indy in this country, of this symphony. The B flat symphony had been played at two pairs of the orchestra's concerts in Boston. After the second performance (a repetition "by request") Mr. Hale wrote as follows:

"This symphony is the great achievement in absolute music of the ultra-modern French school, and in Germany to find a symphony that may be placed justly by its side, we must go back to the Beethoven of the fifth and the ninth. The symphony of César Franck is on a little lower plane, to be classed with the first and third of Brahms, Schumann's in D minor, and Schubert's in C major."

These are strong words, little likely, it would seem, to be echoed soon by music lovers in general. But let us confess that this symphony, which at a first hearing seemed curiously forbidding, baffling, even ugly, revealed yesterday beauties that had lain undiscovered, unsuspected. Perhaps Mr. Hale is right. Perhaps in time this work will be accepted as a monument of symphonic music, as beautiful and powerful in its entirety as passages in the first, second, and fourth movements sounded last night.

After the symphony Mme Olga Samaroff was heard in Schumann's piano concerto. On the eighteenth of next month it will be five years since Mme Samaroff played for the first time in public. That concert took place in the same hall and the same concerto was on the programme. In the interval Mme Samaroff has advanced in her art and won an enviable position among pianists. The Schumann concerto she played well last night. One might have wished for more poetry, more warmth of feeling in some passages, and in the finale she took a perilously fast tempo, but on the whole her performance was commendable. Particularly charming in tone and phrasing was the second part of the first movement.

The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

rom

New York City.

ddress

Date

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January, 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

TRIBUNE

om

dress New York City.

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

[89]

TIMES

om .....

New York City.

ddress .....

DEC 10 1909

ate .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Repetition of d'Indy's Second Symphony—Mme. Samaroff, Soloist.

The chief number upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert, which took place last evening, was Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat. Mr. Fiedler had just treated Boston to two repetitions of this work within a month, and apparently stands as its champion. It had been twice heard here before from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, once under Mr. Gericke's direction and again under Mr. d'Indy's; both performances were in 1905.

The performance last night was an extraordinarily fine one; it was characterized truly by fervent devotion on the part of everybody concerned in it, and by a minutely perfect mastery of difficulties and complications that are in certain points very considerable. Yet this minute perfection did not interfere with the sweep and freedom of the performance. It was much finer in almost every way than the one that Mr. d'Indy himself conducted.

There are those to whom the outgivings of the modern French composers are as the preludings of a new birth of music. To them d'Indy's symphony presents the quintessence of a new and unfamiliar beauty. Did it present any deeper significance last evening to the general body of intelligent music lovers than it did four years ago? It may be much doubted; and yet in that time they have become much familiarized with the idiom in which d'Indy chose to write. When the symphony was first heard here it appeared a dark saying.

THE TIMES then said that "what is not comprehended to-day may gain clearness and significance when the idiom and the intention of the composer are more fully grasped." The gain that this work has made in clearness and significance to those who hear it to-day is not very great. There is still very much in it that is unmeaning cacophony, a striving after something that is unrealized or unrealizable, a deliberate seeking after new effects that never entered the ken of musicians of the older days. It is d'Indy the cerebral that speaks here chiefly.

It is an elaborate structure built upon a community, development, and transformation of a few themes, some of which appear in all four movements. The modern Frenchmen greatly affect the augmented intervals, that sound peculiarly discordant to the old-fashioned ear, except as passing dissonances, and d'Indy, who piles them one upon the other, has done nothing to mollify their distressful sound. The modern Frenchmen also affect melodic intervals based on what is called the "whole note scale," and the symphony is full of them. They also grate on the aforesaid old-fashioned ear.

It is possible to use these things with effects of real beauty and recondite suggestiveness, as Debussy showed in "Pelléas et Mélisande," but Mr. d'Indy seeks for no mollification. He seems to be one who would reconstitute our ears and force the acceptance of these sounds that now seem so malignant. They may succeed—the human ear has been forced to accept many things in the last three centuries at which it once rebelled. But measured by this symphony there has not been much progress in the last four years.

There are fine passages in this work; they were recognized as such at the previous performances; passages of fine harmony and richly varied orchestral effect, and in which certain of the unpromising thematic materials are wrought into noble and connectedly developed utterance. But these are not, unfortunately, the ruling passages. They are, it may be noted, precisely those in which the composer drops for the moment the obsession of his harmonic and melodic formulas. Of the profound seriousness of this symphony and of the composer's purpose in it there can be no doubt. Only so much the clearer is the difficulty, it makes for even the open-minded listener.

Mme. Olga Samaroff appeared to play Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra. It was not a performance that did much credit to her poetic feeling, her sympathy with Schumann's intensely romantic spirit, as it is embodied in this one of the most poetic of all piano concertos. Mme. Samaroff's touch was hard, her interpretation unyielding, and pedestrian. She has played much better than this in New York, and doubtless will again. Her performance was a disappointment to those who have admired her better playing.

Far away from Indy and also from Schumann and their serious strivings was Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite for orchestra that ended the programme. Entirely jocose in intention, it has much that is amusing, much that is striking, much that is very pretty and graceful. It aroused much applause.

TIMES

n .....

ress ..... New York City.

e .....

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 19, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

WORLD

is ..... New York City.

DEC 26 1909

• • •

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

• • •

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY

ss .....

DEC 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Abstruse Work of Vicomte Vincent d'Indy Is Chief Item on Well Chosen Programme.

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE PIANO

Max Fiedler and Bostonians Still Keeping Us in Touch With the Latest Musical Developments.

Vincent d'Indy, Tschaikowsky and Schumann were the composers whose works were heard last night at Carnegie Hall on the occasion of the second visit this year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city.

It is the pardonable boast of this institution that it keeps New York and Boston in touch with the latest developments of modern music. So admirable a policy implies lonely journeys into strange seas of musical thought and discovery, thought and discovery, too, which may be important, if not popular. The Boston Symphony Orchestra can therefore claim to be educational in the best sense of the word, for it keeps a continent in touch with the progress of the musical activities of a world.

To the important, the educational and unpopular belongs the Second Symphony of the Vicomte Vincent d'Indy.

Vincent d'Indy is a scorner of old musical grounds. He would fain soar high above it and take us, his followers, into undiscovered musical ethers and among cold new stars. Sometimes he lands us all amid regions of musical moonshine, giving critics of the frozen banana school, now very prevalent in New York, ample opportunity to blaspheme. There are such lunar patches in his Second Symphony, but surely any one but the frozen bananologists would forgive D'Indy for them, in view of the far-fetched, almost unworldly beauty of certain parts of the second movement of the long and fantastical work.

There are times, indeed, when Vincent d'Indy seems striving after the novel merely because it is the novel, and not because new ideas arising in his own mind suggest a novel phraseology and a startling language. Herein the composer becomes artificial, just as some of our modern poetasters and painters are artificial, because they are not really themselves. At the same time M. d'Indy is indeed a great musician, one to which the spirit, even after he has exhausted it, will insist on recurring.

The Tschaikowsky "Nut Cracker" Suite received an exquisite rendering at the hands of this brilliantly able orchestra, in whose conductor, Max Fiedler, reside in rare combination the two qualities of scholarship and imagination.

Miss Olga Samaroff, the pianiste, was the soloist. She played the Schumann concerto in A minor with the quiet resourcefulness she has so often demonstrated.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

Address ..... New York City.

Date .....

SYMPHONY GIVES 2 GERMAN NUMBERS

The programme of the Boston Symphony's concert given last night at Carnegie Hall was remarkable for two things: First, that neither of its two large numbers was German, and, second, for the brilliancy of Miss Olga Samaroff's performance of the piano part of the Schumann concerto.

The concert began with the second symphony of Vincent D'Indy. The Boston Symphony Society may have a special interest in this work, for that orchestra was the first to play it in America, and on the occasion of its second hearing M. D'Indy came over from Paris and conducted it for them.

It is only fair to commend Mr. Fiedler for the variety he succeeds in giving the public. If for nothing else than that and the faultless musicianship of his men, he deserves thanks. In the D'Indy number the execution of the musicians was the attractive feature.

As a composition the symphony is an excellent example of mathematical correctness; a problem in notes worked out with the absolute precision of an example in arithmetic, but with no respect for or thought of music as one understands it, say, according to the Schumann Concerto which followed or the Tschaikowsky Suite which closed the programme.

Miss Samaroff, the young American pianist, gave an inspired reading of the concerto. Her touch is sympathetic and she played with remarkable intonation and lucidity.

The Nutcracker Suite of Tschaikowsky seems to get a weekly hearing this season, but when one hears this bubbling, moving fairy story in music played with such buoyancy and spontaneity as it was last night it never could be wearisome.

The hall was crowded and a great deal of attention was directed toward Miss Geraldine Farrar, who looked very beautiful in one of the boxes, and who applauded enthusiastically.

SUN

New York City. DEC 10 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

D'INDY'S SECOND SYMPHONY PERFORMED.

A Well Constructed Composition Replete in Acrid Harmonies—Mme. Olga Samaroff Plays Schumann's Piano Concerto in a Colorless Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again and has once more brought Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat with it. The composition was produced here under the direction of Mr. Gericke on January 12, 1904, and it was again performed by this orchestra under the baton of Mr. d'Indy himself on December 7, 1905. On both occasions the music aroused speculation and spinal shivers simultaneously. But on neither was it so superbly played as it was last night.

Many beautiful thoughts have been uttered in Paris and Boston about Mr. d'Indy, his compositions in general and this symphony in particular, and lately the inhabitants of the cultivated city over against Cape Cod asked to have it repeated for their delectation. Judging from the demeanor of last night's audience the work will be vouchsafed another three years rest before the voice of its chromatic turtle doves are heard again in this land.

Mr. d'Indy once admitted that he had a dramatic conception in mind in the plan of this symphony. Its form is the "development of a veritable action." This is an explanation that does not greatly help, for while it is quite plain that there is an emotional scheme in the work we have been told that it will be useless to search for the key to the enigma.

There is much excellent formal workmanship in this symphony. The composer begins his first movement with a principal theme worthy of Strauss, bold, brilliant and calling for virtuosity from the horn. The second theme is equally striking in character and the working out shows good musicianship, but it wants a climax. The other movements utilize parts of the themes heard in the first, and introduce new matter so that the development of the composition has a keen intellectual interest. The slow second movement, elegiac in nature, has a march like the second theme, which teaches us that Mr. d'Indy has heard the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz.

The third movement, an intermezzo, suggests a country festival about the time of the lemon harvest. The finale begins with an introduction and fugue and ends with a rondo. The introduction recapitulates themes already heard and the fugue is reared on the cantabile theme of the first movement. New matter is introduced and the whole comes to a conclusion with a chorale supposedly sung by monks who have sought the cloister because of utter disappointment with the joys of life.

The instrumentation of this symphony is luscious in its tonal richness and there is a general display of musical scholarship. But Mr. D'Indy's melodic and harmonic idioms belong to the outer extreme of that pungent world of dissonance in which Mr. Debussy dreams his operatic visions and Mr. Strauss makes orgies of song and story.

Much of this music biteth like an adder. When the composer has no other idea he takes two innocent minor seconds in different keys and incites them to mortal combat. And his themes are ofttimes reminiscent of better thoughts by other masters. It is strange indeed to hear from time to time curdled "Carmen," battered Berlioz or twisted "Tristan." After listening to the work one feels as if he had heard the song of an unripe persimmon.

But in Athens, where they are ever seeking something new, they love this symphony and must hear it twice. Thrice blessed is he who can revel in this concourse of sour sounds. Common New Yorkers will perhaps continue to prefer the old fashioned warblings of Mozart and Beethoven. Even "Ein Heldenleben" becomes as the croon of a cradle song beside this.

But, as already noted, it was beautifully played. Such opulence, solidity, transparency and perfect balance of tone are rarely heard even from this great Boston orchestra, while the clarity of enunciation of the themes and their repetitions in the course of the development of the performance was incomparably fine.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who played with the orchestra the lovely Schumann concerto. It was a smooth, fluent, colorless and unpoetic interpretation. Mme. Samaroff seemed to have little feeling for the romantic content of the work, or if she had, she found no color of tone or variety of accent adequate to its embodiment. The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's delightful "Nut Cracker" suite.

HERALD

New York City.

"NO ENCORE" RULE SAVES BOSTON PLAYERS

Large Audience at Orchestra's Concert in Carnegie Hall Demands Many Repetitions.

MISS SAMAROFF IS HEARD

Pianist Received with Marked Favor as Soloist with Noted Body of Musicians from "the Hub."

Three numbers made up the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestral numbers were all familiar, consisting of Mons. D'Indy's second symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker Suite."

Miss Olga Samaroff, pianist, was the soloist, playing the well known Schumann concerto. She was heartily applauded when she appeared, and had to rise and bow her acknowledgement at the end of each movement. At the conclusion she was recalled half a dozen times.

The "no encore" rule obtains strictly at these concerts, otherwise Mme. Samaroff would have been compelled to "oblige." She played fluently and with a great deal of dash. There were moments when a bit more poetry would have added much to the enjoyment, but her technique was excellent.

The orchestra, conducted by Mr. Fiedler, played admirably. Especially in the Tschaikowsky suite. The conductor bowed his thanks and the members of the orchestra had to rise in answer to applause.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler once more distinguished himself last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, as a conductor of advanced ideas, of eclectic taste and of daring. Only a short time ago the Hamburg-Boston leader exposed himself to attack by producing a highly modern work of Reger. Without flinching under the shafts of New York obstructionists he presented last night D'Indy's symphony in B flat major, No. 2, opus 57, which already had aroused their wrath several years ago, when the same orchestra under the composer's own direction, had given the work a hearing in New York.

Vincent D'Indy's symphony was heard to far better advantage under Fiedler than under the composer himself, who, whatever he is as a maker of music, is not a good conductor. The performance last night was not only an admirably clear and technically finished one, revealing the virtuosic power of the Boston Orchestra in a wonderfully brilliant light, but spirited and full of temperamental swing. Unquestionably this symphony grows on nearer acquaintance. Its manifold orchestral colors, the refinement of its manifold contrasts in instrumental tints and the skill of the composer's thematic workmanship present a fascinating study to the careful listener. Yet it cannot be said that rehearing shows more clearly than before inspiration or spontaneity. The symphony is a complicated and interesting structure, reared by purely cerebral impulse and skill.

The soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, who presented herself in Schumann's piano concerto in A minor, received enthusiastic tributes for her skillful and graceful performance. It cannot be said, however, that Mme. Samaroff was in her best mood. Frequently in passages that made demands on her technical prowess she appeared to forget that there are other considerations more important than mere mechanical exactitude. That surely is not this pianist's way of playing always.

The evening closed with a brilliant performance of Tschaikowski's "Nut Cracker" suite.

EVENING SUN,

ess ..... New York City.

DEC 1909

Philip Hale, in Saturday's Boston Symphony programme book, apropos of Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho," recorded the fact that a theme which appealed to Gounod, if not to Massenet, had inspired no fewer than eleven grand operas, three ballets, two operettas, two cantatas, two overtures and [illegible] "solo scenes."

Better sixty years of "Sapph[illegible]" a cycle of Massenet. Old Pacini's not the oldest of the lot, either produced in Boston and doubtless York, in 1847, by Tedesco and the troupe. Gounod's Greek heroine was Pauline Viardot-Garcia.

[90]

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 1 1 190

STRING NOTE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

And Just Because Krauss Forgot to Return Weitzner's Valuable Violin or Cash.

Just because one of his men was careless about not returning other people's property, Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony, waved his baton over a depleted orchestra on Thursday evening. The careless one is Hermann Krauss, of Boston, a viola player. The aggrieved person is Sigmund Weitzner, who, with the aid of several other musicians, helps to make gastronomic life enjoyable in Hermann's Harlem Casino. Krauss is out on $1,000 bail for trial by the courtesy of Magistrate Breen, presiding in Jefferson Market Coourt.

Weitzner, as an avocation, deals in "priceless" violins. Last March Krauss approached him with the proposition that the latter sell one of them for him. Time passed, and although much passionate correspondence ensued, Sigmund never saw his instrument or its money value.

This so preyed upon Weitzner's mind that it led him to having the Boston symphonist arrested just as he was about to manufacture music at Carnegie Hall.

The warrant was issued several months ago by Magristrate Barlow.

SUN
New York City.
DEC

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAN HELD

Violinist Krauss Charged With Stealing $250 Gogliano.

Hermann Krauss, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held in $1,000 bail for trial in the Jefferson Market police court yesterday charged with the larceny of a Gogliano violin valued at $250. Krauss was arrested as he came off the stage at Carnegie Hall Thursday night after the concert.

Krauss, who lives at 15 Albemarle street, Boston, was at one time in an orchestra in this city, where he sat beside a man named Sigmund Weitzner of 730 Prospect avenue, Brooklyn. Weitzner, who also plays the violin, told Krauss that he had a Gogliano which belonged to H. F. Wilson of 577 Tenth avenue and asked Krauss if he knew anybody who wanted to buy it. Krauss said he had found a buyer and took the violin with him. That was the last Weitzner heard of it until he received a letter from Krauss saying that the violin had been stolen. All this happened several months ago and after ineffectual attempts had been made to locate the instrument Weitzner caused the arrest of Krauss.

N. Y. STAATSZEITUNG
DEC 11 1909

Zum Prozeß.

Musiker unter der Anschuldigung des Violindiebstahls festgehalten.

Musiker aller Klassen und Gattungen, Künstler, Mitglieder des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters und Angehörige von Zigeuner-Kapellen drängten sich gestern Nachmittag in den Gerichtssaal des Jefferson-Market-Polizeigerichts, wo Herman Krauß, ein Mitglied des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, unter der Anklage stand, eine werthvolle Violine dem Eigenthümer, S. Weitzner, nicht retournirt zu haben. Als Vertreter der Anklage erschien Anwalt Charles Obertwäger; er machte geltend, daß Krauß die Violine vor Monatsfrist erhielt, dieselbe in Boston verkauft und nachher behauptet hatte, daß dieselbe ihm gestohlen worden sei. Der Anwalt unterwarf den Angeklagten einem scharfen Verhör, in dessen Verlauf Richter Breen die Ueberzeugung gewann, daß der Fall den Großgeschwornen zwecks triminalgerichtlicher Prozessirung vorgelegt werden müsse. Er stellte den Musiker unter $1000 Bürgschaft, die vom Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters geleistet wurde, damit das Orchester, welches gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall konzertirte, vollzählig blieb. Weitzner, ebenfalls ein Musiker, behauptet, daß die Violine mindestens $300 werth sei.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
New York City.
DEC 11 1909

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Vincent d'Indy's zweite Symphonie, die uns im Vortrag der Bostoner unter Leitung des Komponisten selbst schon vor vier Jahren nicht gefallen hatte, unterscheidet sich gleich manchen anderen irdischen Dingen vom Sauerkraut dadurch, daß sie durch Aufwärmen nicht besser wird. Man muß den Ernst des Komponisten, seine volle Beherrschung der Technik und seine Geschicklichkeit im Schaffen und Auflösen kunstvoller Orchester-Kombinationen willig anerkennen, aber man kann nicht umhin, zu bedauern, daß diese Kunst an ein so wenig erfreuliches, kaltes und ungeachtet des starken Lärms so leeres Werk verschwendet wurde. Drei Themen, eines im ersten und zwei im letzten Satz, zeichnen sich durch eindringliche Kraft, daß eine durch eine gewisse, verhaltene Leidenschaft aus. Aber der Komponist ergeht sich, statt an eine erfindungsreiche Durchführung dieser Themen zu gehen, in leeren Kalkulationen und kommt vom Hundertsten in's Tausendste, so daß man ordentlich den Faden verliert und verstimmt wird. Am erfreulichsten wirkte der Schluß, erstens weil die Sache zu Ende war, und zweitens, weil der betreffende Choral in breiten, majestätischen Akkorden ein wahres Labsal nach den grellen Dissonanzen und kontrapunktischen Jongleur-Kunststückchen Herrn d'Indy's brachte. Schade um die große Mühe, die man sich mit der Einstudirung und der geradezu brillanten Wiedergabe des schwierigen Werkes gegeben hat. Das Publikum blieb kalt, und der schüchterne Applaus galt lediglich Herrn Fiedler und seiner wackeren Künstlerschaar. Man möge das Werk jetzt weitere vier Jahre liegen lassen und es dann — nicht aufführen.

Einen wirklichen Genuß gewährte die über alles Lob erhabene Wiedergabe von Tschaikowsky's brillanter und sinniger „Nußknackersuite", op. 71a. Man kann den Glanz und die subtile Farbengebung dieses wunderbaren Orchesters nicht genug loben. Dirigent Herr Fiedler, hat sich das Orchester sozusagen vollständig assimilirt, denn es folgte seinen leisesten Intentionen mit wundersamer Anschmiegsamkeit. Die glänzenden Bilder aus „Nußknacker und Mausekönig" wurden bei diesen charakteristischen Klängen förmlich vor uns lebendig. Man sah die kämpfenden Bleisoldaten und Pfefferkuchenmänner, den stolzen „General Nußknacker", der siegreich in d Konfektsburg einzieht. Man durchstreift das phantastische Puppenland mit seinen Christbaum-Hainen, den beleuchteten Marzipanburgen, den Confiture-Wällen, den Honigbächen und Limonadeströmen, mit den silbernen Fischen und den goldenen Schwänen, und bei der Hochzeit der kleinen Heldin mit dem schönen Prinzen tanzten (ausgerechnet) 22,000 köstlich geputzte Figuren! Das Publikum dankte für den Genuß mit einer Ovation.

Frau Olga Sammaroff spielte das Schumann'sche A-Moll Piano-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung. Schon diese Wahl nahm günstig für die Künstlerin ein, welche damit einen dem blendend Virtuosenhaften abholden Sinn erwiesen hat, denn das Schumann'sche Werk ist mehr auf intime, denn auf äußerliche Wirkung angelegt, hat keine schwierigen technischen Probleme zu lösen und steht ganz im Dienste musikalischer Intelligenz und musikalischen Geschmackes. Die Künstlerin löste die Aufgabe mit Innerlichkeit und großem Stil. Den ersten Satz gestaltete sie leidenschaftlich erregt, dabei gelegentlich innig; der Zwiegesang mit der Klarinette brachte eine entzückende Kantilene. Das liebliche „Intermezzo" spielte sie graziös und stimmungsvoll, dem „Allegro vivace" verlieh sie Flottheit und frischen Fluß. Echter Frohsinn sprach da sein erquickliches Wort. Sie behielt bis zum Schluß straffe Führung und brachte das Werk glanzvoll zu Ende. Die Künstlerin wurde ein halb Dutzend Mal stürmisch gerufen. H.

BROOKLYN JOURNAL
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 12 19

$250 Violine soll er gestohlen haben.

Herman Krauß aus Boston, der gegenwärtig mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester in New York auftritt, wurde gestern Nachmittag im Jefferson Market-Polizeigericht unter $1000 Bürgschaft gestellt. Er soll seinem früheren Freund und Kollegen Sigmund Weitzner, der jetzt im West End Casino, an der 125. Str., als Geiger fungirt, eine kostbare Gogliano-Violine im Werthe von $250 unterschlagen haben. Krauß betheuert, daß ihm die Geige gestohlen wurde.

TIMES
New York City.
DEC 12 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Longy Soloists at the Second Concert.

The programme of the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, was a rather singularly assorted one; but it offered several different kinds of enjoyment of a rare kind. The performances of the orchestra were in part such as displayed its virtuoso qualities to extraordinary advantage. Such was the overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride," played at a breathlessly rapid pace, with exquisite clearness and fluency on the part of the strings in the fascinating fugato that runs through so much of it.

Such was also Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, in a most brilliant and sonorous performance, in which the strings again distinguished themselves in the scherzo, with its long, persistent pizzicato passages, and in the rushing finale, both likewise taken at terrific speed; but rapid tempos have no terrors for the players of the Boston Orchestra.

There were two soloists, of whom Mme. Schumann-Heink was the first in point of time. She sang the air with its preliminary recitative, "Never Shall Hymen," from Mozart's opera of "La Clemenza di Tito." It is an old favorite of hers, in which she exploits some extraordinary vocal effects and some phrasing that deeply impress the audience, though they are hardly exemplifications of the true style of Mozart singing. She was enthusiastically recalled several times, as she was after her second number, the stanzas from Gounod's "Sapho."

The novel feature of the programme was the oldest—a concerto for oboe and string orchestra by Handel. The solo part was played by Mr. Georges Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra, a great artist, whose skill and musical endowments are seldom enjoyed except in brief and fleeting passages in the orchestral ensemble by those who can disentangle the warp and woof of the fabric of tone.

The concerto is thoroughly characteristic of Handel's instrumental style—noble, measured and dignified, finely melodious. Mr. Longy's playing was a beautiful exposition of art in the unerring technique of his instrument, the lovely tone and its exquisite modulation, the long and expressive phrasing, the thorough understanding and sympathy with the style of the music, the poise and repose that he displayed in it.

It was a performance that might have taught much to other musical artists, workers in other mediums, even singers, as to refinements and beauties that they might profitably appropriate. The lesson might even have been enforced on that same platform at that very concert.

The programme was brought to an end, rather singularly, with the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
DEC 12 1909

SCHUMANN-HEINK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

German Soloist, Recovered from Indisposition, Delights Carnegie Hall Crowd.

Rarely has the Boston Symphony been heard in a more pleasing, popular concert than it gave yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It may have been due to the advance advertising for this concert that one of the largest audiences of the season crowded the hall. Standees were noticed not only downstairs but also in each of the balconies.

Then, besides, there were two soloists instead of the customary one. Mme. Schumann-Heink had recovered from her temporary indisposition, and sang, in her always splendid fashion, a recitative and aria from Mozart's rarely heard opera, "Titus," and two stanzas from the opera of "Sappho," with music setting by Gounod.

The other soloist was Georges Longy, the first oboe player of the orchestra. He played the solo part in Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra, and the effect, though rather strange and uncommon, was quite enjoyable.

The orchestra pieces were the overture to "The Bartered Bride," Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and the overture to the opera "Rienzi," by Wagner.

It is doubtful if the Tschaikowsky number has ever had a more inspirited reading than it had at Mr. Fiedler's hands yesterday. His symphony, which antedates the two sombre, nocturne-like symphonies—the Fifth and Pathetique—is a joyous, poetic work, breathing happiness in each of its four movements.

From the beginning to the end it bubbles over with airs that ripple all the way from the first violin to the double basses. Especially lovely is the scherzo, or third movement, and after finishing this the musicians were compelled to stand and bow before the applause came to an end.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony takes place on January 13, when Micha Elman will be the assisting artist.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
DEC 12 190

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

While admiring, as one always must admire, the playing of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, admiration was marred in a degree by the feeling that Mr. Fiedler was temporarily pursued by the demon of haste. In two numbers of the programme the extreme speed which he cultivated worked little harm and even helped to display the technical virtuosity of the musicians from Boston. But that virtuosity is known and appreciated in New York, and it is worse than idle to sacrifice higher qualities for the sake of its display, as we fear Mr. Fiedler has done on this visit. The numbers in question were the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and the third movement of Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor—the much admired composition in which the band of viols is made to put on an antic disposition and play the part of a gigantic mandolin. Smetana's overture now belongs properly to the theatre in New York and could be spared from the concert room; but our visitors remain as indifferent to local doings and conditions as our local conductors do to the gifts which are brought from foreign parts; and so we are frequently invited to institute comparisons when it would be pleasanter to enjoy variety. In the first and fourth movements of the symphony there was occasionally a stirring of the spirit of unrest and a lack of contrast. The Boston Orchestra has frequently played the composition better and so have local organizations; but the pizzicato ostinato evoked much applause and may thus have attained its end. The other orchestral work, with which the concert was brought to a close, was the overture to "Rienzi." In the middle of the programme (which it might be wished had been preserved by Mr. Fiedler for places less generously provided with miscellaneous concerts than New York) there was a mixture of the admirable and deplorable—and it was the latter element which aroused the greater enthusiasm. It would be well if the confession alone would suffice. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang the scene and air, "Ecco il punto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" as young singers and a public still fairly familiar with some of the traditions of the Mozart style ought never to be permitted to hear it sung. And she also sang "O ma Lyre immortelle," from Gounod's "Sapho," and evoked a second storm of frenetic applause. A pity that a voice of such opulent beauty should be used so inartistically. Fortunately, her Mozart air was followed at once by an illustration of what cantabile is. M. Longy played an archaic concerto for oboe by Handel—played it with a ravishing tone and a perfection of phrasing which ought to have set those whose hands were still tingling from ill advised applause to thinking.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN REVIEW
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 1

Standing out clearly as the one brig number of an otherwise intensely dull program, Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite was gratefully received at the second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie Hall on December 9th. Following Vincent D'Indy's disconnected depressing symphony in B Flat and Olga Samaroff's technically brilliant but colorless playing of the Schumann Concerto in A Minor, this delightful ballet music, magnificently played as it was, did much to revive a thoroughly worn out audience. But why his hearers must endure one hour of intense gloom in order to be rewarded with a few moments of unalloyed pleasure, is something only Mr. Fiedler can answer. From an educational standpoint, possibly, some excuse can be found for D'Indy's symphony, since it shows clearly along what lines the modern French composers are working. But it is extremely doubtful if even Mr. Fiedler's masterful handling could ever make this work acceptable.

M. S. R.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK City.
DEC 12 1909

Elman's first appearances of the season will be Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week on the 19th he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday evenings, February 13, 20 and 27, and on March 3 he will be the soloist at the closing concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

[91]

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 1 1909

BARRING NOTE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

And Just Because Krauss Forgot to Return Weitzner's Valuable Violin or Cash.

Just because one of his men was careless about not returning other people's property, Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony, waved his baton over a depleted orchestra on Thursday evening. The careless one is Hermann Krauss, of Boston, a viola player. The aggrieved person is Sigmund Weitzner, who, with the aid of several other musicians, helps to make gastronomic life enjoyable in Hermann's Harlem Casino. Krauss is out on $1,000 bail for trial by the courtesy of Magistrate Breen, presiding in Jefferson Market Coourt.

Weitzner, as an avocation, deals in "priceless" violins. Last March Krauss approached him with the proposition that the latter sell one of them for him. Time passed, and although much passionate correspondence ensued, Sigmund never, never saw his instrument or its money value.

This so preyed upon Weitzner's mind that it led him to having the Boston symphonist arrested just as he was about to manufacture music at Carnegie Hall.

The warrant was issued several months ago by Magristrate Barlow.

SUN
New York City.
DEC

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAN HELD

Violinist Krauss Charged With Stealing $250 Gogliano.

Hermann Krauss, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held in $1,000 bail for trial in the Jefferson Market police court yesterday charged with the larceny of a Gogliano violin valued at $250. Krauss was arrested as he came off the stage at Carnegie Hall Thursday night after the concert.

Krauss, who lives at 15 Albemarle street, Boston, was at one time in an orchestra in this city, where he sat beside a man named Sigmund Weitzner of 730 Prospect avenue, Brooklyn. Weitzner, who also plays the violin, told Krauss that he had a Gogliano which belonged to H. F. Wilson of 577 Tenth avenue and asked Krauss if he knew anybody who wanted to buy it. Krauss said he had found a buyer and took the violin with him. That was the last Weitzner heard of it until he received a letter from Krauss saying that the violin had been stolen. All this happened several months ago and after ineffectual attempts had been made to locate the instrument Weitzner caused the arrest of Krauss.

Zum Prozeß.

Musiker unter der Anschuldigung des Violindiebstahls festgehalten.

Musiker aller Klassen und Gattungen, Künstler, Mitglieder des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters und Angehörige von Zigeuner-Kapellen drängten sich gestern Nachmittag in den Gerichtssaal des Jefferson-Market-Polizeigerichts, wo Herman Kraus, ein Mitglied des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, unter der Anklage stand, eine werthvolle Violine dem Eigenthümer, S. Weitzner, nicht retournirt zu haben. Als Vertreter der Anklage erschien Anwalt Charles Oberwäger; er machte geltend, daß Kraus die Violine vor Monatsfrist erhielt, dieselbe in Boston verkauft und nachher behauptet hatte, daß dieselbe ihm gestohlen worden sei. Der Anwalt unterwarf den Angeklagten einem scharfen Verhör, in dessen Verlauf Richter Breen die Ueberzeugung gewann, daß der Fall den Großgeschwornen zwecks kriminalgerichtlicher Prozessirung vorgelegt werden müsse. Er stellte den Musiker unter $1000 Bürgschaft, die vom Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters geleistet wurde, damit das Orchester, welches gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall konzertirte, vollzählig blieb. Weitzner, ebenfalls ein Musiker, behauptet, daß die Violine mindestens $300 werth sei.

$250 Violine soll er gestohlen haben.

Herman Krauß aus Boston, der gegenwärtig mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester in New York auftritt, wurde gestern Nachmittag im Jefferson Market-Polizeigericht unter $1000 Bürgschaft gestellt. Er soll seinem früheren Freund und Kollegen Sigmund Weitzner, der jetzt im West End Casino, an der 125. Str., als Geiger fungirt, eine kostbare Gogliano-Violine im Werthe von $250 unterschlagen haben. Krauß betheuert, daß ihm die Geige gestohlen wurde.

STAATS-ZEITUNG
New York City.
DEC 11

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Vincent d'Indy's zweite Symphonie, die uns im Vortrag der Bostoner unter Leitung des Komponisten selbst schon vor vier Jahren nicht gefallen hatte, unterscheidet sich gleich manchen anderen irdischen Dingen vom Sauerkraut dadurch, daß sie durch Aufwärmen nicht besser wird. Man muß den Ernst des Komponisten, seine volle Beherrschung der Technik und seine Geschicklichkeit im Schaffen und Auflösen kunstvoller Orchester-Kombinationen willig anerkennen, aber man kann nicht umhin, zu bedauern, daß diese Kunst an ein so wenig erfreuliches, kaltes und ungeachtet des starken Lärms so leeres Werk verschwendet wurde. Drei Themen, eines im ersten und zwei im letzten Satz, zeichnen sich durch eindringliche Kraft, das eine durch eine gewisse, verhaltene Leidenschaft aus. Aber der Komponist ergeht sich, statt an eine erfindungsreiche Durchführung dieser Themen zu gehen, in leeren Kalkulationen und kommt vom Hundertsten in's Tausendste, so daß man ordentlich den Faden verliert und verstimmt wird. Am erfreulichsten wirkte der Schluß, erstens weil die Sache zu Ende war, und zweitens, weil der betreffende Choral in breiten, majestätischen Akkorden ein wahres Labsal nach den grellen Dissonanzen und kontrapunktischen Jongleur-Kunststückchen Herrn d'Indy's brachte. Schade um die große Mühe, die man sich mit der Einstudirung und der geradezu brillanten Wiedergabe des schwierigen Werkes gegeben hat. Das Publikum blieb kalt, und der schüchterne Applaus galt lediglich Herrn Fiedler und seiner wackeren Künstlerschaar. Man möge das Werk jetzt weitere vier Jahre liegen lassen und es dann — nicht aufführen.

Einen wirklichen Genuß gewährte die über alles Lob erhabene Wiedergabe von Tschaikowsky's brillanter und sinniger „Nußknackersuite", op. 71a. Man kann den Glanz und die subtile Farbengebung dieses wunderbaren Orchesters nicht genug loben. Dirigent Herr Fiedler, hat sich das Orchester sozusagen vollständig assimilirt, denn es folgte seinen leisesten Intentionen mit wundersamer Anschmiegsamkeit. Die glänzenden Bilder aus „Nußknacker und Mausekönig" wurden bei diesen charakteristischen Klängen förmlich vor uns lebendig. Man sah die kämpfenden Bleisoldaten und Pfefferkuchenmänner, den stolzen „General Nußknacker", der siegreich in d Konfektsburg einzieht. Man durchstreift das phantastische Puppenland mit seinen Christbaum-Hainen, den beleuchteten Marzipanburgen, den Confiture-Wällen, den Honigbächen und Limonadeströmen, mit den silbernen Fischen und den goldenen Schwänen, und bei der Hochzeit der kleinen Heldin mit dem schönen Prinzen tanzten (ausgerechnet) 22,000 köstlich geputzte Figuren! Das Publikum dankte für den Genuß mit einer Ovation.

Frau Olga Sammaroff spielte das Schumann'sche A-Moll Piano-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung. Schon diese Wahl nahm günstig für die Künstlerin ein, welche damit einen dem blendend Virtuosenhaften abholden Sinn erwiesen hat, denn das Schumann'sche Werk ist mehr auf intime, denn auf äußerliche Wirkung angelegt, hat keine schwierigen technischen Probleme zu lösen und steht ganz im Dienste musikalischer Intelligenz und musikalischen Geschmackes. Die Künstlerin löste die Aufgabe mit Innerlichkeit und großem Stil. Den ersten Satz gestaltete sie leidenschaftlich erregt, dabei gelegentlich innig; der Zwiegesang mit der Klarinette brachte eine entzückende Kantilene. Das liebliche „Intermezzo" spielte sie graziös und stimmungsvoll, dem „Allegro vivace" verlieh sie Flottheit und frischen Fluß. Echter Frohsinn sprach da sein erquickliches Wort. Sie behielt bis zum Schluß straffe Führung und brachte das Werk glanzvoll zu Ende. Die Künstlerin wurde ein halb Dutzend Mal stürmisch gerufen.

H.

DEC 12 19

TIMES
New York City.
DEC 12 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Longy Soloists at the Second Concert.

The programme of the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, was a rather singularly assorted one; but it offered several different kinds of enjoyment of a rare kind. The performances of the orchestra were in part such as displayed its virtuoso qualities to extraordinary advantage. Such was the overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride," played at a breathlessly rapid pace, with exquisite clearness and fluency on the part of the strings in the fascinating fugato that runs through so much of it.

Such was also Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, in a most brilliant and sonorous performance, in which the strings again distinguished themselves in the scherzo, with its long, persistent pizzicato passages, and in the rushing finale, both likewise taken at terrific speed; but rapid tempos have no terrors for the players of the Boston Orchestra.

There were two soloists, of whom Mme. Schumann-Heink was the first in point of time. She sang the air with its preliminary recitative, "Never Shall Hymen," from Mozart's opera of "La Clemenza di Tito." It is an old favorite of hers, in which she exploits some extraordinary vocal effects and some phrasing that deeply impress the audience, though they are hardly exemplifications of the true style of Mozart singing. She was enthusiastically recalled several times, as she was after her second number, the stanzas from Gounod's "Sapho."

The novel feature of the programme was the oldest—a concerto for oboe and string orchestra by Handel. The solo part was played by Mr. Georges Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra, a great artist, whose skill and musical endowments are seldom enjoyed except in brief and fleeting passages in the orchestral ensemble by those who can disentangle the warp and woof of the fabric of tone.

The concerto is thoroughly characteristic of Handel's instrumental style—noble, measured and dignified, finely melodious. Mr. Longy's playing was a beautiful exposition of art in the unerring technique of his instrument, the lovely tone and its exquisite modulation, the long and expressive phrasing, the thorough understanding and sympathy with the style of the music, the poise and repose that he displayed in it.

It was a performance that might have taught much to other musical artists, workers in other mediums, even singers, as to refinements and beauties that they might profitably appropriate. The lesson might even have been enforced on that same platform at that very concert.

The programme was brought to an end, rather singularly, with the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
DEC 12 1909

SCHUMANN-HEINK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

German Soloist, Recovered from Indisposition, Delights Carnegie Hall Crowd.

Rarely has the Boston Symphony been heard in a more pleasing, popular concert than it gave yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It may have been due to the advance advertising for this concert that one of the largest audiences of the season crowded the hall. Standees were noticed not only downstairs but also in each of the balconies.

Then, besides, there were two soloists instead of the customary one. Mme. Schumann-Heink had recovered from her temporary indisposition, and sang, in her always splendid fashion, a recitative and aria from Mozart's rarely heard opera, "Titus," and two stanzas from the opera of "Sappho," with music setting by Gounod.

The other soloist was Georges Longy, the first oboe player of the orchestra. He played the solo part in Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra, and the effect, though rather strange and uncommon, was quite enjoyable.

The orchestra pieces were the overture to "The Bartered Bride," Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and the overture to the opera "Rienzi," by Wagner.

It is doubtful if the Tschaikowsky number has ever had a more inspirited reading than it had at Mr. Fiedler's hands yesterday. His symphony, which antedates the two sombre, nocturne-like symphonies—the Fifth and Pathetique—is a joyous, poetic work, breathing happiness in each of its four movements.

From the beginning to the end it bubbles over with airs that ripple all the way from the first violin to the double basses. Especially lovely is the scherzo, or third movement, and after finishing this the musicians were compelled to stand and bow before the applause came to an end.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony takes place on January 13, when Micha Elman will be the assisting artist.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
DEC 12 190

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

While admiring, as one always must admire, the playing of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, admiration was marred in a degree by the feeling that Mr. Fiedler was temporarily pursued by the demon of haste. In two numbers of the programme the extreme speed which he cultivated worked little harm and even helped to display the technical virtuosity of the musicians from Boston. But that virtuosity is known and appreciated in New York, and it is worse than idle to sacrifice higher qualities for the sake of its display, as we fear Mr. Fiedler has done on this visit. The numbers in question were the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and the third movement of Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor—the much admired composition in which the band of viols is made to put on an antic disposition and play the part of a gigantic mandolin. Smetana's overture now belongs properly to the theatre in New York and could be spared from the concert room; but our visitors remain as indifferent to local doings and conditions as our local conductors do to the gifts which are brought from foreign parts; and so we are frequently invited to institute comparisons when it would be pleasanter to enjoy variety. In the first and fourth movements of the symphony there was occasionally a stirring of the spirit of unrest and a lack of contrast. The Boston Orchestra has frequently played the composition better and so have local organizations; but the pizzicato ostinato evoked much applause and may thus have attained its end. The other orchestral work, with which the concert was brought to a close, was the overture to "Rienzi." In the middle of the programme (which it might be wished had been preserved by Mr. Fiedler for places less generously provided with miscellaneous concerts than New York) there was a mixture of the admirable and deplorable—and it was the latter element which aroused the greater enthusiasm. It would be well if the confession alone would suffice. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang the scene and air, "Ecco il punto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" as young singers and a public still fairly familiar with some of the traditions of the Mozart style ought never to be permitted to hear it sung. And she also sang "O ma Lyre immortelle," from Gounod's "Sapho," and evoked a second storm of frenetic applause. A pity that a voice of such opulent beauty should be used so inartistically. Fortunately, her Mozart air was followed at once by an illustration of what cantabile is. M. Longy played an archaic concerto for oboe by Handel—played it with a ravishing tone and a perfection of phrasing which ought to have set those whose hands were still tingling from ill advised applause to thinking.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CITY
DEC 1

Standing out clearly as the one brig number of an otherwise intensely dull program, Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite was gratefully received at the second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie Hall on December 9th. Following Vincent D'Indy's disconnected depressing symphony in B Flat and Olga Samaroff's technically brilliant but colorless playing of the Schumann Concerto in A Minor, this delightful ballet music, magnificently played as it was, did much to revive a thoroughly worn out audience. But why his hearers must endure one hour of intense gloom in order to be rewarded with a few moments of unalloyed pleasure, is something only Mr. Fiedler can answer. From an educational standpoint, possibly, some excuse can be found for D'Indy's symphony, since it shows clearly along what lines the modern French composers are working. But it is extremely doubtful if even Mr. Fiedler's masterful handling could ever make this work acceptable.

M. S. R.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CITY
DEC 12 1909

Elman's first appearances of the season will be Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week on the 19th he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday evenings, February 13, 20 and 27, and on March 3 he will be the soloist at the closing concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

TIMES
New York City.
DEC 1[illegible] 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Inspiring Presentation of Vincent D'Indy's Second Symphony.

VINCENT D'INDY'S second symphony, played on Thursday night, and wonderfully played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can hardly be said to have conquered more admiration than it did when it was played here before, twice in the year 1905. During the period that has elapsed since then, at least one of the forces that might have militated strongly against its acceptance by the intelligent musical public has been diminished in its influence. That is the strangeness of the musical idiom in which the composer's ideas were conceived and in which he has cast them in this work. He has gone over heart and soul to the tendencies of the contemporary French school of composers most conspicuously represented at present by Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel. He was not always so minded, and there are earlier works of his that move the good old-fashioned tonalities and harmonies that served Wagner. Nobody could possibly accuse Mr. d'Indy of anything like insincerity in the change that has come over his style; and it may be assumed that his art has made a natural growth to its present position.

The tonal combinations and progressions that the modern Frenchmen deal with have become familiar enough now to those who follow music in its public performances. The augmented harmonic intervals, the lack of definite tonality in the older sense, the unusual melodic progressions that ignore the usual divisions of the diatomic scale—all these things have become familiar in the works of Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel, Fauré, that have been heard here. Some of them are able to make use of this material with effects of transporting beauty, as Debussy does in many, many pages of his "Pelléas et Mélisande." D'Indy himself wrought in it with splendid eloquence and dignity in his string quartet. Many things that once seemed impossible, wearying discord, purposeless ugliness, have compelled acceptance by the unwilling ear. There is much that seems still irreconcilable with beauty in some of Debussy's work, as his orchestral piece entitled "The Sea"; and the Spanish suite of Ravel's that Mr. Damrosch played the other day has plenty of matter that seems simply like unsuccessful experiment. D'Indy's symphony has passages of strained unpleasantness, deliberately calculated, so it seems, to work out to their utmost in it the harmonic combinations that fall so distressingly upon the ear.

D'Indy is one whose attitude is austere toward that which would strike his hearers as sensuously beautiful. He is apparently very little concerned with this. He is a "cerebral," and is more interested in pushing a principle to its logical outcome than to gain adherence for it by mollifying methods. As has already been said in these columns, he seems to be one who would reconstitute our ears, to force the acceptance of sounds that now seem so malignant and impossible. There is every reason derived from experience to believe that he or some other like him may succeed, as in fact they are succeeding. The history of music for three hundred years or more is an exemplification of how the feeling for harmony has been enlarged and how sounds that once were impossible have become not only possible but poignantly expressive, and a source of aesthetic delight. New departures in harmony are like vice, a monster of frightful mien. They need only to be heard often enough, when we first endure then pity, then embrace. How long is it since Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration," "Till Eulenspiegel," were considered incomprehensible, repulsive, vulgar, a bewildering mass of cacophony, purely as music and without regard to what the composer's ulterior purpose was in them? Their harmony was sour and distressing, and was accounted for by the most fantastic perversions of the terms which the harmony theorists use. Yet, to-day, are not these pieces welcome additions to the programmes of orchestras able to play them? And if they are stirring to the musical pulse, they no longer distress and puzzle the musical understanding. How many years ago is it since Eduard Hanslick called Tschaikowsky's violin concerto "stinking" music? It is no longer malodorous in the hands of violinists able to master its dificulties. There is no need to recall what was done and said about Wagner's music for fifty years, nor how that which bewildered, dazed, enraged, and infuriated, has ended by ravishing and delighting. It is Wagner's harmony that first and foremost did the one and the other.

Less easy is it to think of Robert Schumann as one who undermined and destroyed all the foundations of the beautiful in music; yet there was nothing too severe to be said about his music by the English critics, chief among whom was Henry F. Chorley. He found his symphonies "centos of common phrases and rejected chords," presented with "courageous eccentricity and pretension." And then, alas, he goes into the analogy of Beethoven's works, misunderstood in the beginning, to be recognized at their true value by a later and repentant reconsideration:

> The listener who cannot be charmed, says this critic of light and leading, speaking of Schumann's B flat symphony, is sure to be reminded how the great works of Beethoven were misjudged at the outset of his career. But the examples are not parallel. Beethoven's works were for a while misunderstod, I venture to reply, because they were novel. The works of Dr. Schumann will by certain hearers be forever disliked because they tell us nothing that we have not known before, though we might not have thought it worth listening to.

Or shall we recall the anger that Mozart aroused when he wrote into the introduction of his C major quartet harmonies and harmonic sequences that his contemporaries knew not? Mozart was no reformer, and only in a limited degree an innovator, but these few measures brought ire upon him, which we may be able to understand to-day, even though we cannot put ourselves into a sympathetic attitude toward it.

If we go back to the time of Palestrina and his contemporaries we reach a style of music in which no dissonance whatever was allowed without "preparation"; when the chord of the dominant seventh, which has been the indispensable harmonic material of all the music we know as "modern," was not known and not used. Every advance toward this commonplace of today was opposed as a subversion of the beauty, dignity, and purity of the art, from the time when Monteverde was accused of losing sight of the true object of music—"to give pleasure." And how could pleasure be given by the introduction of strange new combinations of tones sounding together, which the ear had never heard before? The experience had not yet been undergone of what might be made to "please." Mozart said, many years later, "Music, even in the most terrible situations, ought never to offend the ear, but should still delight it, and never cease to be music." Excellent dictum, but how apply it as an infallible criterion? Old Galuppi, when Charles Burney visited him in Venice in 1770, gave his English visitor a definition of good music which he thought "admirable, and, though short, comprehensive." It consisted, he said, of "beauty, clearness, and good modulation." Yet it may be seriously questioned whether he would have found one of these qualities in the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," unless he could have been taken quickly through a hundred years of training before he was set down before an orchestra to hear it. Nor would Mozart, probably, have thought that in the finale of "Götterdämmerung," a "terrible situation," music was remaining music, or was pleasing his ear, unless he, too, had bridged over a hundred years of change.

It is very easy to prove too much by reflection upon the lessons of musical history. We may be pretty certain that our likes and dislikes, especially our dislikes, will not remain a criterion of excellence very long, even for ourselves. Most people may bring themselves to a consciousness of a change, a development. But we may also be sure that anything that sounds bad to-day is not necessarily going to sound good to-morrow. The only thing that counts is a sincere reckoning with one's own artistic conscience.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York Ci
Date DEC 12 1909

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony's Concert.

In its matinee concert yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered so large and varied a musical bill the public could not resist the proferred temptation, and stormed the box office of Carnegie Hall. Every seat in the house was occupied shortly after the time of beginning, and there were plenty of standees.

Perhaps the principal atraction, at least in the minds of many, was the appearance of the beloved contralto, Mme. Schumann-Heink. She came forward twice, contributing two big numbers. Georges Longy, the Boston orchestra's famous oboe player, represented the most interesting single feature of the afternoon to others.

Then there was the special appeal of the programme. Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," which opened the afternoon, has become popular here through the interpretative medium of Mahler's art. The next number, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, made familiar by the Russian Symphony Orchestra and the authoritative hand of Wasilly Safonoff, had been withheld from public hearing just long enough to sharpen the appetite. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, coming after the solo offerings, with its martial strains, rounded out the list appropriately, no excessive strain having been put on the intelligence of the listener at any time.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was heard in the recitative "Now, Vitellia!" and Rondo, "Never shall Hymen," from Mozart's "Titus," and in the Stanzas of Sappho from Gounod's opera "Sappho," was in superb voice and sang as only she can sing, with a combination of dramatic power and lightness of execution that amazed and delighted. She was contralto, mezzo-soprano, dramatic soprano, lyric soprano and coloratura soprano all in one. Her deep tones had richness, energy, force; her high notes, though not as free and open in quality, were wonderfully under control and capable of astonishing dynamic flexibility.

Not many in the audience were accustomed to the oboe as a solo instrument. Much as the average listener may have enjoyed Handel's delightful concerto for that instrument, with accompaniment of strings and piano, he hardly realized what an extraordinary artistic achievement Georges Longy put to his credit by a performance that technically and musically was impeccable.

Tschaikowsky's symphony was given in a way that exposed brilliantly the euphony, quick responsiveness and technical proficiency of the Boston orchestra, that showed up this wonderful aggregation of musicians clearly as a band of virtuosi. After the pizzicato scherzo, taken at a more rapid tempo than that established by Safonoff and the Philharmonic Orchestra, Fiedler asked all his men to rise in response to the applause. The reading of the symphony, in most respects, was an admirable one, though it lacked some of the robust Slavonic humor and emotional throb that Safonoff infused into this music.

SUN
[illegible]
[illegible]ress New York City.
e

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy Provide Solo Numbers.

The second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon boasted of generous variety of style in its programme. It began with that sparkling, exhilarating glass of musical champagne, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture. After this came the feverish imagery of the first movement of the F minor concerto of Tschaikowsky. This does not mean that the remainder of the symphony was not played but that the adjective feverish would not apply to all of it.

The symphony is so familiar that no account of its character is required at this time. Suffice it to say that it was beautifully performed according to the elegant and finished manner of the Boston orchestra. Doubtless nothing in its presentation moved the audience more than the amazing swiftness, dexterity and clearness with which the pizzicato ostinato was played. This was a feat of orchestral virtuosity such as this town has rarely heard.

Two soloists were in the field, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the sollo oboist of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang once again that air from Mozart's "Titus" which she has made especially her own and which she sang yesterday as no one else sings it or might wish to sing it. She was heard also in some music by Gounod.

Mr. Longy played Handel's concerto for oboe. It was a real treat in purity of tone, musicianship, finish and gentle nuance that Mr. Longy gave his hearers, and he was warmly applauded.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
[illegible] JOURNAL
From
Address
Date DEC 12

Konzerte.

Mischa Elman, der russische Violinist, der in letzter Saison mit so großem Erfolg hier spielte, wird in der gegenwärtigen Saison in 16 Konzerten mit dem Boston Symphony Orchester spielen. Zwei dieser Konzerte werden in unserer Stadt gegeben werden. Später wird Elman mit dem Russischen Symphonie-Orchester hier spielen.

York, 1

WORLD
[illegible]
ess New York City.
DEC 12 190

MATINEE CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy Soloists of Long but Attractive Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

There were two soloists at the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon—Mme. Schumann-Heink, who sang for the first time this season, and Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra.

The programme, though rather long, was more attractive than that presented on Thursday night, as Tschaikowsky, whose Fourth Symphony was the orchestral feature of the programme, is surely better worth hearing than Vincent d'Indy.

The opening number, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, was played with great dash and brio. A little hurried in tempo, as I thought, which made the running counterpoints sound somewhat confused, but still a brilliant performance.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was dramatic and forcible, lucid in the exposition of the rhythmic, melodic materials and fiery in climax.

A little dry of mood, perhaps, as in the Andantino, and missing something of the inner tragic subtlety of a work which begins and ends in the almost sardonic "Fate" theme, with the announcement that Fate rules our lives, [illegible] and struggle as we may. The orchestra played magnificently; the third movement, Pizzicato Ostinato, as a bit of orchestral bravura I have seldom heard equalled, and the prolonged applause showed that the audience was fully alive to its unusual excellence.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the programme was the Handel concerto for oboe and string orchestra, the solo part of which was delightfully played by M. Longy.

It is easy to understand the absolute supremacy of the Boston Orchestra when from out of its ranks can step a soloist of the artistic calibre of M. Longy, as displayed by his work yesterday.

The oboe is a somewhat unusual solo instrument, as its striking individuality of tone is so marked that great variety of tone color is not obtainable from it, and it therefore is apt to become monotonous. But the pure oboe tone, sweet, full and expressive in quality, which M. Longy produced, combined with his rare technical facility and artistic appreciation, made the quaint Handelian number decidedly attractive.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, with her wonderful range and quality of voice and beauty of tone unimpaired, sang with all her wonted finish and elegance of style and interpretive appreciation a recitative and aria, "Sextus," from Mozart's opera "Titus," and the "Stances de Sapho" from Gounod's little known opera of the same name, to great applause.

Some high staccato passages a mezza voce in the first of these numbers were simply exquisite in execution, and it struck me as something much to be wondered at that with the present dearth of contralti at both opera houses this great singer and dramatic artist should be permitted to confine her artistic usefulness to concert work alone.

A most effective performance of Wagner's rather blatant "Rienzi" overture brought to a close a programme which was by no means as long in the hearing as it looked on paper.

[92]

NEW YORK HERALD,
From
Address New York City.
Date 12

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK HEARD

She Sings with the Boston Orchestra, which Gives an Excellent Performance.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang beautifully at a concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Neither the aria from Mozart's "Titus," beginning "Nie soll mit Rosen," nor the lament from Gounod's "Sapho" gave much scope for her vocal art or her instinct for dramatic expression, but she sang both with such exquisite taste that the audience brought her back to the stage many times.

The other soloist of the afternoon, Mons. Georges Lougy, played an oboe concerto by Handel. It was more curious than beautiful, but nevertheless it had a certain quaint charm about its three short movements and it was capitally done.

Mr. Fiedler's orchestral programme consisted of the overture to "The Bartered Bride," Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and the "Rienzi" overture.

The orchestra again distinguished itself by a performance of remarkable brilliancy. The symphony, in particular, was played with a perfection of tone and technical finish that aroused the house to enthusiasm. After the scherzo the musicians rose at Mr. Fiedler's request and bowed their acknowledgment of the applause.

EVENING POST
From
Address New York City.
Date

Saturday and Sunday Concerts.

They call it "The Sold Bride" in Boston, but by any other name the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" sounds as well when it is played as merrily as the Boston Orchestra played it on Saturday. The symphony was the fourth composed by the immortal Russian melodist, Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky; in its performance the orchestra executed a special stunt by the marvellous precision and speed of the pizzicato ostinato, in which all the strings are plucked instead of bowed. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture was played in heroic fashion, and Mr. Longy played a quaint Handel concerto for oboe delightfully. What the audience, however, enjoyed and applauded most was the great voice and the rare art of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who sang an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and "O ma lyre immortelle" from Gounod's "Sapho"—an opera, by the way, which it would be interesting to hear, for comparison with Massenet's. Gounod must have thought a good deal of this work of his, since he recast and rewrote it twice, the second time thirty-three years after its first production, in 1851.

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.
DEC 13 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS TSCHAIKOWSKY'S FOURTH.

Max Fiedler may not be an ideal programme maker, but as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he is proving himself worthy of his illustrious predecessors. It was a beautiful pronouncement of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony that he and his band made at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The programme began with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" and ended with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The soloists were Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, first oboeist of the orchestra. The singer chose her old favorite, the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." She was enthusiastically received. Mr. Longy played most artistically in Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, although the instrument for solo purposes seems strange to modern ears.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
New York City.
DEC 13 1909

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, superbly performed by the Boston Symphony at the Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall, was a feast in itself. Add to that Mme. Schumann-Heink in arias by Mozart and Gounod, the overtures to "The Bartered Bride" and to "Rienzi," to say nothing of a concerto for oboe, and the listener had a veritable feast, pressed down and overflowing.

STAATS ZEITUNG
New York City.
DEC 18 1909

Das Smetanasche Juwel, die Ouverture aus der „Verkauften Braut", fand im letzten Konzert der Bostoner eine prächtige Wiedergabe. Herr Fiedler dirigirte das geistreiche, formvollendete, erquicklich heitere Stück, dieses Muster graziösen Satzbaues, mit sichtlichem Behagen, das sich auch den Zuhörern mittheilte, zudem das Orchester dem reizvollen Musikstück eine leichte, huschende und virtuose Ausführung zu Theil werden ließ, die entzückte. Wie sich die abgerissenen Fragmente der Skalen D-Moll und F-Dur zu 5 Tönen erweitern, diese und jene Stimme dazutritt, um kanonisch verarbeitet zu werden, dieses zierliche und feinkomische Auf- und Abwiegen, das ganze heitere Spiel des Prestissimo, das so duftig genommen wurde, und in dem doch jede Figuration so deutlich und bestimmt konturirt erklang, das mußte man gestern in dieser bravourös-stilistischen Ausführung auf das Höchste bewundern.

Eine sehr gute Ausführung fand die Tschaikowsky'sche Symphonie No. 4 in F-Moll, aus der wir besonders den dritten Satz herausheben wollen. Die drei Gruppen des Orchesters kommen zuerst separat, um sich erst zum Schlusse zu vereinigen, und die Streicher erklingen in pizzicato ostinato. Das war trefflich vorbereitet und schön entwickelt. Den letzten Satz nahm Herr Fiedler etwas schnell. Wenn dadurch auch etwas von der Safonoff'schen „Steppenstimmung", die uns noch im Sinn liegt, verloren ging, so diente das beschwingtere Zeitmaß doch dazu, die etwas dicke und mäßige Instrumentation dieses Finales weniger starr erscheinen zu lassen. Alle Gruppen erklangen in vollendeter Bravour, wie wir es von den Bostonern gewohnt sind.

An Frau Schumann-Heink's reifer Kunst durfte man sich wieder mit Wonne erfreuen, denn die Künstlerin war einfach großartig bei Stimme und Laune, und spielte mit den schwierigsten Gesangsproblemen mit einer Leichtigkeit, die an das bekannte „Glas Wasser trinken" gemahnte. Das bekannte Rezitativ und die Arie aus Mozart's „Titus", ein brillantes Repertoirestück der Künstlerin, imponirte wieder durch den bewunderungswürdigen Stil, die große, plastische Linie und die Füllung mit edelstem Ton. Dergleichen singt der Künstlerin keine nach. Mit entzückender Feinheit und subtilster Wirkung sang Frau Schumann-Heink hierauf die „Stanzen der Sapho" aus Gounod's Oper „Sapho". Das Publikum tief sie begeistert achtmal hervor, aber die Künstlerin ließ sich die im Rahmen eines Symphonie-Konzerts einmal nicht übliche Zugabe weder abschmeicheln, noch abtrotzen.

Der zweite Solist der Veranstaltung war der verdienstvolle erste Oboist des Orchesters, Herr Longy, ein Künstler von größter Bedeutung auf seinem Instrument. Er spielte mit Streicherbegleitung Händel's recht veraltet klingendes Concert für Oboe und Streicher. Er meisterte sowohl die krausen Figurationen als das breite Largo mit prächtigen Ton, einer sichter tadellosen Intonation und durchgeistigten Technik, Eigenschaften, die volle Bewunderung würdig sind. Er wurde lebhaft gefeiert. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN'S COUNTRY.
From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date DEC 18 1909

The second pair of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on Thursday evening, December ninth, and the following Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall. At the first concert, D'Indy's Symphony in B flat major was performed. It is a brilliant and poignant composition, illustrating to the full, modern French orchestration; it had been heard twice before in New York, the composer himself conducting it in December, 1905. Schumann's beautiful pianoforte concerto in A minor and Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" suite were also heard. Mme. Olga Samaroff, of charming appearance, was the soloist, playing the concerto with a fluent technic and graceful style; the Schumannesque spirit she failed to impart to it. The Saturday concert was an especially fine one, the inspiration of artistic perfection was poured into each number by orchestra and soloists, of which latter there were two, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Lengy, and the distinguished leader, Mr. Max Fiedler conducted.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS—Continued

EVENING SUN,
New York City.
DEC 27

New Year audiences are to hear the New York Symphony Orchestra at the New Theatre on Jan. 2, and at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 4. The Volpe Orchestra plays on Jan. 9 at Carnegie Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns here on Jan. 13 and 15, with Mischa Elman.

[93]

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADV
Address New York City
DEC 14

The Boston Symphony.

A PROGRAMME that might be called miscellaneous, for its variety was rather greater than logical consistency, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler at its second afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The opening number was Smetana's sparkling overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride." Then followed the symphony, Tschaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, after which came three solo numbers, an aria from Mozart's "Titus," a concerto by Handel for oboe and string orchestra, and the "Stances de Sapho," from Gounod's opera of that name. The overture to "Rienzi" was the concluding number. Mme Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy were the soloists. The audience completely filled the house, and there was such enthusiasm as is to be expected when familiar works are played with such vigor, sonority, and finish as characterized the Boston orchestra's performance at this concert.

The display of the consummate virtuosity of the orchestra was, in fact, the salient feature of the concert. The Smetana overture has been played rarely with such velocity and deftness. In the symphony there were many passages where the players distinguished themselves. Most notable of these was the first theme of the scherzo, played pizzicato by all the strings. Such absolute precision and delicate shading as was displayed here comes only of the greatest technical excellence and most efficient drilling. Also notable were the solos for the wind instruments in the andantino; they were delightful in their tone quality and expressive phrasing. The symphony was read by Mr. Fiedler in a vigorous and eloquent manner. There were splendidly wrought climaxes in the first movement, and the clarity that was obtained in its tumultuous working out section was worthy of comment.

Mme Schumann-Heink received a most hearty reception from the audience, and was recalled after her solos many times. She sang with the artistic intelligence for which she is distinguished. Mr. Longy gave a masterly performance of the Handel concerto. The beautiful, silvery tone that he produced from the instrument and his finished phrasing were a delight.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
VOGUE.
NEW YORK 6111
DEC 18 1909

In the concert field we have had the Olive Mead Quartet, giving its first concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall before a large and justly appreciative gathering; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the New York Symphony, with Walter Damrosch conducting; the Philharmonic Society, at whose head Gustav Mahler now stands; the Volpe Symphony Orchestra; the Kneisel Quartet; the Young People's Symphony concerts; the Oratorio Society in that great work of Beethoven's in D, about which we shall have something in detail next week; Teresa Carreño in a piano recital, and a recital by Rachmaninoff; another by Yolando Mero, and still another by Pepito Arriola, a boy of twelve who plays the piano like a man of thirty.

CABLE ADDRESS "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK AMERICAN
Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date DEC 31 1909

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13th, and Saturday afternoon, January 15th respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
New York City.
DEC 31 1909

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

New York City.
JAN 2- 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist.

The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony "Eroica," Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A flat major and the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra.

WORLD
New York City
JAN 2- 1910

Boston Symphony.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's Symphony, "Eroica," Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and Dukas's, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A-flat major and the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe." Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
JAN 2 1910

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica;" Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A-flat major, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.

TIMES
New York City.
JAN 2- 1910

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist.

The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin, and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A flat major, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the
From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address NEW YORK
Date JAN 2

Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Das nächste Konzertpaar des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler Donnerstag, den 13. Januar Abend und Samstag, den 15. Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Der Solist der beiden Konzerte ist Herr Mischa Elman, welcher das Tschaikowsky'sche, resp. das Beethoven'sche Violinkonzert mit Orchester spielen wird. Herr Fiedler dirigirt am Donnerstag Beethoven's „Eroica" und Dukas' „Zauberlehrling" und am Samstag das Vorspiel zum „Lohengrin", Elgar's Erste Symphonie und Weber's Euryanthe-Ouverture.

Das nächste Konzert der New York Symphonie-Gesellschaft ist für kommenden Dinstag Abend in Carnegie Hall mit folgendem Programm angekündigt: Schumann, Dritte Symphonie („Rheinische"), Goldmark, Scherzo op. 45, Strauß, „Don Juan" und Grieg, A-Moll Piano-Konzert mit Frau Carreño als Solistin.

From NEW YORK HERALD,

Address New York City.

Date

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK HEARD

She Sings with the Boston Orchestra, which Gives an Excellent Performance.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang beautifully at a concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Neither the aria from Mozart's "Titus," beginning "Nie soll mit Rosen," nor the lament from Gounod's "Sapho" gave much scope for her vocal art or her instinct for dramatic expression, but she sang both with such exquisite taste that the audience brought her back to the stage many times.

The other soloist of the afternoon, Mons. Georges Lougy, played an oboe concerto by Handel. It was more curious than beautiful, but nevertheless it had a certain quaint charm about its three short movements and it was capitally done.

Mr. Fiedler's orchestral programme consisted of the overture to "The Bartered Bride," Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and the "Rienzi" overture.

The orchestra again distinguished itself by a performance of remarkable brilliancy. The symphony, in particular, was played with a perfection of tone and technical finish that aroused the house to enthusiasm. After the scherzo the musicians rose at Mr. Fiedler's request and bowed their acknowledgment of the applause.

From EVENING POST

Address New York City.

Date

Saturday and Sunday Concerts.

They call it "The Sold Bride" in Boston, but by any other name the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" sounds as well when it is played as merrily as the Boston Orchestra played it on Saturday. The symphony was the fourth composed by the immortal Russian melodist, Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky; in its performance the orchestra executed a special stunt by the marvellous precision and speed of the pizzicato ostinato, in which all the strings are plucked instead of bowed. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture was played in heroic fashion, and Mr. Longy played a quaint Handel concerto for oboe delightfully. What the audience, however, enjoyed and applauded most was the great voice and the rare art of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who sang an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and "O ma lyre immortelle" from Gounod's "Sapho"—an opera, by the way, which it would be interesting to hear, for comparison with Massenet's. Gounod must have thought a good deal of this work of his, since he recast and rewrote it twice, the second time thirty-three years after its first production, in 1851.

From EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

DEC 13 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS TSCHAIKOWSKY'S FOURTH.

Max Fiedler may not be an ideal programme maker, but as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he is proving himself worthy of his illustrious predecessors. It was a beautiful pronouncement of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony that he and his band made at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The programme began with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" and ended with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. The soloists were Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, first oboeist of the orchestra. The singer chose her old favorite, the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." She was enthusiastically received. Mr. Longy played most artistically in Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, although the instrument for solo purposes seems strange to modern ears.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

DEC 13 1909

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, superbly performed by the Boston Symphony at the Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall, was a feast in itself. Add to that Mme. Schumann-Heink in arias by Mozart and Gounod, the overtures to "The Bartered Bride" and to "Rienzi," to say nothing of a Handel concerto for oboe, and the listeners had a veritable feast, pressed down and overflowing.

From STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

DEC 18 1909

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das Smetana'sche Juwel, die Ouverture aus der „Verkauften Braut", fand im letzten Konzert der Bostoner eine prächtige Wiedergabe. Herr Fiedler dirigirte das geistreiche, formvollendete, erquicklich heitere Stück, dieses Muster graziösen Satzbaues, mit sichtlichem Behagen, das sich auch den Zuhörern mittheilte, zudem das Orchester dem reizvollen Musikstück eine leichte, huschende und virtuose Ausführung zu Theil werden ließ, die entzückte. Wie sich die abgerissenen Fragmente der Skalen D-Moll und F-Dur zu 5 Tönen erweitern, diese und jene Stimme dazutritt, um kanonisch verarbeitet zu werden, dieses zierliche und feinkomische Auf- und Abwiegen, das ganze heitere Spiel des Prestissimo, das so duftig genommen wurde, und in dem doch jede Figuration so deutlich und bestimmt konturirt erklang, das mußte man gestern in dieser bravourös-stilistischen Ausführung auf das Höchste bewundern.

Eine sehr gute Ausführung fand die Tschaikowsky'sche Symphonie No. 4 in F-Moll, aus der wir besonders den dritten Satz herausheben wollen. Die drei Gruppen des Orchesters kommen zuerst separat, um sich erst zum Schlusse zu vereinigen, und die Streicher erklingen in pizzicato ostinato. Das war trefflich vorbereitet und schön entwickelt. Den letzten Satz nahm Herr Fiedler etwas schnell. Wenn dadurch auch etwas von der Safonoff'schen „Steppenstimmung", die uns noch im Sinn liegt, verloren ging, so diente das beschwingtere Zeitmaß doch dazu, die etwas dicke und mäßige Instrumentation dieses Finales weniger starr erscheinen zu lassen. Alle Gruppen erklangen in vollendeter Bravour, wie wir es von den Bostonern gewohnt sind.

An Frau Schumann-Heink's reifer Kunst durfte man sich wieder mit Wonne erfreuen, denn die Künstlerin war einfach großartig bei Stimme und Laune, und spielte mit den schwierigsten Gesangsproblemen mit einer Leichtigkeit, die an das bekannte „Glas Wasser trinken" gemahnte. Das bekannte Rezitativ und die Arie aus Mozart's „Titus", ein brillantes Repertoirestück der Künstlerin, imponirte wieder durch den bewunderungswürdigen Stil, die große, plastische Linie und die Füllung mit edelstem Ton. Dergleichen singt der Künstlerin keine nach. Mit entzückender Feinheit und subtilster Wirkung sang Frau Schumann-Heink hierauf die „Stanzen der Sapho" aus Gounod's Oper „Sapho". Das Publikum rief sie begeistert achtmal hervor, aber die Künstlerin ließ sich die im Rahmen eines Symphonie-Konzerts einmal nicht übliche Zugabe weder abschmeicheln, noch abtrotzen.

Der zweite Solist der Veranstaltung war der verdienstvolle erste Oboist des Orchesters, Herr Longy, ein Künstler von größter Bedeutung auf seinem Instrument. Er spielte mit Streicherbegleitung Händel's recht veraltet klingendes Concert für Oboe und Streicher. Er meisterte sowohl die krausen Figurationen als das breite Largo mit prächtigen Ton, eine sicher tadellosen Intonation und durch geistigten Technik, Eigenschaften, die volle Bewunderung würdig sind. Er wurd lebhaft gefeiert. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date DEC 18 1909

The second pair of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on Thursday evening, December ninth, and the following Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall. At the first concert, D'Indy's Symphony in B flat major was performed. It is a brilliant and poignant composition, illustrating to the full, modern French orchestration; it had been heard twice before in New York, the composer himself conducting it in December, 1905. Schumann's beautiful pianoforte concerto in A minor and Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" suite were also heard. Mme. Olga Samaroff, of charming appearance, was the soloist, playing the concerto with a fluent technic and graceful style; the Schumannesque spirit she failed to impart to it. The Saturday concert was an especially fine one, the inspiration of artistic perfection was poured into each number by orchestra and soloists, of which latter there were two, Mme.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS—Continued

Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Lengy, and the distinguished leader, Mr. Max Fiedler conducted.

From EVENING SUN,

New York City.

DEC 31

New Year audiences are to hear the New York Symphony Orchestra at the New Theatre on Jan. 2, and at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 4. The Volpe Orchestra plays on Jan. 9 at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns here on Jan. 13 and 15, with Mischa Elman.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVE

Address New York City

DEC 1[illegible]

The Boston Symphony.

A PROGRAMME that might be called miscellaneous, for its variety was rather greater than logical consistency, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler at its second afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The opening number was Smetana's sparkling overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride." Then followed the symphony, Tschaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, after which came three solo numbers, an aria from Mozart's "Titus," a concerto by Handel for oboe and string orchestra, and the "Stances de Sapho," from Gounod's opera of that name. The overture to "Rienzi" was the concluding number. Mme Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy were the soloists. The audience completely filled the house, and there was such enthusiasm as is to be expected when familiar works are played with such vigor, sonority, and finish as characterized the Boston orchestra's performance at this concert.

The display of the consummate virtuosity of the orchestra was, in fact, the salient feature of the concert. The Smetana overture has been played rarely with such velocity and deftness. In the symphony there were many passages where the players distinguished themselves. Most notable of these was the first theme of the scherzo, played pizzicato by all the strings. Such absolute precision and delicate shading as was displayed here comes only of the greatest technical excellence and most efficient drilling. Also notable were the solos for the wind instruments in the andantino; they were delightful in their tone quality and expressive phrasing. The symphony was read by Mr. Fiedler in a vigorous and eloquent manner. There were splendidly wrought climaxes in the first movement, and the clarity that was obtained in its tumultuous working out section was worthy of comment.

Mme Schumann-Heink received a most hearty reception from the audience, and was recalled after her solos many times. She sang with the artistic intelligence for which she is distinguished. Mr. Longy gave a masterly performance of the Handel concerto. The beautiful, silvery tone that he produced from the instrument and his finished phrasing were a delight.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World VOGUE.

In the concert field we have had the Olive Mead Quartet, giving its first concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall before a large and justly appreciative gathering; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the New York Symphony, with Walter Damrosch conducting; the Philharmonic Society, at whose head Gustav Mahler now stands; the Volpe Symphony Orchestra; the Kneisel Quartet; the Young People's Symphony concerts; the Oratorio Society in that great work of Beethoven's in D, about which we shall have something in detail next week; Teresa Carreño in a piano recital, and a recital by Rachmaninoff; another by Yolando Mero, and still another by Pepito Arriola, a boy of twelve who plays the piano like a man of thirty.

From

Address

Date

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13th, and Saturday afternoon, January 15th respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

DEC 31

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist, making his first appearances of the season at this time.

From New York City.

JAN 2 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist.

The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony "Eroica," Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A flat major and the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra.

From WORLD

New York City

JAN 2 - 1910

Boston Symphony.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's Symphony, "Eroica;" Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and Dukas's, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A-flat major and the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe." Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

1910

* * *

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica;" Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A-flat major, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.

* * *

From TIMES

New York City.

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, respectively. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist.

The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin, and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A flat major, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra.

* * *

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The Largest, Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HEBREW

Address

Date JAN 2

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From

Address

Date

Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Das nächste Konzertpaar des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler Donnerstag, den 13. Januar Abend und Samstag, den 15. Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Der Solist der beiden Konzerte ist Herr Mischa Elman, welcher das Tschaikowsky'sche, resp. das Beethoven'sche Violinkonzert mit Orchester spielen wird. Herr Fiedler dirigirt am Donnerstag Beethoven's „Eroica" und Dukas' „Zauberlehrling" und am Samstag das Vorspiel zum „Lohengrin", Elgar's Erste Symphonie und Weber's Euryanthe-Ouverture.

Das nächste Konzert der New York Symphonie-Gesellschaft ist für kommenden Dinstag Abend in Carnegie Hall mit folgendem Programm angekündigt: Schumann, Dritte Symphonie („Rheinische"), Goldmark, Scherzo op. 45, Strauß, „Don Juan" und Grieg, A-Moll Piano-Konzert mit Frau Carreño als Solistin.

[93]

EVENING SUN,

New York City.

JAN 3 - 1910

Now Max Fiedler, like Damrosch and Mahler before him, is to try his hand at the little "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas. Also like Damrosch and Fred Stock of Chicago, the Boston leader and his men are playing the Elgar symphony.

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall take place next week, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both. The programme for the Thursday evening visit will comprise Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

On the Saturday afternoon programme, the orchestral numbers will be Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A-flat, Beethoven's concerto for violin and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York Ci

Date

ELMAN WITH SYMPHONY.

Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third pair of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto. The orchestral numbers on Thursday night will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as the opening number and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas. Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony orchestra will play the Elgar symphony for the first time.

EVENING POST,

ss New York City.

JAN 8 1910

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will then make his first appearances of the season in this city as soloist at both the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tchaikovsky concerto for violin and orchestra, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto. On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other numbers are the "Lohengrin" prelude and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

ess

The third pair of concerts by the Bos the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15. At both Mischa Elman will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will comprise Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica," Tschaikowsky's concert for violin, and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A flat, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman wi play Beethoven's concerto for violin

m EVE. SUN

New York City.

ress

Mischa Elman comes with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall next Thursday and Saturday to open his second American tour. The young Russian on Thursday evening will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin, with which he made his début a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto, which he gave at a Thursday concert last January.

The Boston orchestra numbers on Thursday will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The Saturday matinée will have Elgar's symphony and the overtures to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Weber's "Euryanthe."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

ess

This week brings the second visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, December 9, and in the same place next Saturday afternoon, December 11. For the evening concert the orchestra will present as assisting artist Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto. The Symphony on Thursday night will be d'Indy's No. 2, in B-flat major. This work was last heard here in December, 1905, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer himself. The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's charming "Nut Cracker" Suite. On Saturday afternoon there will be two assisting artists—Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra, and one of the finest virtuosi living. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the recitative and aria, "Sesto," from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stanzas of Sappho." The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4, in F minor.

* * *

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JAN 8 1910

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the brilliant young violinist, will make his first appearances of the season in this city as soloist at both concerts. On Thursday he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto and on Saturday the Beethoven concerto. On Thursday the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday Elgar's first symphony will be played for the first time in New York by this orchestra.

TRIBUNE

rom

ddress New York City.

JAN 9 - 191

TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on next Friday evening, offers a programme of more than usual interest. In the first place it will mark the reappearance in Brooklyn this season of Mischa Elman, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in D major, opus 61. In response to many requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn, Mr. Fielder has placed on this programme the Elgar Symphony. The other two numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

TIMES

New York City.

s

JAN 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 13, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, at 2:30 respectively. Mischa Elman will then make his first appearance of the season in this city as soloist at both the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin and orchestra, with which he made his début in New York a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony.

On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The two programmes are as follows:

Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica, opus 55.....Beethoven

Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 35.....Tschaikowsky
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (after a ballad by Goethe).....Dukas
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 15.

Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphony in A flat major, opus 55....Elgar
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 61.....Beethoven
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe".....Weber
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

PRESS

ress New York City.

JAN 9 - 1910

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, in the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening, also will bring forward Mischa Elman, whose playing made such a sensation a year ago when he appeared here with the Boston Symphony, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto. This year he will play what is considered by many the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—Beethoven's Concerto in D major, op. 61. The other numbers on the programme also will be those promised for the New York matinee.

SUN

New York City.

ess

JAN 9-

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, January 14, offers a programme of more than usual interest. In the first place it will mark the reappearance this season of Mischa Elman, whose playing and whose astounding art made such a sensation a year ago when he appeared here with the Boston Symphony. A year ago he made his début here, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto. This year he will play the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—Beethoven's concerto in D major, opus 61. In response to the many requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn Mr. Fiedler has placed on this programme the Elgar symphony, which, generally speaking, is regarded as the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years. The other two numbers on the programme will be the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe." The programme in full is as follows:

Wagner.....Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin"
Elgar.....Symphony in A flat major, opus 55
Beethoven.....Concerto for Violin and orchestra in .....D major, opus 61.
Weber.....Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

ate NEW YORK

The program for the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held in Carnegie Hall on January 13th, will comprise Beethoven's symphony "Eroica"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra and Duka's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." At the Saturday concert the orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," Elgar's Symphony in A-Flat Major and the overture to Weber's Opera "Euryanthe." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

ess

* * *

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 13, and on Saturday afternoon, January 15, respectively. Mischa Elman will make his first appearance of the season in this city as soloist at both the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin and orchestra, with which he made his debut in New York a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony. On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The full programme for Thursday evening includes Beethoven's Symphony in E flat, major (No. 3), "Eroica"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra in D major (opus 35); and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe), with Mischa Elman. On Saturday afternoon the programme will include Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin"; Elgar's symphony in A flat major (opus 55); Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra in D major (opus 61), with Mischa Elman, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

PRESS

ress New York City

JAN 9 - 1910

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will make his first appearances of the season in this city as soloist of both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto for violin and orchestra with which he made his debut in New York a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony.

On Thursday night the purely orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The matinee programme also will include Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

TIMES

m

ress New York City.

te JAN 9 - 191

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on next Friday evening, will include the Elgar Symphony. The other two numbers on the programme will be the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe." The programme in full is as follows:

Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphony in A flat major, Opus. 55.....Elgar
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Opus. 61.....Beethoven
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe".....Weber
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

HERALD

New York City.

JAN 9 - 1910

Boston's Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts here this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mr. Mischa Elman, Russian violinist, will make his first appearance of the season at these two concerts.

In the evening he will play the Tschaikowsky violin concerto with which he made his American début a year ago. The orchestral numbers, under Mr. Fiedler's direction, will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Elman will play the Beethoven violin concerto and the orchestra will be heard in the prelude to "Lohengrin," Sir Edward Elgar's A flat symphony and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

WORLD,

New York City.

ss JAN 9 - 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 13, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, at 2.30 respectively. Mischa Elman will then make his first appearances of the season in this city as soloist at both the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin and orchestra with which he made his debut in New York a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony.

On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The two programmes are: Thursday evening, Beethoven's symphony in E flat major No. 3, "Eroica," opus 55; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 35, and Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and on Saturday afternoon Wagner's prelude to the opera "Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A flat major, opus 55; Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 61, and Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe."

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York Ci

Date

Kommende Konzerte.

Der Solist der kommenden zwei Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, welche kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfinden, ist Herr Mischa Elman, welcher das Tschaikowsky'sche bezw. das Beethoven'sche Violin-Konzert zum Vortrag bringen wird. Herr Max Fiedler dirigirt im ersterwähnten Konzert Beethoven's „Eroica-Symphonie und Ducas' „Zauberlehrling", und im zweitgenannten Wagner's Vorspiel zum „Lohengrin", Elgar's Erste Symphonie op. 55 und Weber's Euryanthe-Ouverture.

TRIBUNE

ress New York City.

JAN 9 - 1910

On Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next concert in the opera house. Mischa Elman will appear as an assisting artist. On Saturday evening F. Hopkinson Smith will give an author's reading in the music hall. He will read selections from "Woodfire Number 3" and other short stories.

"Lohengrin," Elgar's symphony in A flat major, opus 55; Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 61, and Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe."

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADV

Address New York Ci

A CHANGE has been made in the Boston Symphony programme which will be played in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, had been announced to play the Beethoven concerto in D major. Instead of this he will play Dvorák's concerto in A minor, Opus 53.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

ess JAN 12 19

ELMAN TO PLAY DVORAK

A change has been made in the Boston Symphony programme for Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, had been announced to play the Beethoven concerto in D major. Instead of this he will play Dvorak's concerto in A minor (opus 53).

[94]

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. Mischa Elman will make his first appearances of the season in this city as soloist at both the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin and orchestra, with which he made his debut in New York a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto, which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony.

On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and Dukas's scherza, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 13.

Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica." Op. 55.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 35.....Tschaikowsky
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe).....Dukas
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 15.

Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphony in A flat major, Op. 55.....Elgar
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 61.....Beethoven
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe".....Weber
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

om MORN. TELEGRAPH

ldress New York City.

JAN 10 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE TWO CONCERTS

First on January 13, the Second on January 15—Mischa Elman Will Be the Soloist.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15. Mischa Elman will then make his first appearance of the season in this city as soloist, at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin and orchestra, with which he made his debut a year ago, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto which he played at the Thursday evening concert last January with the Boston Symphony.

On Thursday night the orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." On Saturday afternoon New York will have its first opportunity of hearing Elgar's symphony played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The two programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 13.

Beethoven—Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Eroica," opus 55.
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra in D-Major, opus 35.
Dukaz—Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (after a ballad by Goethe).
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 15.

Wagner—Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin."
Elgar—Symphony in A-flat Major, opus 55.
Beethoven—Concerto for violin and orchestra in D-Major, opus 61.
Weber—Overture to the opera "Euryanthe."
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

EVENING POST,

From

Address New York City.

JAN 11 191

Date

A change has been made in the Boston Symphony programme, which will be played in Carnegie Hall on next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, had been announced to play the Beethoven Concerto. Instead of this he will play Dvorák's concerto in A minor. Thanks!

om SUN,

ldress New York City.

JAN 12 19

Mrs. Taft Attends a Concert.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11.—Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the National Theatre this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Anderson; her sister-in-law and niece, Mrs. Charles Taft and Miss Taft; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Mrs. John Hays Hammond.

TIMES

New York City.

JAN 9 1910

Change Boston Symphony Programme.

A change has been made in the Boston Symphony programme which will be played in Carnegie Hall on next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, has been announced to play the Beethoven Concerto in D major. Instead of this he will play Dvorák's Concerto in A minor, opus 53.

The Juice of Four Lemons in your bath will improve your complexion.—Adv.

n MORN. TELEGRAPH

ress New York City.

e

A change has been made in the Boston Symphony programme, which will be played in Carnegie Hall on next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, had been announced to play the Beethoven Concerto in D-major. Instead of this he will play Dvorak's Concerto in A-minor, opus 53.

EVE. SUN

ess New York City.

MRS. TAFT ATTENDS A CONCERT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12.—Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the National Theatre yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Anderson; her sister-in-law and niece, Mrs. Charles Taft and Miss Taft; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Mrs. John Hays Hammond.

WORLD,

New York City.

JAN 13 1910

Change in Boston Symphony Programme.

A change has been made in the programme for the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman, the soloist, had been announced to play the Beethoven concerto in D major. Instead he will play Dvorak's concerto in A minor, opus 53.

rom EVE. MAIL

ddress New York City.

ate

There will be a change in the Boston Symphony programme on Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will play Dvorak's concerto in A minor instead of the Beethoven concerto, as announced.

ork, 1

om MORN. TELEGRAPH

ldress New York City.

te JAN 14 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Max Fiedler Conducts Beethoven's Third Symphony — Mischa Elman, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—that perfect instrument of musical expression—was heard last night at Carnegie Hall in an admirably selected and executed programme.

The symphony given was Beethoven's "Eroica," to the majesty of which a noble justice was done.

Mr. Fiedler, who conducted, understands that which may be called the classic spirit, but he has also realized that a vigorous expressiveness and a certain tensity of emotional utterance are in no sense incompatible with the real force and fire of that spirit.

The violinist Mischa Elman, in the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin, showed a technical mastery far beyond his nineteen years.

E. TELEGRAM

ddress New York City.

ate JAN 14 1910

EVEN as all actors aspire to a new and original reading of "Hamlet," so are all orchestra directors ambitious to do the same sort of thing for the Beethoven symphonies. Max Fiedler is no exception, as he proved last night in his reading of the "Eroica" at the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall. The big band from Boston under his direction introduced several unusual tempos, and some unusual effects, particularly in the "Funeral March"—effects that were evidently welcomed by the audience.

Mischa Elman was the soloist, making his appearance for a second American season. Again this youthful player made a deep impression on his audience. Even in the short time since his last visit, this boy of nineteen has grown in artistic stature. His fascinating personality, his indomitable spirit, his remarkable virtuosity, all these combined to make his reading of the Tschaikowsky Violin Concerto a stirring thing, as was evidenced in the torrents of applause that followed it.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a picturesque scherzo by Dukas, which has been heard here before, brought an interesting concert to an appropriate close.

om TIMES

ldress New York City.

te

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony Given —Remarkable Playing of Mischa Elman

Mr. Fiedler put the centre of gravity at the beginning of his programme of the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was Beethoven's "Enrica" symphony. Mr. Fiedler is not to be left behind in providing "readings" of Beethoven; he provided one for this symphony that had many variations of tempo, some of them marked; many accentuations a very "dramatic" conception of the funeral march; some doubling of the wood-wind choirs, and, all in all, a general overdoing of the whole. It is effective; the results of such procedures generally are, and it stirred the audience to enthusiastic applause. Mr. Fiedler's plans were remarkable well carried out by the orchestra with the utmost precision and smoothness, and in responding to the applause he not inappropriately bowed to the orchestra himself and then summoned them to rise and acknowledge the public applause.

Mr. Mischa Elman was the soloist; he played Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. It was his first appearance in New York on his return to America.

His playing last season aroused much admiration, not unmixed with other emotions. He was an astounding virtuoso, and more than a virtuoso in his musical intelligence and keen prescience, but there were serious faults of taste in his playing—ill results of his "infant prodigy" days, not long passed, and of the inevitable damage that such a career must inflict, until it is outgrown and thrown off. Mr. Elman will arouse still more admiration on his present visit, and it will also be mingled with conflicting emotions, but to a less degree. He has advanced very materially in several ways, not only in a musical way, but even, if it were possible, in a technical. In that respect, his playing is of greater certainty and clarity than it was last year. A more extraordinary command of the technique of violin playing it is difficult to imagine. A more wonderful left hand has rarely been possessed by any player, a left hand that can compass, apparently, everything upon the fingerboard of the instrument, with an unfailing clearness, accuracy, and speed in all the extraordinary combinations of technical feats that Tschaikowski piled up in this concerto. The bow arm is of an elasticity, firmness, and power to match it. Technical accomplishment is taken for granted in virtuosos to-day, but Mr. Elman's is of an unusual sort. An almost absolute accuracy of intonation was shown in his playing last evening. At his previous visit he was known to play through a whole movement above the pitch.

There were extravagance and overindulgence in tempo rubato in his playing of Tschaikowsky's concerto; alternate hurryings and lingerings that destroyed the rhythmic definition in the first movement. In the others there was less of all this. The composition invites it; it is rhapsodical, and, especially in this first movement, has a vein of improvision; but Mr. Elman exceeded at times certain limits beyond which symmetry and coherency were damaged. These are faults that injured his playing before, and they injure it now, remarkable as it is. They are faults of exuberant youth, and it is to be expected that they will be sloughed off as this boy, now 18 or 19, reaches maturity. They were in part, no doubt, fostered by the character of the music he was playing. Some may have objected to his posturings, which are unnecessarily varied and picturesque; but these are of the same origin, and ought to find the same termination in a not distant future.

Mr. Elman was, of course, most enthusiastically applauded and recalled again and again. The concert was brought to a close with Paul Dukas's ingenious and picturesque scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," illustrating a ballad by Goethe, a piece several times played here in recent years.

SUN,

ress New York City.

JAN 14

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

MISCHA ELMAN APPEARS AS SOLOIST.

Conductor Max Fiedler Gives His Reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony —Mr. Elman Heard in Tschaikowsky Concerto—The Audience Pleased.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has come to town again and this time it has brought Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, with it. At last night's concert in Carnegie Hall the orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Paul Dukas's scherzo, entitled "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Between these numbers Mr. Elman with the support of the orchestra preformed Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin. The conductor all the time was Max Fiedler.

It was he who played Beethoven's third symphony on the orchestra. Some comments have lately been made in this place on the earnest ambition of conductors to appear as interpreters of compositions by the masters. Beethoven has long been a happy hunting ground for the interpreting conductor, and the funeral march of the "Eroica" one of his favorite fields.

Two musicians of this city, one of them a writer on music, have for some years past amused themselves by timing the length of the funeral march under different conductors. It has varied all the way from twelve to twenty-one minutes. Wagner, as we have noted before this, said, and with justice, that when a conductor had found the correct tempo he also disclosed to himself the true nature of a melody and the right way to distribute light and shade in its delivery.

Some of these conductors must have failed to find either the tempo or the nuances. Mr. Fiedler's tempo was by no means extreme. But his treatment of the light and shade showed a true interpreter's desire to lay on the colors with a large flat brush, like a scene painter washing in a sky. Here and there a streak of blazing white and here and there a splash of deep gray turned the whole into a study in something or other, but it was difficult to tell just what. It sounded at times like a Berlin impressionist's conception of the funeral march.

If this was the case with the march, it was still worse with the finale, for here the conductor had a bewildering variety of tempi and gradations, all surely designed to bring out meanings which Beethoven with wicked cunning had hidden far down in the depths of the score, where ordinary mortals could never find them.

The audience liked this, of course, for the public loves to be astonished, and when it hears familiar music played in an unfamiliar way it not unnaturally concludes that it is hearing "the hum of mighty workings." The first and third movements of the symphony were performed more nearly in accordance with traditions which have for many years withstood the assaults of determined interpreters and hence created less astonishment.

But the admirable playing of the orchestra in the scherzo aroused an enthusiasm which was fairly earned. Indeed throughout the symphony the splendid tonal qualities of the Boston organization and the finish of its technic gave pleasure even to those who could not bring themselves into entire sympathy with Mr. Fiedler's ideas about the way in which the composition ought to be read.

Mr. Elman delivered himself of a brilliant and commanding performance of the concerto. To be sure there were some personal peculiarities in his playing, not a few of which addressed themselves to the eye instead of the ear. But these could be avoided by the easy process of not looking at him. Still for a few moments at the outset there was enough to raise a question as to whether he was playing a violin solo or giving a demonstration of some new method of physical culture.

His playing of the music, however, had that brilliancy of tone and wonderful dash of style which have delighted auditors heretofore. It is no small pleasure to hear a violinist who plays with such genuine bravura, who bows with such magnificent freedom and whose finger technic is so swift and so certain.

Further than this it can be said that Mr. Elman has the fundamental traits of a beautiful cantilena, but here he often spoils his art by youthful affectations which he will surely abandon as he matures. Too often also this gifted young violinist distorts his rhythms. This is a serious fault in musicianship, and before Mr. Elman can rise to the highest pinnacle of mastership he will have to learn to reverence the letter of the law.

But where such a real genius for the violin exists and is plainly coupled with so much real temperament it is safe to say that only too facile success can prevent the perfect development of gifts as rare as they are admirable. Mr. Elman is already a master violinist. His friends will hope to see him a monarch among artists.

PRESS
New York City.
JAN 14 1910

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

The Boston Symphony.

Mischa Elman's wide popularity in New York was attested last night in Carnegie Hall when he made his first appearance of the season as soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert. An audience that occupied every available seat in the huge auditorium and much of the standing room had come to hear the young violinist, and this large gathering gave him a welcome such as few artists nowadays receive.

The applause came quick and sharp when Elman first stepped out upon the stage with short, energetic stride, face turned upward saucily, and there were several attempts to interrupt Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D minor, in which he chose to reintroduce himself to New Yorkers, with spontaneous demonstrations of approval.

Nine times the crowd recalled the temperamental little Russian after the spirited end of the concerto, and the noise only was stopped by audible demands for silence from those who were impatient to hear the last number on the list.

It was evident the audience not only admired Mischa's whole-souled and vigorous playing, but felt attracted by his personality. In his whole bearing and deportment he seemed so frankly boyish, so healthy, so robust and so sure of his own strength. When he shook hands with Conductor Fiedler he showed his thanks in the expression of his face; when he whispered a word of grateful acknowledgment to the concertmaster, Willy Hess, his manner betokened genuine feeling, and when he bowed to the applauding musicians of the orchestra he was all aglow with happiness.

Elman felt happier, though, at the close of the performance, when the ordeal of his first appearance since last season was over, than at the opening. With all the assurance of his manner, he showed decided signs of nervousness not only in his rapid, sudden movements, but in the work of his fingers and right arm. In the opening allegro moderato Elman's playing was technically below his usual standard. His intonation in double stopping left something to be desired; his tone at times lacked its customary resonance and his rhythm was somewhat eccentric. But the young violinist found himself again in the cadenza, and after that played with all the eloquence of tone, temperamental abandon and irresistible snap that has made him so popular.

Whatever Elman stands for as an artist, he is at the same time intensely human, and that explains his favor with the public. Let us hope the admiration he now inspires will not turn his head and halt future progress. In art there is no standing still. If there is no progress, retrogression is sure to follow.

It was daring of Fiedler to present two orchestral numbers that Mahler had already brought forward in the Philharmonic Society's concerts here. With all due respect to the Boston Orchestra's euphony and finished playing, comparison inevitably injured the impression of Fiedler's readings.

After Mahler's wonderfully vivid reading on November 6 of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, a reading marked by strongly dramatic contrasts and the most exquisite attention to melodic phrasing, Fiedler's interpretation sounded rigid, flat, monotonous. The first movement, as a fact, was rhythmically cut and dried.

The second movement ("Marcia Funebre") was taken too slowly. The scherzo, and its trio, too, were played in a tempo faster than that adopted by Mahler. And the finale was lacking in dynamic shading, in flexibility of rhythm, in expressive nuance and in climax.

Dukas's clever tone-poem, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," also sounded tame compared to the rhythmically tingling performance given by Mahler and the Philharmonic Society, but it revealed the rich sonority and mellowness of the Boston orchestra to advantage.

At Saturday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mischa Elman will perform Dvorak's concerto in A minor, opus 53, instead of the Beethoven concerto as originally announced.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City
Date JAN 14 1910

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Das gestern Abend vor ausverkauftem Saal in Carnegie Hall abgehaltene Symphonie-Concert unserer populären Bostoner Gäste gestaltete sich zu einem Vollakkord des Erfolgs. Herr Fiedler dirigirte Beethoven's „Eroica" und Dukas' „Zauberlehrling", beides mit reifer Meisterschaft. Herr Mischa Elman stellte sich als Solist dieses Concerts unserem Publikum für die laufende Saison vor und spielte das Tschaikowsky'sche Violinconcert mit genialem Schmiß. Er wurde wohl ein Dutzendmal gerufen. Näheres über die Veranstaltung wird im morgigen Blatt gebracht werden.

Das Programm des kommenden Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfindenden Konzerts des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters hat insofern eine Aenderung erfahren, als Herr Mischa Elman, der als Solist mitwirkt, nicht wie angekündigt, das Beethoven'sche Violinkonzert, sondern das A-Moll Violinkonzert von Dvorak, op. 53, mit Orchesterbegleitung spielen wird.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
JAN 14 1910

MUSIC.

The Boston Orchestra.

First let a simple chronicle of facts be made: The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of this season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of three numbers, one of which, the first, Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, had already been played three times by the Philharmonic Society this season. The second, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, was played for the first time—we are still speaking of this season—and the third, Dukas's bit of grotesquerie, called "L'Apprenti Sorcière," for the third. Mr. Mischa Elman was the solo performer. No stranger he, but almost too familiar for his own good. And the vast concert room was sold out to the last seat, and (not unlikely) to more than the last standing place allowed by the law. Finally, the integrity of the record requires that it be said that the audience received every feature of the concert with an outburst of enthusiasm which has had but few parallels this season.

There are the facts. How shall they be explained? Is Beethoven's third symphony so popular that its fourth performance attracted almost twice as many listeners as any one of the three which had preceded it? There has been nothing in its long local history to justify such a belief, comforting as it might be to the souls of the classicists among the city's music lovers. Was its performance a revelation which compelled the extraordinary tribute with which Mr. Max Fiedler and his admirable company of musicians were rewarded? It would be a sorry certificate to a long list of performances to answer in the affirmative. The New York public has been taught by a hundred performances to take such technical perfection in the reading of its printed page for granted; and by scores, not only recently, but for many years, to expect more eloquence of expression in the proclamation of the spirit of its melodies. But the euphony of the orchestra was all-compelling, and the fact remains that the audience welcomed the symphony as if it were a novel delight in a season already overladen with orchestral music.

Mr. Mischa Elman's performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto awakened strange reflections. Can there be overripeness in the performance of such works? Technically, in which respect this young Russian artist's performance excels, there ought not to be. Yet the aplomb, not to call it audacity, with which he plays raises the question in respect of both technique and interpretation. So conscious is he of his ability to amaze and bewilder with his technical accomplishments that he forgets that technique is, or ought to be, a servant to interpretation. He played the concerto last night with such extravagance of sentiment that at times it almost justified Dr. Hanslick's description of it as malodorous music. And yet his playing, by its dash, brilliancy, splendor of tone and correctness of intonation, made captives of all his listeners. It was an evening of virtuoso achievements; and it would be vain to try to find a complete explanation for it.

H. E. K.

EVENING POST,
New York City.
JAN 14 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Every seat in Carnegie Hall was taken last night, and all the standing room crowded. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of the season, and Mischa Elman was the soloist. He played the Tchaikovsky violin concerto, a composition so difficult that Auer, to whom it was dedicated, declined to play it in St. Petersburg, and it took all of Adolf Brodsky's courage to tackle its "hair-raising difficulties" at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna. To Mischa Elman this "almost unplayable" work seemed mere child's play. His technical skill is as dazzling as Kubelik's, and to it he chiefly owes his popularity. At the same time one can admire his smooth, rich tone (he has a superb violin, with an adorable G string that enables him, as it were, to play viola and violin at the same time), and his youthful dash. It cannot be said that he stirs the deeper emotions; he may possibly do so when he gets older. As for the concerto itself, though it was a welcome change from the monotonous repertory of the violinists, it cannot be said that it is one of the great Russian's masterworks, although he himself, when composing it, was "completely carried away," as he wrote to a friend in 1878. Its weakest part is the cadenza in the interminable first movement. This, if we are not mistaken, was written by Auer. It is a mere exhibition of fireworks, entirely different in style and harmony from Tchaikovsky's own music, and should be suppressed. Mr. Elman was recalled a number of times.

Mr. Fiedler and his musicians also won much applause for the way they played the "Eroica" and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The Beethoven symphony was read by the conductor without exaggeration, and his men played it with astonishing virtuosity. The French piece has been done here with more Gallic spirit; the tone in

HERALD
New York City.
JAN 14 1910

THRONG FILLS HALL TO HEAR MR. ELMAN

Youthful Russian Violinist Renews His Success Before a New York Audience.

Mr. Mischa Elman, a young Russian violinist, who won laurels here last year, made his first appearance here this season last night in Carnegie Hall. His appearance with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra was sufficient to crowd the big hall to its capacity. And after it was filled some music thirsty and music hungry citizens had to go home without hearing the concert, for the box office was bare of tickets and full of coin of the realm.

The audience seemed charged with enthusiasm. Beethoven's Eroica symphony, the first number on the programme, evoked so much applause that Mr. Fieldler, the conductor, had to bow and bow again, and then he requested the members of the orchestra to rise and receive their share.

When Mr. Elman first appeared he was greeted as an old friend. But when he had finished playing he was applauded as an artist. He was kept trotting out for probably five minutes, bowing endlessly. And when it looked doubtful if the concert would be allowed to proceed some began to hiss discreetly until finally order was restored. Then Mr. Fieldler mounted the stand and conducted the remaining number, the scherzo by Mons. Dukas, called "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

There is little new to be said of Mr. Elman's playing. His youth belies his artistic maturity. He has great technical skill and a tone that is luscious and he plays with rousing temperament. Last night his number was the Tschaikowsky concerto, and being a Russian he interpreted the composition of his countryman with sympathy. He appeared restless and nervous before he began to play, but once hew sa launched in his work he seemed to forget all else.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the Beethoven symphony capitally. He emphasized the bigness of the work and kept the hearers' interest alive. And the Biston Orchestra played it with all the skill and musicianship at their command. That is praise in itself.

EVE. SUN
New York City.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S BIGGEST AUDIENCE YET.

Wireless Talk Sells Out the Opera for Caruso, Too—Great Night for Musical Magic Ushers in To-day's Storm—Elman Brings His Master's Voice.

German Max Fiedler, whose brother is an Oxford Englishman of learned culture, and whose own broad humanity in programme making has won Major Higginson and all Boston in two years, came back to Carnegie Hall last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of course, it wasn't old Beethoven's "Hero" symphony that hung out the first "standing room only" sign that Fifty-seventh street has seen this year. A hundred years that hackneyed piece has traded on dead Napoleon's name. Three generations know it here. But it was pleasant to recall, as the programme books did last night, how the work was new to Boston sixty years ago at a concert where old Thomas Ryan favored the company with a fantasy of "Waiting and Arrival" for clarinet—who ever plays clarinet solos now?—and 'cello variations on "Robert the Devil" were performed by famous old Wulf Fries.

Mischa Elman, who at 19 years stands yet for the music of to-morrow, was last night's star that filled the back benches and standing room. He played again the Tschaikowsky violin concerto that our Maud Powell introduced two decades ago. The singing tone of the "Canzonetta" was in truth "his master's voice," for this was the music that Prof. Auer of St. Petersburg once rejected and the composer dedicated to the fiddler Brodsky, instead.

The house recalled Elman many times, though no encore was expected or allowed. The young Russian has his mannerisms yet, but he is more of an artist than last year, and his swelling appeals to the gallery were as honest and unaffected as any "Peter Pan" or Maeterlinck "Blue Bird" of child-souls struggling to manhood's years.

Charles Ellis and the new Assistant Manager Brennan stood in the lobby counting up the record house while Fiedler finished the evening with the delightfully modern and familiar "Melisande" harmonies of the playful "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas.

[96

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.

ELMAN HEARD WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

No Longer a Boy Prodigy, Violinist Enthralls Audience at Carnegie Hall.

With a 25,000 mile string of concerts to his credit since he last played in New York, Mischa Elman appeared as the soloist of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The trip has not only added a year to the young Russian violinist's age, it has also added something to his playing.

Mr. Elman is no longer an infant prodigy; he is no longer to be spoken of with the qualifying phrase, "Considering his age." He is a man, and is to be judged as a mature artist, and not as a curiosity.

Last night Mr. Elman played Tschaikowsky's Concerto in D major, the same composition, by the way, that served to introduce him to the American public just about a year ago. This was an excellent opportunity for judging the musician's development. His mastery of a composition that at the time it was published was considered so difficult that even the greatest violinists declared it unplayable is undeniable.

Phrasing Clean-Cut.

Even last year it was conceded to Mr. Elman that he had achieved an almost unprecedented success in a work full of technical difficulties.

His phrasing last night was clean-cut, his tone melting and most beautiful in quality; his intonation absolutely accurate. In the show parts, especially the cadenza which occurs in the first movement, he has as attentive an audience on the stage as in the body of the hall, and his left hand work was as much a cause for remark and admiration as was his grace and poetry in the quieter, more expressive passages.

The improvement, if there was any, was in the low tones that he drew from his instrument. They were of such unusual richness and mellowness as to suggest at times the quality of a 'cello.

The concerto was applauded for several minutes and the young virtuoso was compelled to return and bow his thanks at least half a dozen times.

Clever Work of Orchestra.

But in the judging of Mr. Elman's playing, the work of the orchestra must not be forgotten. The programme began with the "Froica" symphony by Beethoven, which was given a most beautiful reading. Beginning with the tuneful allegro, followed by the tremendous and affecting Funeral March, the brilliant scherzo and finale, it is no wonder that the audience almost rose to cheer Mr. Fridler and his musicians when the breathless last few phrases had been played.

There was, however, one place in the symphony in which the "great" Boston orchestra did not quite live up to its reputation. This was in the march movement, when the wind instruments displayed so apparent a lack of assurance that several times a ragged attack was the result. The work of the strings, however, was without a blemish.

The concert closed with the amusing "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas. This delightful scherzo, written after a ballad by Goethe, was played with a delicious humor, its translucent, elusive beauty brought out with charming delicacy.

The concert, on the whole, was remarkable for the taste displayed in the making of the programme and the excellent work in its rendition.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 15 1910
EVE. SUN
New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Interpreting a brilliant program, which consisted of the vorspiel to Wagner's music-drama, "Lohengrin," the A-flat major symphony of Sir Edward Elgar (opus. 55), Beethoven's D-major concerto (opus. 61) for violin and orchestra and the overture to Carl Maria von Weber's grand opera, "Euryanthe," the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third philharmonic concert of the season in the New Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, last evening. Mischa Elman, the Russian violin virtuoso, was the soloist.

A large and enthusiastic audience followed the work of the band from the Hub, under the baton of Max Fielder.

To-night's Brooklyn programme of the Boston Symphony presents Edward Elgar's symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto for Mischa Elman and the "Lohengrin" and "Euryanthe" overtures.

Elgar, Wagner and Weber also furnish the music of to-morrow's matinée in Cass New York City.

EVE. MAIL

JAN 1 1 1910

ELMAN PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gives Splendid Performance of Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto —"Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" at the Metropolitan.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

No one felt the excessive length of the Boston Symphony concert last night in Carnegie hall, although it was almost three-quarters of an hour longer than usual. For such offerings as were given by Mr. Fiedler and the hand over which he sways the baton, the entire audience, and there were several hundred people turned away, would have remained far into the night.

Three numbers formed this remarkable feast. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, and "The Sorcerer Apprentice," by Dukas. Mischa Elman was the soloist.

Perhaps it was but natural that the wide interest centered in Elman, the young Russian violinist, who already last season established a remarkable record. There was more realization last night of what he left to be desired at that time than there was when he swept his audiences with his strange and almost uncanny gift, because he shows a growth which could hardly have been expected after an absence of so short a period.

That which was self-will is now surety, and command marks both interpretation and technic. He is losing the traits which held him in the shadow of the "prodigy," and his playing has gained a personality and a distinction which raise him to the plane of a mature artist from which his development is certain to come.

His gain lies principally in surety, in technic and in his use of the bow arm. His bowing is more powerful, more dignified and more free in its sweep than it was, while the left hand all in itself is a thing to awaken both the admiration and astonishment of all who understand just how extraordinary is his use of this center of technic, and what it contributes to tone.

But tone is not merely of the left hand, nor is it of the bow; it is the Self, which, having found a means of expression, proclaims its freedom. In this has Elman grown; in this has a genius been accorded the world. He played the concerto as it can only be played by one equipped as he is equipped, who feels and knows the color which his country has given those of its sons who, having poured themselves into the glorious channels of music and art have done incalculable service to their country in holding a respect and a love of the outer world notwithstanding political prejudices.

He was recalled innumerable times by an audience which fairly acclaimed its delight audibly.

The double bill of "Cavalleria" and

EVE. SUN

ess New York City.

Mischa Elman, ending a tour with Boston Symphony Orchestra here to-day, is to give his first recital in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon.

The violinist plays Lalo's so-called symphony "Espagnole," Handel's D major sonata, a Haydn minuet, Gluck-Wilhelmj "Melody," Wieniawski's "Faust" fantasy and Paganini's "I Palpiti."

He adds the "Gavotte," Mozart-Auer, revised by his teacher, and the "Serenade," Schubert-Elman, arranged by himself

HERALD

New York City.

JAN 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Another Enthusiastic Reception for Mr. Mischa Elman in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Mischa Elman was again the soloist at the Boston Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. More than it could hold tried to get into the hall, and the young Russian violinist received the welcome that now seems to be awarded him as a matter of course.

After the Dvorak A minor concerto, which he substituted for the Beethoven concerto, announced on the programme, Mr. Elman was recalled till some began to hiss, and only then was the concert allowed to go on.

The Dvorak concerto offers nothing sensational to the virtuoso. It is a solidly written work, more interesting than exciting, with a fine orchestral part, of which Mr. Fiedler and his men made the most. Mr. Elman played with wonderful purity of intonation, singing quality and at times great brilliancy.

Sir Edward Elgar's tremendously long symphony in A flat major was beautifully played and respectfully heard. The audience found good cause for enthusiasm in a remarkable performance of the "Lohengrin" prelude and of the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

om STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City

ldress

JAN 15 1910

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Herr Max Fiedler hat sein Orchester gegenwärtig fest in der Hand. Das zeigte seine überaus persönlich angehauchte Darlegung von Beethoven's „Eroica" im letzten Konzert der Bostoner Gäste am Donnerstag Abend, über das wir bisher nur kurz gesprochen haben. Das prächtige Orchester folgte den individuellen, häufig wie aus augenblicklicher Eingebung geborenen Intentionen des Führers mit virtuoser Anschmiegungskraft und Meisterschaft. Wir hatten an Fiedler's Auffassung namentlich im ersten und letzten Satz, die uns beide allzu starr und gelegentlich gewaltthätig erschienen, manches auszusetzen, aber das Orchester haben wir selten mehr bewundert als bei dieser Gelegenheit.

Von köstlicher Frische und Beweglichkeit waren die Spieler in Dukas' „Zauberlehrling". Das war ein Spielen und Durcheinanderfließen, ein Gurgeln und Schlucken, ein Rinnen und Gießen, daß man das Wasser ordentlich aus den Instrumenten fließen und plätschern hörte. Herr Fiedler entwickelte in dem Dukasschen Scherz eine überaus leichte Hand, die in starkem Gegensatz zu der früheren Schwere stand. Er fand die zartesten und feinquellendsten Effekte. Das Publikum, das auch seine „Eroica" sehr goutirt hatte, überschüttete ihn und die Meisterspieler mit Applaus, so daß er wiederholt das ganze Orchester danken ließ.

Herr Mischa Elman hat in seiner Wiedergabe des Tschaikowsky'schen Violin-Konzerts, mit dem er uns im Vorjahr bereits entzückt hatte, ganz bemerkenswerthe Fortschritte in jener künstlerischen Ruhe und Selbstbeherrschung gemacht, die das Kennzeichen des reifen Geistes ist. Seine aus allen Poren quellende künstlerische Frische und seine schwungvolle Verve hat er sich voll bewahrt. Er entfaltete vorgestern wieder wundervolles Draufgängerthum in den „dramatischen" Stellen und köstliche Farbe in der Melodie. Sein Ton war namentlich im Adagio überraschend groß und warm. Dabei wehte ein glücklich improvisatorischer Zug in der kraftvollen Wiedergabe. Technisch kann der junge Mann kaum mehr steigen. Was wir vorgestern an schwierigen Doppelgriffen, an Trillerketten in den höchsten Regionen, an waghalsigen Oktavensprüngen und blitzblanken Flageolets hörten, das war einfach staunenswerth. Das Publikum rief den Virtuosen ein Dutzendmal stürmisch hervor. H.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address New York City.

Date JAN 17 1910

At the Boston Symphony concert Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Sir Edward Elgar's symphony was given under Max Fiedler's direction. The great work seems to grow in beauty with each hearing. Its impressive nobility was clearly demonstrated by the visiting orchestra, Misstha Elman, in a concerto by his own countryman, Dvorak, and the overtures to "Tannhauser" and "Euryanthe" completed the programme.

[97]

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

FIVE OPERAS SUNG IN A DAY

Manhattan Hears Rossini, Offenbach, Leoncavallo, Verdi and Mascagni.

ELGAR AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays English Composer's Masterly Work.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The reviewer of the music that was performed yesterday in Manhattan must chronicle one symphony concert and five operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard at Carnegie Hall in a programme of more than usual value and attractiveness. Of that programme the most substantial portion was Sir Edward Elgar's symphony in A. Familiarity with this composition breeds a surprised admiration.

The qualification "surprised" is used because Great Britain has for so long remained inarticulate as regards the utterance of any really deeply felt music. Britain is the old maid of musical creativeness. In her strange stepmotherly way, she loves the children of music, but, she herself has borne but few, and those of later days, puny and ailing as they were, saw the light in Ireland. Whoever listened to an English symphony? Which of us has been able to tolerate an English opera?

Who excites himself over Cowen's "Scandinavian," or over Sir Alexander Mackenzie's dismal swampish music-dramas? But it is far otherwise with Sir Edward Elgar's finely constructed utterance. It has the touch of universality that exacts general attention. It has the majestic dialect of those who have said things worthy of Apollo. It is not only the music of a man who has felt deeply, but of one who has an indisputable command over the resources, and a mastery over the logic of music. He has things to say and he throws his sayings into noble form.

Prose Here and There.

There are indeed long patches of prose in this work.

Small wildernesses where the stream of inspiration runs shallow and strained effort is obvious.

Perhaps this lengthiness may be in part due to the superstition that haunts the minds of such symphonists as Paderewski and Brueckner, a superstition that would seem to suggest to them that if they cannot excel the masters in idea and invention, they can at least excel them in prolixity. The symphony was played with all that poise and euphony of which we have spoken on all of the many occasions on which we have written about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose visits are so few and whose absences are so deplorably long.

The soloist was Mischa Elman, who, with the orchestra, played the Dvorak concerto. A word as to soloists at such concerts as these. In a sense I regret their presence, even when they are as eminent as M. Paderewski or as interesting as M. Elman.

They import into an evening's entertainment the element of personality, an element tyrannical enough in the theatrical and musical world at all times, but strangely interruptive and dissonant after the spirituality of a work like Sir Edward's or the magic remoteness of the "Eroica" of Beethoven.

The greater part of modern concerto music comes perilously near being valueless, a remark which applies to the Tschaikowsky insincerity played on Thursday night.

Suppression of the Orchestra.

There were moments during the performance of that composition when the whole orchestra of master musicians sat docilely still as M. Elman twiddled out gaudy effects, technical gewgaws and gallery claptrap. Such a sight was almost distressing. Music written for the display of a soloist's ability is scarcely music at all—nay, it is an inversion of the very idea of music. As for M. Elman's playing, considered by itself, it should be said that he is a master of technique, young as he is. He has conquered to a wonderful extent the physical difficulties which are the obstacles that lie in the path of every violinist that would obtain easiness of execution. There is a boyish freshness, aplomb and audacity about his playing that reach the imagination of his audience.

He is jaunty and selfsatisfied, but only to the limits within which audiences will tolerate jauntiness and self-satisfaction.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe" were also played. The house was completely sold out.

Five Operas Sung.

TIMES

m

ress New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elgar's Symphony Played Again—Mischa Elman in Dvorak's Concerto.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday. The programme comprised the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Mr. Mischa Elman was again the soloist, and played instead of Beethoven's concerto for the violin that by Dvorak in A minor, Op. 53.

The symphony had been played earlier in the season by Mr. Damrosch, who first produced it in this country here a year ago. Mr. Fiedler gave a very thoroughly studied performance of it, one that brought out all that the composer put into it in the way of deeply and glowingly rich orchestration; and represented the musical substance and structure of the work in a wholly sympathetic manner. Even in such a beautiful performance, and with the better knowledge of it that repeated hearings give, the symphony does not present itself as a highly inspired work. Its profound seriousness and thoughtfulness, the innumerable musical ideas that are closely compacted in it, the ingenuity of its construction, and the manner in which themes are carried over and transformed in the several movements command attention, even throughout the great length to which the work extends itself.

There are pages of beauty in it, passages that are truly impressive. But it is on the whole music that is from the head rather than from a deeply flowing musical inspiration. Much of its thematic material is of itself barren and dry, with little moving beauty of its own. Its impression is kaleidoscopic, rather that of a mosaic than of a spontaneous organic development. Nor does all the composer's ingenuity, his skillful and elaborate workmanship, and all that the symphony contains that compels respect and even admiration yield a beauty that fires the imagination or warms the heart.

Mr. Elman played Dvorak's concerto with all the splendor of tone, the overwhelming brilliancy and dash that he displayed on Thursday evening in Tschaikowsky's concerto. But his performance was much more artistic and in a way more agreeable, because of its much greater poise and repose. He found it advisable to lay aside many of the extravagances that he put into his interpretation and many of the mannerisms of his bearing, and the result was all to the advantage of his performance. The concerto had not been heard in New York for a considerable time, and it has never gained much favor among virtuosos. It has some of the characteristic qualities of Dvorak, some telling themes, among which the first one of the last movement is especially striking in its tunefulness and rhythmic energy. But the development becomes tedious, and promising beginnings run out into prolixity. Mr. Elman played it with energy and splendid fire and made it as interesting, no doubt, as it could be made.

m PRESS

New York City.

ress

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Elman Again with Boston Band.

Another enormous audience packed Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to enjoy the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the additional pleasures offered by Mischa Elman, soloist of the concert. Long before the time set for the beginning no more seats could be purchased, and enthusiasts had to be content with standing room, as the line of men and women stationed in the back of the auditorium bore witness. Many of these standees had come expressly to hear Elman, among them a sprinkling of professional violinsts intent on watching their successful brother artist. But there was one man at least whose principal interest centred in the performance of the orchestra, and he could be heard by those near him muttering imprecations as Mischa Elman, his duties fulfilled, returned seven times in response to applause, shaking hands first with Fiedler, the conductor, then with Willy Hess, the concert master. This admirer of Fiedler and his men, impatient of delay, wondered whether Elman would shake hands all the way down the line of first violins.

Mischa deserved every one of his seven recalls, if merit may be measured in terms of handclapping. In a quieter frame of mind than at his first appearance, on last Thursday evening, the young violinist played in a way that marked the master. Instead of the Beethoven concerto which had been originally announced he chose to offer for hearing Dvorak's concert in A minor, opus 53, and the change was decidedly gratifying. Beethoven's great work has been heard here frequently of late, whereas the Dvorak composition, a work that surely is worth hearing often, has been neglected.

Elman's temperament, his big, singing tone, his youthful vigor and robust feeling fit him peculiarly to perform the music of this Slav composer. He gave the opening Allegro with fine sweep and propulsive force. In the Adagio the largeness and emotional eloquence of his tone carried a moving message; and the finale, "Allegro Giocoso," with its irresistible Bohemian dance movements, he performed with a rhythmical emphasis, dash and jubilance of spirit that were most exhilarating. Technically his performance was a remarkably fine achievement. Emotionally it was no less admirable.

The concert opened with the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin." The next contribution was Elgar's symphony in A flat major, opus 55. This work of the English composer had its first performance anywhere on December 3, 1908, in Manchester, England. On December 7 of the same year the London Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Richter, to whom the composition is dedicated, produced it in London.

On January 3, 1909, the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, presented the symphony for the first time in New York. Fiedler was the first to introduce it to the Hub, on February 27 last. Elgarites in New York—some of them, at least—felt that the symphony in A flat had not yet been given a fair showing here. And so Fiedler undertook to give New York the benefit of a performance by the wonderful Boston Symphony Orchestra. An eloquent performance it was, too, the beautiful sonority and rich timbre of the Boston players throwing into prominence the nobly poetic ideas that are imbedded in the sumptuous orchestration of Elgar's score, particularly in the adagio. Nevertheless, Fiedler did not succeed in lifting the pall of monotony which shrouds this symphony. The fact is that Elgar, in his fondness for calling upon the whole orchestra as an

AMERICAN

New York City.

JAN 16 19

ELGAR SYMPHONY BY BOSTONIANS

mmense and Eager Audience Hears the Great Work of the English Composer.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The largest audience that has attended a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestar for several years filled Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, when our admirable visitors, under Mr. Fiedler, played Elgar's A flat major symphony and co-operated with Mischa Elman in a delightful rendering of Dvorak's violin concerto in A minor.

Three rows of ecstatic and earnest music-lovers stood throughout the afternoon without murmuring. So would they have stood, no doubt, to hear Caruso or Mary Garden had either of those artists been singing in one or the other of the opera houses yesterday.

Elgar's symphony, originally produced (and well interpreted) by the New York Symphony organization, was played here for the first time by the Bostonians.

Nothing that Mr. Fiedler has had charge of since he succeeded Dr. Muck has done more credit to his intelligent leadership. Personally, I confess that I have always had to make an effort in order to grow enthusiastic over Mr. Fiedler. There is something ever so little suggestive of the North German pedagogue in his way of conducting that slightly repels me till I have had time to realize his thoroughness and musicianship. Yesterday he outdid himself.

Various theories have been evolved in explanation—as if "explanations" were needed—of Elgar's symphony. I do not pretend to have any inspired knowledge on the subject, and I feel sure that nobody else here has been more favored. But, putting together in my mind the persistence throughout this beautiful work of the Pilgrim March, which comes and goes and re-appears so many times; adding to this fact the striking analogy between a secondary theme (in the third movement) of Elgar's and the march which occurs in Felicien David's "Desert;" and the other fact that the opening and ending of the work are marked by an austerity unmistakably suggestive of the idea of Faith—putting together all these things, I cannot but believe it at least probable (despite Sir Edward's denials) that Elgar had Gordon in his thoughts, perhaps subconsciously, when he wrote his symphony.

As to the general meaning of this magnum opus, I incline to the theory that it may have been composed as a suggestion of the human pilgrimage.

In the opening movement the contrast between the fervor and riot of youth and the chastened experience of age is, to me, evident. The discouragement, the frenzy of humanity which has failed to attain its ends is again more than strongly hinted at in the earlier passages of the last movement.

Throughout the symphony Elgar seems to have been largely under the influence of Berlioz. At moments he has been affected also by Debussy. Yet his form is quite symphonic, and even classic.

The interpretation by the Bostonians was singularly clear, honest and eloquent.

Mischa Elman was again the soloist yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Why he substituted the Dvorak concerto for the D major concerto of Beethoven I do not know. The work of the Bohemian composer has color, variety and picturesqueness. It was well suited to young Elman's style.

At the beginning of his interpretation Elman's tone left something to be desired. But ere long the wonderful virtuoso regained possession of himself and played with his accustomed charm and power.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe" completed a fine programme.

EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

JAN 17 1910

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS AGAIN WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

When Walter Damrosch and our Symphony Orchestra introduced Elgar's first symphony to us it made a profound impression. Several repetitions of the work have served to emphasize its serious worth and its many beauties. It has given a new standing to England in the music world. At Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, played it here for the first time and played it in the very best manner of this unexcelled band. It was a rare treat.

Mischa Elman was the soloist in Dvorak's violin concerto, not often played nowadays. It was one of the best exhibitions of his art that the brilliant young Russian has given. Nothing was lacking of his astonishing dexterity and his tone was never more luscious, but he displayed a confidence and a dignity that are likely to give him high place among the masters when he shall have matured.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture completed the programme. The house was crowded and enthusiastic.

SUN,

New York City.

JAN 16 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elgar's Symphony and Dvorak's Violin Concerto Performed.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon consisted of the prelude to "Lohengrin," Sir Edward Elgar's symphony in A flat, Dvorák's violin concerto and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The solo performer was again Mischa Elman, who was to have performed the Beethoven concerto but who announced two or three days ago that he would substitue for it the composition of the Bohemian master.

Elgar's symphony has been heard here several times, and it wears well. It is a serious and interesting work, which brings new credit to the English school of composers. The performance which it received yesterday afternoon was one to cherish in the memory. The music has already been beautifully played by one of ur local orchestras and probably will be again; but that cannot prevent us from enjoying the ravishing richness and transparent depths of the tonal quality of the Boston organization. Nor should it blind us to the niceties of balance and phrasing in the delivery of the measures by these always welcome visitors. Even poor music would sound well when played so admirably. Good music sounds better.

Mr. Elman deserves thanks for resuscitating the Dvorák concerto. The work is seldom heard, and while it is not one of the masterpieces of violin literature it is well worth hearing. It served yesterday to show that Mr. Elman does not have to play always with such palpable peculiarities as he displayed on Thursday evening. His performance was dignified, but filled with his customary dash. He must always astonish by the apparently reckless yet marvellously certain manner in which he attacks all difficulties from intricate double stops to melodies in octaves.

But when he calls from the violin such beauty of tone as he evoked yesterday and treats fluent cantilena with so much finish and feeling, when, in short, he discloses the musical content of the page, then indeed he commands not only admiration but affection.

SUN

New York City.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra, long used to travel, made its way East in the teeth of the departing storm after playing its third Carnegie Hall Saturday matinée. Edward Elgar's symphony was repeated here. The work takes about fifty-five minutes, and Mr. Fiedler made no experiments like those of a famous English conductor recently in the British provinces. Over there a performance in thirty-eight minutes, indicating a considerably cut score, aroused controversy. As Thomas Beecham and his orchestra are coming to New York this spring, the like may be tried here. Meanwhile another of Elgar's countrymen, Landon Ronald, was to conduct his symphony this month with an Italian society in Rome.

A second symphony by Edward Elgar was recently announced as forthcoming in England, where it is predicted that these orchestral works will outlast the oratorios of "The Dream of Gerontius," "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom."

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York Cit

Date

Instrumental Concerts.

THE task of performing Sir Edward Elgar's symphony fell to the lot of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Of course, played by this particular orchestra, under the guidance of Mr. Fiedler, the result could not but be illuminating, but it does not contradict the earliest impression. After this additional hearing the Elgar symphony, in spite of its rich instrumental dress, of its ingenious elaboration, seems as a whole barren of melody, uninspired.

The other feature of the concert was the performance by Mischa Elman of Dvorak's violin concerto, which was substituted for the Beethoven concerto, announced originally. The Dvorak concerto does not seem to be a favorite with violinists. It is long and in places tedious. But there are many pages of genuine beauty, enough to make it worthy of a place in the repertory and of such playing as Mr. Elman expended on it Saturday. He was more circumspect of demeanor and also in his treatment of rhythm than when playing the Tschaikowsky concerto Thursday night, and yet he played with the same exhilarating dash and if possible even lovelier tone in cantilena. Truly a notable performance. The prelude to "Lohengrin," played most beautifully, opened the concert, and the overture to "Euryanthe," also played most beautifully, closed it.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Education by means of reiteration seems to be the order of the day with the conductors of orchestra concerts in New York. Mr. Mahler performs a symphony at a Philharmonic concert in regular course, repeats it in the historical course, repeats it again in the popular Sunday afternoon course, and, if it chances to be a work by Beethoven, repeats it still again in the Beethoven course. Perhaps Mr. Walter Damrosch has already played the symphony at a concert of the Symphony Society; if not, he promptly does so. Then comes Mr. Fiedler, with his delightful men from Boston, and because New Yorkers so keenly appreciate his ministrations we hear it again. Of course, it is not to be thought of for a moment that the conductors are inviting comparison of their readings and the skill of their performers. No. They are introducing New York to Beethoven's "Eroica," which New York has known since 1843, or his C minor, which has been a twice told tale since 1842. Now, the enjoyment which the highest form of musical art invites does not depend on a comparison of the poses and gestures of conductors, nor their notions of what can be done by them in the way of giving significance to texts by changes of accents; nor by the individual or combined skill of their players; and, even if the most familiar works are those which are most enjoyed, so they be great works, a music ridden city might be pampered a little bit along the line of change and novelty.

Mr. Max Fiedler, of the Boston Orchestra, is generally merciless. So were his predecessors before him. For years the programmes of the monthly New York concerts have been made solely from the point of view represented by the latitude and longitude of the Hub of the Universe (latitude 42 degrees 21 minutes and 27 seconds north, longitude 71 degrees 3 minutes and 30 seconds west). At intervals a timid note, not of protest (no, not of protest!), but of supplication, has been sounded from the village of Manhattan, but in vain. And we have fallen back, humbled and abashed, and listened to the voice of admonition: "Hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me." And we have heard on Thursday night the fourth performance in two months of Beethoven's "Eroica," and yesterday the fifth in a little over a year of Elgar's Symphony in A flat. All this is beautiful music—noble music—and to hear it often is to be uplifted and refined in thought and feeling, and there is no agency so exalting, no emollient, so efficacious as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But may we not be educated, since it must needs be so, in a larger knowledge of things that be, but which we know not of, rather than a higher knowledge of the things which also be, but which we can spell backward?

A kind Providence interfered yesterday to save us from hearing a fourth performance this season of Beethoven's violin concerto—not that the music is not worth a fourth hearing. Of course, it is worth many times four hearings every month. But it was a question whether or not, after the manner in which Mischa Elman sentimentalized the Tschaikowsky concerto on Thursday and suffocated it with his affected mannerisms, his reading of the manly Beethoven work would have endured comparison with the performances which it received at the hands of Mr. Kreisler and Maud Powell. It was a lucky dispensation which substituted Dvorak's concerto in A minor at the last moment, for odious comparison was thus avoided. The Dvorak composition was played here in the long ago by Maud Powell (twice), Henri Marteau (also twice) and Ondricek, but it was out of the minds of all but reminiscent graybeards, and was therefore as good as new. It was, indeed, better than new, as recalling a composer who lived in the midst of the storm and stress of the Richard Strausses, Max Rigers, Debussys and their small fry imitators and pursued his way over meadows where flowers of melody and blossoms of harmony sprang up to greet him and lifted their heads in gladness out of his footsteps after he had passed. Not a bloom of art did Dvorak crush. It was a pleasure to hear his concerto again, and doubly a pleasure to hear that the performer did not disfigure it with such whinings and whimperings as he injected into Tschaikowsky's work. The Elgar symphony began the concert and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture ended it. Everything was brilliant and convincingly played. H. E. K.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

MAX FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED.

Boston, Feb. 4.—Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last two seasons, was re-engaged to-day for the seasons of 1910 and 1911. This announcement follows Herr Fiedler's recent denial of a report that he was to conduct a symphony orchestra at Liverpool.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

JAN 17 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman was again the soloist at Saturday afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra. He played the Dvorák violin concerto, opus 53, instead of the Beethoven—a most welcome substitution, because this concerto has been played here so frequently of late that even the Beethovenolaters have begun to protest. Dvorák's work, while of undue length, is replete with the charm of melodic invention and the rich orchestral coloring for which the great Bohemian is famed and beloved. Mr. Fiedler, who has not heretofore given us any of Dvorák's works, conducted the orchestral part so lovingly and delightfully that it gave rise to the hope that he will henceforth give more attention to the works of this composer, in which popular elements and genius are so admirably blended. It would be of great interest to hear the Boston orchestra play the Scherzo Capriccioso or the symphony preceding the "New World." As for Mr. Elman, he played the concerto with splendid virtuosity, great opulence of tone, and rhythmic vigor. He was recalled many times, by an audience which crowded the hall.

It was inevitable that some time or other the Bostonians should play for us the Elgar symphony. So far, it has been done here only by Walter Damrosch and his men. Many years ago, Mr. Damrosch conducted Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" at its first performance in America, and made so little of it that the present writer damned it with the faintest praise. It seemed possible that the Elgar symphony had suffered in the same way—but no; the excellent Mr. Fiedler and his wonderful orchestra could not make much more of it than Mr. Damrosch and his players did. The English are very proud of it; in their own country it has been played eighty times in eleven months. But an audience which listens to it without patriotic bias is likely to be bored because of the paucity of musical ideas. Elgar is like a man who has the gift of eloquence but very little to say. Such a man may stir his hearers for a time, but if he talks too long he becomes tiresome. Elgar talks so long—over fifty minutes—that finally even his rich orchestration and pompous manner fail to hide his poverty of invention. His adherents raised a great outcry some weeks ago when Mr. Beecham shortened this symphony at a provincial performance by eighteen minutes; but in all probability he thereby rendered it a great service. The mania of many modern composers for immolating themselves on the altar of interminableness is one of the strangest phenomena of the time. The best movement of the symphony is the adagio, which creates an agreeable languor, when played as Mr. Fiedler's men played it. The other numbers on the programme, Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, were also capitally rendered.

EVE. MAIL

New York City.

JAN 17

Unusually interesting was the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given Saturday afternoon before an audience almost as large as the one which greeted Mr. Fiedler and his men Thursday night. Again Elman was the soloist, and the young artist again achieved a great success.

The Beethoven concerto was the original promise, and many wished that the programme had been left as first planned, as the Dvorak concerto, brilliant, full of tuneful themes and interesting construction was not of the same value as the Beethoven masterpiece. Elman played it with dazzling brilliancy, and there were moments when he surpassed certain features of his playing on Thursday night.

The principal orchestral offering was the Elgar symphony, which Walter Damrosch introduced here last year and again presented at his opening concert this season. The virtuosity of the Boston organization made a thoroughly grateful performance possible, and many features suggested on the first hearing were intensified.

SUN

New York City.

EB 5

Max Fiedler to Stay in Boston

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the last two seasons, to-day signed a contract to continue in that position during the seasons of 1910 and 1911.

[98]

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 28 1910

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Isle of Death" Given for First Time in New York.

The chief event of interest in last night's concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, lay in the first production in New York of Sergei Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of Death." This composition had its first performance in Moscow about a year ago. It has also been played recently in Chicago, and in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Isle of Death" is founded on Arnold Boecklin's well known picture in the Leipsic Museum, and the composer has attempted to give in his music the sombre atmosphere aroused by the painting.

Mr. Rachmaninoff himself conducted the orchestra last night, and in spite of some rather crude playing on the part of the musicians succeeded in bringing out admirably the spirit of the composition.

The other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, Arensky's variations for strings on a Tschaikowsky theme and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, plyed by the composer.

MAX FIEDLER MAY STAY HERE.

Boston, Jan. 27.—Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not been engaged to conduct the Symphony Orchestra, of Manchester, England, next season, in succession to Hans Richter, as has been reported. Mr. Fiedler said to-day that while the managers of the Manchester organization had made him proposals, he had not yet concluded any negotiations with them.

SUN

New York City.

JAN 28 1910

Boston Orchestra Wants Toscanini.

It has been settled that Max Fiedler is to retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season, as he will be at the head of the Manchester orchestra from next October. In Manchester he will succeed Hans Richter. It has not yet been decided who will take Herr Fiedler's place as conductor of the Boston organization. It is rumored that the management has been trying to get Arturo Toscanini. The Italian conductor is fond of conducting symphonic concerts, but so far has made no answer. In case he is not selected it is regarded as certain that Carl Muck will be released to go back to Boston and become conductor of the orchestra for a term of years.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GREEN'S HAROLD

NEW YORK CITY

FEB 5 - 1910

Fiedler wieder engagirt.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird auch während der Saisons 1910 und 1911 unter der Leitung Max Fiedlers stehen. Die Contracte sind gestern unterzeichnet worden.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

FEB - 5 1910

Fiedler Re-engaged.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past two seasons, was reëngaged to-day for the seasons of 1910 and 1911. This announcement follows Herr Fiedler's recent denial of a report that he was to conduct a symphony orchestra at Liverpool, England.

NEW YORK JOURNAL
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 9 - 191

Rachmaninoffs Abreise.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, der russische Pianist und Komponist, reiste gestern mit dem Bremer Dampfer „Kaiser Wilhelm II." nach Europa zurück. Er bußerte sich sehr lobend über das amerikanische Musikleben, bezeichnete aber Boston als das Kulturcentrum der Vereinigten Staaten. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester steht auf einer Höhe mit dem Philharmonischen Orchester in Wien, Berlin und Dresden. Er wird 1912 nach Amerika zurückkehren.

TIMES

New York City.

FEB 1 3 1910

MAX FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED.

To be Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Two More Seasons.

Max Fiedler has been re-engaged for two more seasons as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As Toscanini and several other conductors have been suggested at various times by different newspapers as possible conductors of this orchestra the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made the following statement yesterday:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state with the utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered."

m EVE. WORLD

ress New York City.

e FEB 1 2 1

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra requests that the statement be made that the only musicians who have been considered for conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck. No other conductor has been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been considered.

om AMERICAN

dress New York City

te FEB 13

In the hope of ending the misleading rumors current regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

EVE. SUN

s New York City.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has sent to all cities where the Boston Orchestra plays on its occasional tours the following communication:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered."

om TRIBUNE

dress New York City.

te FEB 13 1910

FOURTH PAIR OF CONCERTS.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 24, at 8:15, and on Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2:30. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the performance of Brahms's seldom heard double concerto for violin and violoncello, which will be played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," will also be on this programme. The feature of Saturday afternoon's programme will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York since Mr. Gericke's regime. Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony will also be on this programme.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

FEB 1 2 1910

A German Conductor Who Speaks English.

Max Fiedler has been reappointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This fact, by itself, might not be considered sufficient provocation for extended comment. Yet there is something in the disposition of Max Fiedler toward his audiences and his musicians which differentiates him from the ruck of foreign conductors. He has made a definite attempt to assimilate himself with his surroundings. To complain against the importation of foreigners to interpret music for us is as demagogic as it is ridiculous. Music is as much a product of Germany as oil is of Pennsylvania, and we should be as ready to consume the music of Germany as the German peasant is ready to light his homestead with the petroleum of Allegheny.

But many of our conductors have impaired their usefulness by their reluctance to study the English language, by their indifference to our methods of living, by a sort of alien sulkiness. Now, Herr Fiedler conducts his rehearsals in English. This may seem a small thing, yet it betrays an admirable spirit, a keenly good taste. It helps to emphasize the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an alien and an exotic thing; that such a splendid organization is part of the national life and opportunity, and that the brains which are artistically directing it have an inclination toward us not unlike that of the Maecenas who founded it.

om EVE. SUN

ldress New York City.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes back to town next week, it will be for the fourth and last pair, but one, of the visiting organization's concerts here.

Max Fiedler on Thursday has Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, a Brahms concerto for violin and violoncello, played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, and by the Boston orchestra Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the overture to "Meistersinger."

Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which the Boston men have not played here since Gericke's time, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony will be on the programme at the Saturday matinée, with excerpts from "Tristan."

m HERALD

BROOKLYN EDIT.

New York City.

e

SYMPHONY MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston and New York Orchestras Will Give Concerts—Institute Lecture Programme.

Two symphony orchestras will come to town next week, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Academy of Music, and programmes of varied interest are announced.

On Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard, with Mr. Willy Hess, violin, as the soloist. The programme will be:—

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 73, Brahms
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Strauss
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz

Mr. Howard Brockway will lecture on this programme on Thursday afternoon in the music hall of the Academy.

On the following afternoon the New York Symphony Orchestra will give one of a series of young people's concerts under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. The soloist will be Mme. Tina Lerner, piano, and the programme announced is:—

Bohemian.
Symphonic poem "Ultava".....Smetana
Slow movement from Symphony No. 3 in E minor, "From the New World".Dvorak Polish.
Andante Spianato and Polanaise op. 22, for piano and orchestra.....Chopin
Miss Tina Lerner.
Russian.
Komarins-kaja .....Glinka
(a) Allegro con grazia, from Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique).
(b) Pizicati, from Symphony No. 4. } .Tschaikowsky

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York C

Date 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead" will be the features of Thursday night, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Strauss's love poem "Thus spake Zarathustra" on Saturday afternoon.

[99] om WORLD,

New York City.

ldress

te FEB 13

In the hope of putting an end to the various rumors regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management says that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been considered.

EVENING POST,

ddress New York City. FEB 1 9 19

Willy Hess and Alwyn Schroeder will play Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello, at next Thursday evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be preceded by Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and followed by Rachmaninoff's "Vale of the Dead," and the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel. On the following Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Wagner's "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

s FEB 2 0 1910

On Saturday afternoon the symphor will be Goldmark's charming "Rust Wedding." This work appears on Bo ton Symphony programmes for the fir time in over a dozen years. Followin this will be Strauss' "Thus Spake Zara thustra." This has not been played a the New York concerts of the Bosto Symphony since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other number on this programme will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." The order of the programme is as follows:

Thursday evening, February 24, at 8.15:

Schubert, symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished"; Brahms, double concerto for violin and violoncello; Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg."

Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess, violinist. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2.30:

Goldmark, "Rustic Wedding" symphony, E-flat major, No. 1, Op. 26; Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (organist, Mr. Marshall); Wagner, prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

SUN,

New York City.

FEB 20 1910

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 24, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2:30. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the performance of Brahms's seldom heard double concerto for violin and violoncello, which will be played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead" will also be on this programme. The feature of Saturday afternoon's programme will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York since Mr. Gericke's régime. Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony will also be on this programme.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 28 1910

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Isle of Death" Given for First Time in New York.

The chief event of interest in last night's concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, lay in the first production in New York of Sergei Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of Death." This composition had its first performance in Moscow about a year ago. It has also been played recently in Chicago, and in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Isle of Death" is founded on Arnold Boecklin's well known picture in the Leipsic Museum, and the composer has attempted to give in his music the sombre atmosphere aroused by the painting.

Mr. Rachmaninoff himself conducted the orchestra last night, and in spite of some rather crude playing on the part of the musicians succeeded in bringing out admirably the spirit of the composition.

The other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, Arensky's variations for strings on a Tschaikowsky theme and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, plyed by the composer.

MAX FIEDLER MAY STAY HERE.

Boston, Jan. 27.—Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not been engaged to conduct the Symphony Orchestra, of Manchester, England, next season, in succession to Hans Richter, as has been reported. Mr. Fiedler said to-day that while the managers of the Manchester organization had made him proposals, he had not yet concluded any negotiations with them.

SUN

New York City.

Boston Orchestra Wants Toscanini.

It has been settled that Max Fiedler is to retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season, as he will be at the head of the Manchester orchestra from next October. In Manchester he will succeed Hans Richter. It has not yet been decided who will take Herr Fiedler's place as conductor of the Boston organization. It is rumored that the management has been trying to get Arturo Toscanini. The Italian conductor is fond of conducting symphonic concerts, but so far has made no answer. In case he is not selected it is regarded as certain that Carl Muck will be released to go back to Boston and become conductor of the orchestra for a term of years.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 5 1910

Fiedler wieder engagirt.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird auch während der Saisons 1910 und 1911 unter der Leitung Max Fiedlers stehen. Die Contracte sind gestern unterzeichnet worden.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

FEB - 5 1910

Fiedler Re-engaged.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past two seasons, was reëngaged to-day for the seasons of 1910 and 1911. This announcement follows Herr Fiedler's recent denial of a report that he was to conduct a symphony orchestra at Liverpool, England.

...JOURNAL

...ED FEB 6 1910

FEB 9 - 191

Rachmaninoffs Abreise.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, der russische Pianist und Komponist, reiste gestern mit dem Bremer Dampfer „Kaiser Wilhelm II." nach Europa zurück. Er äußerte sich sehr lobend über das amerikanische Musikleben, bezeichnete aber Boston als das Kulturcentrum der Vereinigten Staaten. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester steht auf einer Höhe mit dem Philharmonischen Orchester in Wien, Berlin und Dresden. Er wird 1912 nach Amerika zurückkehren.

TIMES

New York City.

FEB 14 1910

MAX FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED.

To be Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Two More Seasons.

Max Fiedler has been re-engaged for two more seasons as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As Toscanini and several other conductors have been suggested at various times by different newspapers as possible conductors of this orchestra the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made the following statement yesterday:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state with the utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered."

m EVE. WORLD

ress New York City.

e FEB 14 21

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra requests that the statement be made that the only musicians who have been considered for conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck. No other conductor has been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been considered.

om AMERICAN

dress New York City

te FEB 13

In the hope of ending the misleading rumors current regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

EVE. SUN

s New York City.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has sent to all cities where the Boston Orchestra plays on its occasional tours the following communication:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered."

m TRIBUNE

dress New York City.

te

FOURTH PAIR OF CONCERTS.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 24, at 8:15, and on Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2:30. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the performance of Brahms's seldom heard double concerto for violin and violoncello, which will be played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," will also be on this programme. The feature of Saturday afternoon's programme will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York since Mr. Gericke's regime. Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony will also be on this programme.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

FEB 13 1910

A German Conductor Who Speaks English.

Max Fiedler has been reappointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This fact, by itself, might not be considered sufficient provocation for extended comment. Yet there is something in the disposition of Max Fiedler toward his audiences and his musicians which differentiates him from the ruck of foreign conductors. He has made a definite attempt to assimilate himself with his surroundings. To complain against the importation of foreigners to interpret music for us is as demagogic as it is ridiculous. Music is as much a product of Germany as oil is of Pennsylvania, and we should be as ready to consume the music of Germany as the German peasant is ready to light his homestead with the petroleum of Allegheny.

But many of our conductors have impaired their usefulness by their reluctance to study the English language, by their indifference to our methods of living, by a sort of alien sulkiness. Now, Herr Fiedler conducts his rehearsals in English. This may seem a small thing, yet it betrays an admirable spirit, a keenly good taste. It helps to emphasize the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an alien and an exotic thing; that such a splendid organization is part of the national life and opportunity, and that the brains which are artistically directing it have an inclination toward us not unlike that of the Maecenas who founded it.

om EVE. SUN

ldress New York City.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes back to town next week, it will be for the fourth and last pair, but one, of the visiting organization's concerts here.

Max Fiedler on Thursday has Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, a Brahms concerto for violin and violoncello, played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, and by the Boston orchestra Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the overture to "Meistersinger."

Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which the Boston men have not played here since Gericke's time, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony will be on the programme at the Saturday matinée, with excerpts from "Tristan."

m HERALD

ress New York City.

BROOKLYN EDIT.

e

SYMPHONY MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston and New York Orchestras Will Give Concerts—Institute Lecture Programme.

Two symphony orchestras will come to town next week, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Academy of Music, and programmes of varied interest are announced.

On Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard, with Mr. Willy Hess, violin, as the soloist. The programme will be:—

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 73,
Brahms
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra,"
Strauss
Overture, "The Roman Carnival,"
Berlioz

Mr. Howard Brockway will lecture on this programme on Thursday afternoon in the music hall of the Academy.

On the following afternoon the New York Symphony Orchestra will give one of a series of young people's concerts under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. The soloist will be Mme. Tina Lerner, piano, and the programme announced is:—

Bohemian.
Symphonic poem "Ultava".....Smetana
Slow movement from Symphony No. 3 in E minor, "From the New World".Dvorak
Polish.
Andante Spianato and Polanaise op. 22, for piano and orchestra.....Chopin
Miss Tina Lerner.
Russian.
Komarins-kaja .....Glinka
(a) Allegro con grazia, from Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique).
(b) Pizicati, from Symphony No. 4. } Tschaikowsky

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York C

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead" will be the features of Thursday night, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and Strauss's love poem "Thus spake Zarathustra" on Saturday afternoon.

[99]

om WORLD,

ldress New York City.

te FEB 1[illegible]

In the hope of putting an end to the various rumors regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management says that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fielder, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been considered. 18

om EVENING POST,

ddress New York City. 19

FEB 19

Willy Hess and Alwyn Schroeder will play Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello, at next Thursday evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be preceded by Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and followed by Rachmaninoff's "Vale of the Dead," and the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel. On the following Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Wagner's "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

MORN. TELEGRAPH

s New York City.

FEB 20 1910

On Saturday afternoon the symphor will be Goldmark's charming "Rust Wedding." This work appears on Bo ton Symphony programmes for the fir time in over a dozen years. Followin this will be Strauss' "Thus Spake Zara thustra." This has not been played a the New York concerts of the Bosto Symphony since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other number on this programme will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." The order of the programme is as follows:

Thursday evening, February 24, at 8.15:

Schubert, symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished"; Brahms, double concerto for violin and violoncello; Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg."

Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess, violinist. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2.30:

Goldmark, "Rustic Wedding" symphony, E-flat major, No. 1, Op. 26; Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (organist, Mr. Marshall); Wagner, prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

SUN,

New York City.

FEB 20 1910 .

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 24, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, February 26, at 2:30 The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the performance of Brahms's seldom heard double concerto for violin and violoncello, which will be played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead" will also be on this programme. The feature of Saturday afternoon's programme will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York since Mr. Gericke's régime. Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony will also be on this programme.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH
Address New York C
Date FEB 2 0

Notes of Music World

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, at 2.30, respectively. Mr. Fiedler, whose re-engagement by the Orchestra for a term of two years has just been announced, has provided interesting features for both programmes. For the first time in many years New York will hear on Thursday night Brahms' double concerto for violin and violoncello. In the earlier days of the orchestra, when Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were still in its ranks, these two artists played this work a number of times, but since they left it has never appeared on a Boston Symphony programme until a few weeks ago, when it was played in Boston by Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Mr. Schroeder. The work created a great deal of interest, and these two artists will play it in New York. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Another work of interest which has been heard but once in New York will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was done a few weeks ago by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. Mr. Rachmaninoff conducted this in Boston, and Mr. Fiedler was greatly taken with the work. The other number for Thursday night will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

PRESS
ess New York City.
FEB 20 1910

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8.15 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Max Fiedler, whose re-engagement by the orchestra for a term of two years has just been announced, has provided interesting features for both programmes. For the first time in many years New York will hear on Thursday night Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello. In the earlier days of the orchestra, when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder were still in its ranks, those two artists played this work several times. But since then the work has not appeared on a Boston Symphony programme until a few weeks ago, when it was played in Boston by Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Mr. Schroeder. The work created a great deal of interest, and those two artists will play it in New York. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Another work of interest will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was played a few weeks ago by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. Rachmaninoff conducted his composition in Boston and Fiedler was greatly taken with the work. The other number for Thursday night will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding." This work appears on Boston Symphony programmes for the first time in over a dozen years. The next number on the list will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been played at the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other offering on this programme will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde."

WORLD,
ess New York City.
FEB 20

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Max Fiedler, reengaged as conductor for two years, has provided features for both programmes. For the first time in many years New York will hear on Thursday night Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello. In the earlier days of the orchestra, when Kneisel and Schroeder were still in its ranks, these two artists played this work several times, but after they left it never appeared on a Boston Symphony programme until a few weeks ago, when it was played in Boston by Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra, and Mr. Schroeder, and these two artists will play it in New York. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Another work to be played, which has been heard but once in New York, will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead." The other number for Thursday night will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." This work appears on a Boston Symphony programme for the first time in more than a dozen years. Following this will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This has not been played at the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other number on this programme will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde."

TIMES
m New York City.
ress FEB 20 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon at 2:30 respectively. Mr. Fiedler, whose re-engagement by the orchestra for a term of two years has just been announced, has provided interesting features for both programmes. For the first time in many years New York will hear on Thursday night Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello. In the earlier days of the orchestra when Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were still in its ranks these two artists played this work a number of times, but since they left it has never appeared on a Boston Symphony programme until a few weeks ago, when it was played in Boston by Mr. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and Mr. Schroeder. The work created a great deal of interest, and these two artists will play it in New York. The Symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Another work of interest, which has been heard once before in New York, will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was done a few weeks ago by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. Mr. Rachmaninoff conducted it in Boston. The other number for Thursday night will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." This work appears on Boston Symphony programmes for the first time in over a dozen years. Following this will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This has not been played at the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other number on this programme will be the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." The order of the programmes is as follows:

Symphony in B Minor, "Unfinished"..Schubert
Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello..Brahms

Symphonic Poem, "The Isle of the Dead"..Rachmaninoff

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Soloists—Mr. Willy Hess, Violinist.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'Cellist.

"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E Flat Major, No. 1, Op. 26.....Goldmark

Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"..Strauss
(Organist Mr. Marshall.)

Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

TRIBUNE
New York City.
FEB 20 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, respectively. Mr. Fiedler, whose re-engagement by the orchestra for a term of two years has just been announced, has provided interesting features for both programmes. For the first time in many years New York will hear on Thursday night Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello.

In the earlier days of the orchestra, when Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were still heard but once in New York will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," which was played a few weeks ago by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer. Mr. Rachmaninoff conducted this in Boston and Mr. Fiedler was greatly taken with the work. The other number for Thursday night will be the prelude to 'The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding." This work appears on Boston Symphony programmes for the first time in over a dozen years. Following this will be Strauss's "Thus spake Zarathustra." This has not been played at the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony since the early days of Mr. Gericke's second engagement. The other number on this programme will be the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." The programme follows:

Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"...Schubert
Double concerto for violin and violoncello..Brahms

Symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"..Rachmaninoff

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Soloist, Willy Hess, violinist.
Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E flat, major, No. 1, Op. 26.....Goldmark

Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"..Strauss
(Organist, Mr. Marshall.)

Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

HERALD
ess New York City.
FEB 20

MUSIC NOTES.

BRAHMS' seldom heard double concert for violin and 'cello will be played by Messrs. Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder used to play it occasionally when both were members of that organization. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude are also on the programme.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Saturday afternoon Mr. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will hold a place between Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony and the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Fiedler will conduct both concerts.

AMERICAN
rom New York Cit
Address FEB 21 191
Date

Music Notes.

On Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the able leadership of Mr. Fiedler, will again be heard at Carnegie Hall.

For Thursday the programme promises Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and 'cello, Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" symphonic poem, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder will be the soloists.

On Saturday Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and the prelude and liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde" are to be heard.

m TRIBUNE
dress New York City.
te FEB 20 191

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next concert in the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening. Willy Hess will assist on the violin. On Saturday afternoon the New York Symphony Orchestra will give a concert of the "young people's" series at the Academy. On Saturday evening Henry Gaines Hawn will give a special dramatic recital at the Academy. His subjects will be Browning's "Andrea del Sarto" and William Butler Yeats's "The Hour Glass."

ess

OPERA, ORCHESTRA AND APOLLO CLUB

Will Be Among the Musical Incidents in Brooklyn Next Week.

NORDICA TO SING HERE ALSO

At the Watters Concert on Thursday. A Glut of Opera in Manhattan.

The second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 10, will bring as soloist one of Brooklyn's favorite pianists, Madame Olga Samaroff. Since Madame Samaroff last played here she has spent a year abroad and found there, to her own gratification, as well as to the gratification of her many friends and admirers in America, that Europe praised her as highly as her own country people had done. Madame Samaroff is not an artist who stands still, and those who have heard her play this year say that her art is much finer and more beautiful than it has been in the past. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another delightful programme for Brooklyn. The first number will be the immortal "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, and then will follow Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, which, if it is not a symphony in the strict sense of the word, is none the less one of the most charming works in the literature of the great orchestra. It is many years since the Boston Symphony has put it on its programmes, and its revival in Boston a few weeks ago by Mr. Fiedler raised the warmest enthusiasm. The last number will be Wagner's Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde." Madame Samaroff will play the Liszt concerto in E-flat.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address DEC 4 1909
Date

At the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, will be the soloist. On Thursday afternoon, in preparation for the concert, Howard Brockway will give an explanatory lecture in the Academy of Music hall.

1884

is N. Y.
DEC 4

NORDICA TO SING HERE ON THURSDAY EVENING

Joseph Malkin, Russian 'Cellist, Will Appear with Her.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON FRIDAY

Bella Alten at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday Night—Items of Musical Interest.

On account of indisposition, Jascha Bron will be unable to appear with Nordica at the Academy of Music, next Thursday evening, Dec. 9, but in his stead Wilford Watters has engaged the great Russian 'cellist, Joseph Malkin, who was brought to this country by Mr. Walter Damrosch for the New York Symphony concerts. Mr. Malkin is acknowledged in Europe as one of the two first 'cellists in that country. Arthur Nikisch, the world renowned conductor, says: "Mr. Malkin ranks as a virtuoso among the most prominent 'cellists of the world."

The second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 10, will bring as soloist one of Brooklyn's favorite pianists, Mme. Olga Samaroff. Since Mme. Samaroff last played here she has spent a year abroad and found that Europe praised her as highly as her own country people had done. At this concert she will play Liszt's concerto in E flat No. 1.

The first orchestral number will be the immortal "Egmont" overture of Beethoven and then will follow Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which, if it is not a symphony in the strict sense of the word, is none the less one of the most charming works in the literature of the orchestra. It is many years since the Boston Symphony has put it on its programmes and its revival in Boston a few weeks ago by Mr. Fiedler created enthusiasm. The last number will be Wagner's Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

Howard Brockway, a former Brooklynite, now of Baltimore, will give the lecture recital preceding the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday afternoon, in Music Hall, Academy of Music. He will himself illustrate the numbers of the programme for Friday evening, playing them on the piano. These lecture recitals are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. The hour is 4 o'clock.

is Boston DEC 4 1909

Mme. Nordica.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening will bring as soloist Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist. Since Mme. Samaroff last played here she has spent a year abroad. At the concert she will play Liszt's concerto in E flat, No. 1. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another interesting programme. The first number will be the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, and then will follow Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, which, if it is not a symphony in the strict sense of the word, is one of the entertaining works in the literature of the great orchestra. It is many years since the Boston Symphony has put it on its programmes. The last number will be Wagner's Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

[100]

FREE PRESS
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DEC 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Olga Samaroff, die bekannte russische Klavier-Virtuosin wird beim nächsten Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, in der Academy of Music, am 10. Dezember, die Solistin sein. Sie wird Liszt's Concerto in As-Dur spielen. Das Orchester wird unter Max Fiedler Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouvertüre, Goldmarks hübsche Symphonie „Die Bauern-Hochzeit" und das Präludium und den „Liebestod" aus „Tristan und Isolde" spielen.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 5

The second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 10, will bring as soloist one of Brooklyn's favorite pianists, Madame Olga Samaroff. Since Madame Samaroff last played here she has spent a year abroad and found there, to her own gratification, as well as to the gratification of her many friends and admirers in America, that Europe praised her as highly as her own country people had done. Madame Samaroff is not an artist who stands still, and those who have heard her play this year say that her art is much finer and more beautiful than it has been in the past. Madame Samaroff has for several years now ranked among the best women pianists now before the public, and to-day her position is more assured than ever before. At this concert she will play Liszt's concerto in E flat No. 1. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another delightful programme for Brooklyn. The first number will be the immortal "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, and then will follow Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony which, if it is not a symphony in the strict sense of the word, is none the less one of the most charming works in the literature of the great orchestra. It is many years since the Boston Symphony has put it on its programmes, and its revival in Boston a few weeks ago by Mr. Fiedler raised the warmest enthusiasm. The last number will be Wagner's Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC - 8 1909

At the Academy of Music next Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert, when Max Fiedler will conduct, and Mme. Samaroff will sing.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 11 1909

Mischa Elman's first appearance of the season will be on Friday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week, on the 19th, he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House. On Sunday evenings, Feb. 13, 20 and 27 and March 3, he will be the soloist at the closing concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. With Mr. Elman will be Percy Kahn, a young English pianist, who will assist him in his recitals. Elman has just given two additional recitals in Berlin, so great was the demand to hear him.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

Mischa Elman's first appearance of the season will be Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week, on the nineteenth, he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday evenings, February 13, 20 and 27 and March 3 will be the soloist at the closing concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Coming with Elman is Percy Kahn, a young Englishman, who will assist him in his recitals. Elman has just given two additional recitals in Berlin, so great was

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second Brooklyn concert of the season, the soloist being Olga Samaroff, a pianiste who is progressing rapidly along the path of professional achievement. As usual Max Fiedler wielded the baton with all his senses awakened to the artistic proportions of the musical ideas to be expressed. The performance was a marked improvement on that given at the previous appearance of the Bostonians for there was more of that desired clearness and precision and less uncertainty in the treatment of intricate passages. The feature of the programme was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," termed, perhaps too freely, a symphony in E flat major. The composition is comprised of five movements, all appropriately subtitled, but bearing no musical relation to each other further than that they are intended to portray incidents or the atmosphere surrounding a village wedding. The theme of the first movement is a wedding march and this idea is carried through numerous variations, interrupted here and there by warm, sensuous melodies highly suggestive of certain emotional feelings. The following two movements, "Bridal Song" and "Serenade," while cleverly executed by the composer, as conceits are hardly musical enough to recompense for the time consumed in their performance, especially since they delay the fourth movement "In the Garden." In this andante is contained the most beautiful music in the entire company. The joy of the lovers, is expressed in rapturous harmonies sweeping motives and gracefully vanishing phrases. It is the only part of the symphony worth while. The last section, a dance, allegro molto, is lacking in much of that quaint humor and broad sympathy which fills other pieces by Goldmark. Beethoven's overture, "Egmont" opened the concert impressively. While not as brilliant as "Lenores," this composition may be safely said to contain far more expressive beauty and when played as it was last night with the powerful and plastic fulness of a good orchestra, carries the listener nearer to the glow of Beethoven's genius. The "Prelude and Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," was another generous treat. Fiedler read it with a full knowledge of its overflowing lyricims and dramatic strength—the orchestra played it as he sought them to and from the performance Wagner's greatness stood out in impressive boldness. In choosing Liszt's concerto in E flat major, Mme. Samaroff found herself as much embarrassed as other women pianists when confronted with the works of the Hungarian rhapsodist. His wild, irresponsible flights of fancy are too elusive for feminine grasp, and his crashing resolutions can only be coped with by a man of full blooded temperament. In parts of the concerto, however, where the music is not so aggressive, she showed a remarkably delicious touch, playing cadenzas and trills in strains of liquid purity. Her technique is of character more suitable for Chopin nocturnes and the Schumann "Machtstuke."

FORECLOSURES

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 30 1909

MISCHA ELMAN TO PLAY WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Will Play Beethoven's Concert in D Major, Op. 61.

NEXT WEEK'S MUSIC EVENTS.

Rachmaninoff to Play at the Metropolitan—Fritz Kreisler's Coast Tour.

For its concert on Jan. 14, at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of Mischa Elman, the famous violinist. He will play the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven. The entire programme is to be as follows: Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony in A flat major, Op. 55, Elgar; Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven; [illegible] to the opera "Euryanthe," Weber.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FINELY AT THE ACADEMY

Its Beauty of Tone as Pronounced as Ever.

"RUSTIC WEDDING" A DELIGHT

Mlle. Samaroff Plays Liszt No. 1 Concerto Well—Audience Large and Appreciative.

It is coming to be accepted that whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Academy of Music an evening of reveling in sheer beauty of tone is assured, and last night an audience that filled the opera house was in no wise disappointed. The programme prepared by Conductor Max Fiedler proved decidedly interesting, and, as a whole, was finely played. It included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," the Liszt concerto, in E flat major, No. 1, played by Mlle. Olga Samaroff with the orchestra, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

There was only one thing in which the interpretation of the "Egmont" overture was lacking—eloquence. It seemed to be a bit too scholastic. Yet it was a musicianly reading. The mighty lamenting with which the overture begins in no way savored of the lachrymose, and the finale of the "Triumph Symphony," with which it ends, was brought to a resounding climax, with the shrillness of the piccolos outlined against the fanfares of the bassoons and brass between crashings of the full orchestra.

In every way the playing in the "Rustic Wedding" was a delight, and, possibly, the evening's playing may best be characterized by saying that this was by far the best done. The twelve variations on the "Wedding March," in the first movement, were finely played, notably the ninth variation, in which the tender, elgaic quality, with solos for oboe, violin and clarionet, was beautifully brought out, and the eleventh, a melancholy movement in E flat minor.

In the Bridal Song" there was daintiness and the tender tune for the oboe was lovely, though the playfulness was a bit heavy. The duet for two oboes in the "serenade" movement was exquisite, but the finest playing was in the "Garden Scene," which begins with a dreamy melody for clarionet, later taken up by the violins. The ecstatic love duet, in which the 'cellos and horns represent the tenor and the violins and higher wood winds, the soprano, was wonderfully well played, with a wealth of expressiveness and subtlety of phrasing. The accent of jolity in the "Dance" finale was well developed, and the clarionet melody, repeated from the "Garden" movement was again delightfully tender.

Mlle. Samaroff was well pleaced in the Liszt number which has sometimes been called a "triangle concerto" because of the use of the steel as spicing and to enhance the rhythmic effects. That her playing was not overshadowed by the orchestra is no small praise. There is much of rippling sweetness contrasted with passages of power in this work, and Mlle. Samaroff brought accuracy of technique and much of temperament to its interpretation. Her audience paid her the compliment of very close attention. At times her tone had the real singing quality and now and again there was a lucious warmth of tone that carried a strong appeal.

The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was finely played throughout, the "Love Portion" motive being well developed and the 'cellos bringing out the inherent voluptuousness of the second there, the so-called "Tristan's Love Glance." But in the "Liebestod," it must be confessed, such eloquence as there was failed somewhat of gripping. It was intense, ecstatic at times, but it did not body forth the swirling, surging tides of emotion that lie at the call of the conductor who approaches the music at the one moment of inspiration.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y 1910
JAN 2

For its concert on Jan. 14 at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of Mischa Elman, violinist. He will play the concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven, the entire programme to be as follows:

Prelude to opera Lohengrin.....Wagner
Symphony in A flat major, op. 55....Elgar
Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, op. 61 .....Beethoven
Overture to the opera Euryanthe...Weber

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second Brooklyn concert of the season, the soloist being Olga Samaroff, a pianiste who is progressing rapidly along the path of professional achievement. As usual Max Fiedler wielded the baton with all his senses awakened to the artistic proportions of the musical ideas to be expressed. The performance was a marked improvement on that given at the previous appearance of the Bostonians for there was more of that desired clearness and precision and less uncertainty in the treatment of intricate passages. The feature of the programme was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," termed, perhaps too freely, a symphony in E flat major. The composition is comprised of five movements, all appropriately subtitled, but bearing no musical relation to each other further than that they are intended to portray incidents or the atmosphere surrounding a village wedding. The theme of the first movement is a wedding march and this idea is carried through numerous variations, interrupted here and there by warm, sensuous melodies highly suggestive of certain emotional feelings. The following two movements, "Bridal Song" and "Serenade," while cleverly executed by the composer, as conceits are hardly musical enough to recompense for the time consumed in their performance, especially since they delay the fourth movement "In the Garden." In this andante is contained the most beautiful music in the entire company. The joy of the lovers, is expressed in rapturous harmonies sweeping motives and gracefully vanishing phrases. It is the only part of the symphony worth while. The last section, a dance, allegro molto, is lacking in much of that quaint humor and broad sympathy which fills other pieces by Goldmark. Beethoven's overture, "Egmont" opened the concert impressively. While not as brilliant as "Lenores," this composition may be safely said to contain far more expressive beauty and when played as it was last night with the powerful and plastic fulness of a good orchestra, carries the listener nearer to the glow of Beethoven's genius. The "Prelude and Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," was another generous treat. Fiedler read it with a full knowledge of its overflowing lyricims and dramatic strength—the orchestra played it as he sought them to and from the performance Wagner's greatness stood out in impressive boldness. In choosing Liszt's concerto in E flat major, Mme. Samaroff found herself as much embarrassed as other women pianists when confronted with the works of the Hungarian rhapsodist. His wild, irresponsible flights of fancy are too elusive for feminine grasp, and his crashing resolutions can only be coped with by a man of full blooded temperament. In parts of the concerto, however, where the music is not so aggressive, she showed a remarkably delicious touch, playing cadenzas and trills in strains of liquid purity. Her technique is of character more suitable for Chopin nocturnes and the Schumann "Machtstuke."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date DEC 18 1909

THE Boston Symphony orchestra has never lacked good support in Brooklyn, even during the prolonged Baptist Temple interim, but the audience at the second concert of the season, last week Friday evening, if it did not surpass all records, was certainly one of the largest in the Brooklyn annals of this unsurpassed musical organization. A minute inspection might have revealed an empty seat here and there, but to all intents and purposes, the house was sold out from the last row of the topmost gallery to first row of orchestra chairs. It was an audience too, bearing the hall marks of the highest culture and refinement that this borough affords, and any one possessing a spark of local sentiment could scarcely have surveyed it without experiencing a certain sense of pride that this borough is capable of turning out so great an audience of such uniformly superior character. This is doubtless a provincial remark but is inspired by the no less provincial attitude of self conscious superiority so prevalent across the river, where even a musical audience of equal dimensions could scarcely fail to be more or less characterized by the presence of the get-rich-quick contingent whose taste has not kept pace with its fortunes. The size of the audience was rendered the more impressive by contrast with the frosts or freezes which had greeted the last three preceding musical ventures of a high order at the Academy, and gave reassurance that difficult as it may be to obtain Brooklyn support for musical enterprises, it is not impossible. The disadvantages under which promotors of this kind of entertainment in Brooklyn labor are that they have no transient or hotel population to draw upon, and that in bidding for resident patronage they are obliged to overcome the competition of similar entertainments in Manhattan, and with the narrowing distance between the centers of the two boroughs this is becoming increasingly difficult. Another difficulty is to overcome the competition of the Brooklyn Institute, which has accustomed the residents to comparatively low prices for entertainment of very high quality, and finally there is the present adverse condition prevailing throughout the city that the supply both of music and drama far exceeds the demand.

* * *

THE concert last week was as usual delightful and charmingly varied. The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's overture to Eqmont, Goldmark's melodious Symphony, the Rustic Wedding Suite and Prelude and "Love Death" from Tristan und Isolde and it would have required an exacting critic to find flaws in the rendition of any of them. Olga Samaroff was the soloist and gave a masterly interpretaton of Liszt's concerto in E-flat Major No. 1 with orchestral accompaniment. Incidentally she made a singularly graceful and commanding appearance in a gown of crimson velvet.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 2 1910

ELGAR'S GREAT SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman as Soloist at the Academy.

WAGNER CYCLE ANNOUNCED.

Damrosch Getting Ready for His Silver Jubilee Tour—Events for the New Year.

Brooklyn is to have an opportunity of hearing at the next Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 14, Sir Edward Elgar's symphony played by this great orchestra. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season then, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. The other numbers will be the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Weber's overture to the opera, "Euranthe."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WORLD
BROOKLYN
New York City.
DEC 12 1909

Brooklyn Institute.

Mme. Samaroff, pianiste, was the soloist at the brilliant concert given last Friday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mischa Elman, violinist, will be soloist of the next concert of the series, to be given Jan. 14.

[101.]

FREE PRESS
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DEC 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, die berühmte russische Klavier-Virtuosin wird beim nächsten Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, in der Academy of Music, am 10. Dezember, die Solistin sein. Sie wird Liszt's Concerto in As-Dur spielen. Das Orchester wird unter Max Fiedler Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouvertüre, Goldmarks hübsche Symphonie „Die Bauern-Hochzeit" und das Präludium und den „Liebestod" aus „Tristan und Isolde" spielen.

Bro...

The second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 10, will bring as soloist one of Brooklyn's favorite pianists, Madame Olga Samaroff. Since Madame Samaroff last played here she has spent a year abroad and found there, to her own gratification, as well as to the gratification of her many friends and admirers in America, that Europe praised her as highly as her own country people had done. Madame Samaroff is not an artist who stands still, and those who have heard her play this year say that her art is much finer and more beautiful than it has been in the past. Madame Samaroff has for several years now ranked among the best women pianists now before the public, and to-day her position is more assured than ever before. At this concert she will play Liszt's concerto in E flat No. 1. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another delightful programme for Brooklyn. The first number will be the immortal "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, and then will follow Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony which, if it is not a symphony in the strict sense of the word, is none the less one of the most charming works in the literature of the great orchestra. It is many years since the Boston Symphony has put it on its programmes, and its revival in Boston a few weeks ago by Mr. Fiedler raised the warmest enthusiasm. The last number will be Wagner's Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom ...
ddress ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate ... DEC 8 1909

At the Academy of Music next Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert, when Max Fiedler will conduct, and Mme. Samaroff will sing.

1904

...

Mischa Elman's first appearance of the season will be on Friday evening, Jan. 13, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week, on the 19th, he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House. On Sunday evenings, Feb. 13, 20 and 27 and March 3, he will be the soloist at the closing concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. With Mr. Elman will be Percy Kahn, a young English pianist, who will assist him in his recitals. Elman has just given two additional recitals in Berlin, so great was the demand to hear him.

...n ... Eve. Times,
...ress ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

Elman's first appearance of the season will be Thursday evening, January 13, and Saturday afternoon, January 15, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following week, on the nineteenth, he will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall. He is also booked for three concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday evenings, February 13, 20 and ... March 3 will be the soloist at the ...sing concert of the Russian Symphony ...rchestra in Carnegie Hall. Coming ...with Elman is Percy Kahn, a young English pianist, who will assist him in his ...recitals. Elman has just given two additional recitals in Berlin, so great was ...the demand to hear him.

...ess ... Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second Brooklyn concert of the season, the soloist being Olga Samaroff, a pianiste who is progressing rapidly along the path of professional achievement. As usual Max Fiedler wielded the baton with all his senses awakened to the artistic proportions of the musical ideas to be expressed. The performance was a marked improvement on that given at the previous appearance of the Bostonians for there was more of that desired clearness and precision and less uncertainty in the treatment of intricate passages. The feature of the programme was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," termed, perhaps too freely, a symphony in E flat major. The composition is comprised of five movements, all appropriately subtitled, but bearing no musical relation to each other further than that they are intended to portray incidents or the atmosphere surrounding a village wedding. The theme of the first movement is a wedding march and this idea is carried through numerous variations, interrupted here and there by warm, sensuous melodies highly suggestive of certain emotional feelings. The following two movements, "Bridal Song" and "Serenade," while cleverly executed by the composer, as conceits are hardly musical enough to recompense for the time consumed in their performance, especially since they delay the fourth movement "In the Garden." In this andante is contained the most beautiful music in the entire company. The joy of the lovers, is expressed in rapturous harmonies sweeping motives and gracefully vanishing phrases. It is the only part of the symphony worth while. The last section, a dance, allegro molto, is lacking in much of that quaint humor and broad sympathy which fills other pieces by Goldmark. Beethoven's overture, "Egmont" opened the concert impressively. While not as brilliant as "Lenores," this composition may be safely said to contain far more expressive beauty and when played as it was last night with the powerful and plastic fulness of a good orchestra, carries the listener nearer to the glow of Beethoven's genius. The "Prelude and Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," was another generous treat. Fiedler read it with a full knowledge of its overflowing lyricims and dramatic strength—the orchestra played it as he sought them to and from the performance Wagner's greatness stood out in impressive boldness. In choosing Liszt's concerto in E flat major, Mme. Samaroff found herself as much embarrassed as other women pianists when confronted with the works of the Hungarian rhapsodist. His wild, irresponsible flights of fancy are too elusive for feminine grasp, and his crashing resolutions can only be coped with by a man of full blooded temperament. In parts of the concerto, however, where the music is not so aggressive, she showed a remarkably delicious touch, playing cadenzas and trills in strains of liquid purity. Her technique is of character more suitable for Chopin nocturnes and the Schumann "Machtstuke."

FORECLOSURES

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...s ... Eve. Citizen,
...
DEC 30 1909

MISCHA ELMAN TO PLAY WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Will Play Beethoven's Concert in D Major, Op. 61.

NEXT WEEK'S MUSIC EVENTS.

Rachmaninoff to Play at the Metropolitan—Fritz Kreisler's Coast Tour.

For its concert on Jan. 14, at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of Mischa Elman, the famous violinist. He will play the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven. The entire programme is to be as follows: Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony in A flat major, Op. 55, Elgar; Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven; overture to the opera "Euryanthe," Weber.

...ess ... Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FINELY AT THE ACADEMY

Its Beauty of Tone as Pronounced as Ever.

"RUSTIC WEDDING" A DELIGHT

Mlle. Samaroff Plays Liszt No. 1 Concerto Well—Audience Large and Appreciative.

It is coming to be accepted that whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Academy of Music an evening of reveling in sheer beauty of tone is assured, and last night an audience that filled the opera house was in no wise disappointed. The programme prepared by Conductor Max Fiedler proved decidedly interesting, and, as a whole, was finely played. It included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," the Liszt concerto, in E flat major, No. 1, played by Mlle. Olga Samaroff with the orchestra, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

There was only one thing in which the interpretation of the "Egmont" overture was lacking—eloquence. It seemed to be a bit too scholastic. Yet it was a musicianly reading. The mighty lamenting with which the overture begins in no way savored of the lachrymose, and the finale of the "Triumph Symphony," with which it ends, was brought to a resounding climax, with the shrillness of the piccolos outlined against the fanfares of the bassoons and brass between crashings of the full orchestra.

In every way the playing in the "Rustic Wedding" was a delight, and, possibly, the evening's playing may best be characterized by saying that this was by far the best done. The twelve variations on the "Wedding March," in the first movement, were finely played, notably the ninth variation, in which the tender, elgaic quality, with solos for oboe, violin and clarionet, was beautifully brought out, and the eleventh, a melancholy movement in E flat minor.

In the Bridal Song" there was daintiness and the tender tune for the oboe was lovely, though the playfulness was a bit heavy. The duet for two oboes in the "serenade" movement was exquisite, but the finest playing was in the "Garden Scene," which begins with a dreamy melody for clarionet, later taken up by the violins. The ecstatic love duet, in which the 'cellos and horns represent the tenor and the violins and higher wood winds, the soprano, was wonderfully well played, with a wealth of expressiveness and subtlety of phrasing. The accent of jolity in the "Dance" finale was well developed, and the clarionet melody, repeated from the "Garden" movement was again delightfully tender.

Mlle. Samaroff was well pleaced in the Liszt number which has sometimes been called a "triangle concerto" because of the use of the steel as spicing and to enhance the rhythmic effects. That her playing was not overshadowed by the orchestra is no small praise. There is much of rippling sweetness contrasted with passages of power in this work, and Mlle. Samaroff brought accuracy of technique and much of temperament to its interpretation. Her audience paid her the compliment of very close attention. At times her tone had the real singing quality and now and again there was a lucious warmth of tone that carried a strong appeal.

The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was finely played throughout, the "Love Portion" motive being well developed and the 'cellos bringing out the inherent voluptuousness of the second there, the so-called "Tristan's Love Glance." But in the "Liebestod," it must be confessed, such eloquence as there was failed somewhat of gripping. It was intense, ecstatic at times, but it did not body forth the swirling, surging tides of emotion that lie at the call of the conductor who approaches the music at the one moment of inspiration.

...s ...
FEB 2

For its concert on Jan. 14 at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of Mischa Elman, violinist. He will play the concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven, the entire programme to be as follows:

Prelude to opera Lohengrin.....Wagner
Symphony in A flat major, op. 55....Elgar
Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, op. 61 .....Beethoven
Overture to the opera Euryanthe...Weber

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...
Address ... BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date ... DEC 18 1909

THE Boston Symphony orchestra has never lacked good support in Brooklyn, even during the prolonged Baptist Temple interim, but the audience at the second concert of the season, last week Friday evening, if it did not surpass all records, was certainly one of the largest in the Brooklyn annals of this unsurpassed musical organization. A minute inspection might have revealed an empty seat here and there, but to all intents and purposes, the house was sold out from the last row of the topmost gallery to first row of orchestra chairs. It was an audience too, bearing the hall marks of the highest culture and refinement that this borough affords, and any one possessing a spark of local sentiment could scarcely have surveyed it without experiencing a certain sense of pride that this borough is capable of turning out so great an audience of such uniformly superior character. This is doubtless a provincial remark but is inspired by the no less provincial attitude of self conscious superiority so prevalent across the river, where even a musical audience of equal dimensions could scarcely fail to be more or less characterized by the presence of the get-rich-quick contingent whose taste has not kept pace with its fortunes. The size of the audience was rendered the more impressive by contrast with the frosts or freezes which had greeted the last three preceding musical ventures of a high order at the Academy, and gave reassurance that difficult as it may be to obtain Brooklyn support for musical enterprises, it is not impossible. The disadvantages under which promotors of this kind of entertainment in Brooklyn labor are that they have no transient or hotel population to draw upon, and that in bidding for resident patronage they are obliged to overcome the competition of similar entertainments in Manhattan, and with the narrowing distance between the centers of the two boroughs this is becoming increasingly difficult. Another difficulty is to overcome the competition of the Brooklyn Institute, which has accustomed the residents to comparatively low prices for entertainment of very high quality, and finally there is the present adverse condition prevailing throughout the city that the supply both of music and drama far exceeds the demand.

* * *

THE concert last week was as usual delightful and charmingly varied. The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's overture to Egmont, Goldmark's melodious Symphony, the Rustic Wedding Suite and Prelude and "Love Death" from Tristan und Isolde and it would have required an exacting critic to find flaws in the rendition of any of them. Olga Samaroff was the soloist and gave a masterly interpretaton of Liszt's concerto in E-flat Major No. 1 with orchestral accompaniment. Incidentally she made a singularly graceful and commanding appearance in a gown of crimson velvet.

...e First Established and most Compl...
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor...

...om ...
...dress ...
...te ...

ELGAR'S GREAT SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman as Soloist at the Academy.

WAGNER CYCLE ANNOUNCED.

Damrosch Getting Ready for His Silver Jubilee Tour—Events for the New Year.

Brooklyn is to have an opportunity of hearing at the next Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 14, Sir Edward Elgar's symphony played by this great orchestra. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance of the season then, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. The other numbers will be the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Weber's overture to the opera, "Euranthe."

...e First Established and most Complete
...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WORLD
BROOKLYN
New York City.
DEC 19 1909

Brooklyn Institute.

Mme. Samaroff, pianiste, was the soloist at the brilliant concert given last Friday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mischa Elman, violinist, will be soloist of the next concert of the series, to be given Jan. 14.

[101]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 18 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme at the Academy, With Olga Samaroff as Pianist.

Brooklyn does itself proud in its devotion to the noble Boston Symphony Orchestra. As usual, when this band plays, there was not a vacant seat in the Academy of Music Friday night. The programme was less strenuous than we have been hearing of late, but after dwelling in the heights with Beethoven and Tschaikowsky, the pleasantly diversified rolling country of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony proved an attractive contrast. A public which has listened to three performances of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in two months is not exactly perishing for musical uplift. But Mr. Fiedler took us into an exceedingly high mountain last night, before he unrolled the Goldmark scenic panorama, by playing Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and he gave us a glimpse of the eternal stars to carry home by playing the "Perlude and Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" at the close. Before that came the Liszt concerto in E flat, played by Mme. Samaroff, the one which they sneered at as "the Triange concerto" in Vienna, when it was new.

Perhaps that music did not so completely merit Marlow's enconium "infinite riches in a little room," as did Mr. Mahler's selection of a week earlier, which had Beethoven's Fifth Syhphony, and "Leonore" overture, the Menhelssohn violin concerto and the prelude to 'Meistersinger," but it made a well balanced contrasted and contrasted programme. Its performance was, as usual, as near to perfection as any art effort in this most imperfect old world ever gets. Perhaps the orchestra seemed at its best in the Beethoven and Wagner merely because that music was the biggest and one insensibly and inevitably associates the sweep of the composer's power with his interpreters, unless the performance is so bad as to detract from the music. At any rate the "Symphony of Victory" at the close of "Egmont" music had a mighty swing which exalted the soul—as tragedy should do.

Whether Goldmark wrote a symphony or a suite in his "Rustic Wedding" does not matter. There are houses which defy the laws of architecture in the recklessness with which onue wing is added to another which yet produce a charming and piquant effect in themselves. That is the case with Goldmark's music, which the rich Eastern color over-runs and decorates until the surface is so lovely that you do not mind the form. A first symphony movement with 12 variations on the gay little opening wedding march is certainly novel, and it is also a trifle long. Perhaps it would be as well if there were only ten, until you try to decide which you would spare. The "Bridal song" is richly melodious and the duet of the Scherze sparkled crisply last night, but the movement which the audience liked best was the andante "In the Garden," with its languorous richness.

Mme. Samaroff made a profound impression inBrooklyn two years ago by the fire with which she played a modern conterto with this same orchestra at the Baptist Temple. Last night in the Liszt music she seemed subdued, or perhaps merely tired. She gave a performance of impeccable technic and maintained the balance between orchestra and sole instrument with the nicest and most exact taste, but it was not until the despised triange entered that the performance began to sparkle. Neither Liszt nor his most hostile critics could have complained that the little instrument was ever done in this performance. The whole passage had a fairylike delicacy, the relation of the triange to the piano part was clearly brought out, and from that time on the concerto swept up to its climax with brilliancy as well as with balance and perfect exactitude.

The familiar Wagner music had power without strain, senority without blare, and it proved, what used to be so strenuously denied, that Wagner can be played as beautifully as the classics—if only the band be good.

From HERALD
Address BROOKLYN EDIT. New York City.
Date JAN

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

FOR the third Boston Symphony Society concert this season in Brooklyn, on January 14, at the Academy of Music, a programme of more than usual interest is offered. Mischa Elman, a violinist, who made his local début a year ago with brilliant success, also with the Boston Orchestra, will be the soloist next Friday evening. In response to many requests from patrons of the symphony concerts in Brooklyn Mr. Max Fiedler has put upon the programme Edward Elgar's symphony, which the orchestra played in its native city last season. Following is the complete programme for the coming concert:—Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin," Wagner; symphony in A flat major, opus 55, Elgar; concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 61, Beethoven; overture to the opera "Euryanthe," Weber.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 8 1910

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY TO PLAY HERE TO-NIGHT

Busoni the Soloist to Give "Emperor" Concerto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOON.

Will Play Elgar Work on Jan. 14 —Music Notes of General Interest.

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Jan. 14, offers a programme of more than usual interest. In the first place, it will mark the reappearance this season of Mischa Elman, whose playing and art made a sensation a year ago when he appeared here with the Boston Symphony. A year ago he made his debut here, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto. This year he will play one of the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—Beethoven's concerto in D major, opus 61.

In response to the many requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has placed on this programme the Elgar symphony. The work has been so much discussed and written about that it is not necessary to make comment on it. Suffice to say that it is certain of receiving the performance worthy of its importance. The other two numbers on the programme will be the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 8 191

In response to requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme for the third concert next Friday evening, the Elgar Symphony which, generally speaking, is regarded as the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years. Mr. Fiedler played it in Boston last year with much success and has just repeated it there this year. The repetition was due chiefly to the fact that Brooklyn wanted to hear it at this January concert. The work has been so discussed and written about that it is not necessary to make comment on it.

Mischa Elman, the young violinist, will be the soloist, and will play one of the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra, Beethoven's Concerto in D major, Op. 61. The other two numbers on the programme will be the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 12 1910

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT AT THE ACADEMY.

The sale of tickets for the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Friday evening next at the Academy of Music, is the largest this season. While the house was sold out for the first concert, and is now sold out for the January concert, the demand for standing room is greater than it was in November. The continual increase of interest in the Philharmonic concerts, under the conductorship of Max Fiedler, is apparent. Moreover, the coming of Mischa Elman, as violinist, adds to the interest in the programme for Friday evening.

From
Address
Date FEB 5 1910

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the last two seasons, to-day signed a contract to continue in that position during the seasons of 1910 and 1911.

[102]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 8 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH MISCHA ELMAN

Will Furnish the Chief Musical Incident in Brooklyn Next Week.

STRONG BILLS AT THE OPERAS

And Attractive Concerts in Both Boroughs, Including a People's Symphony Programme.

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, January 14, offers a programme of more than usual interest. In the first place, it will mark the reappearance this season of Mischa Elman, whose playing and whose personality made such a sensation a year ago when he appeared here with the Boston Symphony. A year ago he made his debut here, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto. This year he will play the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra, Beethoven's Concerto in D major, opus 61.

In response to many requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has placed on this programme the Elgar Symphony, which, generally speaking, is regarded as the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years. Mr. Fiedler played it in Boston last year with much success and has just repeated it there this year, the repetition being due chiefly to the fact that Brooklyn wanted to hear it at this January concert. It is certain of receiving a performance worthy of its importance. The programme in full is as follows:

Wagner—Prelude to the Opera "Lohengrin."
Elgar—Symphony in A Flat Major, Op. 55.
Beethoven—Concerto for Violin and orchestra in D Major, Op. 61.
Weber—Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JAN 9 19

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Jan. 14, offers a programme of more than usual interest. In the first place it will mark the re-appearance this season of Mischa Elman, whose playing and whose astounding art made such a sensation a year ago when he appeared here with the Boston Symphony. A year ago he made his debut here, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto. This year he will play the greatest of all works for violin and orchestra—Beethoven's Concerto in D Major, opus 61. In response to many requests from the patrons of the Boston Symphony, in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has placed on this programme the Elgar Symphony, which, generally speaking, is regarded as the most important contribution to symphonic literature in several years. Mr. Fiedler played it in Boston last year with much success, and has just repeated it there this year, the repetition being due chiefly to the fact that Brooklyn wanted to hear it at this January concert. The work has been so discussed and written about that it is not necessary to make comment on it Suffice to say that it is certain of receiving the performance worthy of its importance. The other two numbers on the programme will be the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Euryanthe." The programme in full is as follows:

Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Symphony in A Flat, opus 55.....Elgar
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major, opus 61 .....Beethover
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"..Weber
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn
JAN 13 191

ELMAN CHANGES HIS CONCERTO.

Announcement is made of a change in the programme of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at the Academy of Music, to-morrow evening. Orchestral numbers remain the same, but Mischa Elman will play the Dvorak Concerto, op. 5, for piano and orchestra, in place of the Beethoven Concerto in D major.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 15 1910

BOSTONIANS PLAY ELGAR'S SYMPHONY

The value of a reputation, especially that enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was demonstrated last night when a very large number of music-lovers ventured from the sheltering portals of their homes to the Academy of Music, where this philharmonic organization gave the third of its series of Brooklyn concerts, under the direction of Max Fiedler.

The audience derived real and unalloyed pleasure in the prelude to "Lohengrin." It was played with a briskness hardly typical of Wagnerian conductors, who, as a rule, love to stop and linger over their Wagner, drawing from every phrase all possible meanings, and even leaving the echoes die away, with a great deal of reluctance, until the entire purport of the master's ideas has been fully revealed. Yet Fiedler accomplishes in his way equally satisfactory results, for not only is he Wagnerian, but he also is modern.

In the performance of Elgar's Symphony in A flat major, the conductor read the score with an aggressive display of energy. Elgar's work is of a character that may lend itself to many interpretations. The symphony was introduced to this country only about a year ago, and last night was its first hearing in Brooklyn. In the meanwhile it has passed through the mill of critical hodge-podge, and still no authoritative decision has been reached as to its real merit. In this connection, however, it is sufficient to state that the American public hasn't taken to the composition very warmly, and the audience at the Academy was no exception. It is clearly apparent that the composer, in conceiving the score, pursued a programme of emotional and religious ideas, although there is nothing outside of the orchestration to convey anything definite to this effect. It is suggested that what passed in mind was Beethoven's pet theme, the struggle of man against fate. The analogy is quite a mysterious one, excepting that while Beethoven throws himself heart and soul into the conflict, Elgar remains off in the distance and choses to mould figures and express himself in the abstract. Beethoven breathes forth ... for humanity—Elgar preaches ... idealism. The interest of the symphony, its meaning, its significance lies entirely in the first movement andante nobilmente e semplice-Allegro. A melodic subject is heard immediately, and with this as a basis of development, the composer evolves his story. The second movement ... but few orchestral details worthy of attention, and, besides, bears no relation to the main subject. The same is true of the third movement, Adagio—this section, however, being made more musical by the introduction of an Oriental rhythm, which gradually disappears in the ... lento-allegro, yielding way to an admirably rich harmonization of the original melody heard in the violins beginning.

The symphony in its form is neither radically orthodox nor modern. Set in the simple key of A flat major, the work is constructed on conventional diatonic principles, while there is no end of heavy involved counterpoint, the beauty of much of the resulting harmony is somewhat doubtful). There is certainly too much of Elgarian austerity about the symphony to make it really appealing.

The big attraction at the concert last night was the appearance of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Instead of playing Beethoven's concerto in D major, he chose an unrepresentative and rather tiring composition by Dvorak—concerto in A major. Elman has shown himself to be a genius so often it would be futile to consider his performance last night in a serious light. What he had to do he did ably, with an unmistakable sureness of technique. The great opportunities, however, demanding the full inspiration of gifted nature were not afforded young Elman in the Dvorak concerto, and he played it just as the average good violinist could have done. The overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" was the concluding orchestral number of the evening.

JAN 15 1910

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS HERE.

Makes First Brooklyn Appearance This Season at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Two things last evening made the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music of special interest—Mischa Elman, the violinist, made his first Brooklyn appearance of the season, and Sir Edward Elgar's symphony in A flat major, op. 55, which has aroused much discussion wherever played, was the principal orchestral number. Again the tone of the orchestra was one of its great beauties, and both the orchestra, under Max Fielder, and Mr. Elman were received with enthusiasm.

The Elgar symphony was played finely with intelligence and power, and with appreciation of its possibilities. It is in four movements: Andante nobilmente e semplice—allegro; allegro molto; adagio, and lento-allegro. It appears to be the familiar musical tale of the struggles of man or a man with fate and environment, and as a piece of music is decidedly interesting, though at times rather dull. The symphony was first played at Manchester, England, in December, 1908, and was first given in this country by the New York Symphony Orchestra in January, 1909.

Mr. Elman played wonderfully well, enough better than he did last year, in fact, to justify the hopes of his admirers. He substituted Dvorak's concerto in A minor, op. 53, for Beethoven's concerto in D major, op. 61, which had been announced. The same brilliancy of tone, the same freedom and the same swift and facile finger technique which have delighted audiences in former years were present. Elman has by no means reached his possibilities.

An inspired performance of the prelude to "Lohengrin" opened the concert, and the last number, also finely played, was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 13

CHANGE IN PROGRAMME.

Announcement is made of a change in the programme of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The orchestral numbers will remain the same, but Mischa Elman will play the Dvorak concerto, opus 5, for piano and orchestra, in place of the Beethoven concerto in D major.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 15 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Attendance at the Academy of Music and a Fine Programme Was Played.

An attendance at the Boston Symphony's fourth concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening, was so large that it may be concluded that weather has no appreciable effect on society music lovers. Nearly every seat was filled and it was noticed that the usually frequent automobile was distinguished by its absence, the old-time four-wheelers gathering in such force that they filled the block from Hanson place to Lafayette avenue, on Ashland place. The few autos on view traveled through the deep snow with as much difficulty as though it were sand. In the opera house of the Academy a refreshing and contrasting sight was a row of greenery across the space for the footlights, with a spot of color in the way of flowers at the center, in front of Conductor Fiedler's music rack.

Mr. Fiedler's men were in fine form and the programme was well fitted to show his merits and style of conducting. Sir Edward Elgar's colossal Symphony in A flat major, opus 55, claimed attention as conveying the deepest musical thought. More than any other number on the programme it called for a crisp picking out of the various choirs with the baton in order to make it eloquent and interpretative of Elgar's meaning. It had this treatment by the conductor, from the opening by the violas with the main theme, in a marching chant, through the tremendous allegro, introducing phases of joy and sorrow, struggle and conquest, through an adagio, depicting further struggle of a soul amid its earthly surroundings, and to the final serene victory over all ills. So much of the symphony depicts intense emotion that there is little opportunity for delicacy of nuancing; the task of the conductor was directed to maintaining the swing and flow of the piece, while the voices of the separate choirs were kept pure, instrument answering to instrument and choir to choir. And this with constant full-throated and ever-varying harmonies. The symphony was a concert in itself and Mr. Fiedler's incisive baton accomplished for it a beautiful interpretation such as would add laurels to the brow of any conductor.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, was to have played with the orchestra a Beethoven concerto, the D major, opus 61, but Dvorak's concerto in A minor, opus 53, was substituted. Elman's facility, in this romantically scored concerto, was fully appreciated. He was felicitous in lyric quality with the orchestra delicately in the background, the first violins being most of the time rather hushed, so that the musicianly quality of the young player's work came well to the front. His mannerisms are many and one could often better appreciate the eloquence of his bow, his trickling runs up and down the neck of the violin, as well as his beautiful utterance, if eyes were averted from his genuflections. No one could deny that he declares his enjoyment of his music to the eye as well as to the ear. And he communicated his enjoyment to the audience. His genuine merit, his opulence of tone, his complete command of himself and the violin, gave him so strong a hold on the audience that he was recalled by count seven times to bow to applause.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" was the opening number and Mr. Fiedler leaned rather to the intellectual than to the sensuous in giving it voice through his players. Every sentence was cleanly cut and yet the mass movement was carried forward logically and yet without undue insistence on the brasses. One of Mr. Fiedler's strong points, indeed, is his good taste in never overdoing the dynamics. The closing number was Weber's overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," with its introduction of arias in the opera. Old arias, they are, seldom heard and all the more grateful on that account, brilliantly orchestrated and full of accent and fiery passion.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
JAN 15 1910

MUSICAL.

Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Mischa Elman as Soloist.

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came off according to schedule at the Academy of Music, last night, and a splendid concert it was. Added to the playing of the orchestra itself, which always ensures a full measure of satisfaction, was the playing of Mischa Elman, the youthful violinist, who astonished the musical world a year ago, and who has returned to call forth further laudation of his remarkable ability. The house had been sold out, and that there were some empty seats was due to the severity of the storm. Those who braved the wind and the snow had ample reward.

Edward Elgar's Symphony in A Flat, introduced to this country a year ago, was the principal orchestral number, and was heard for the first time in Brooklyn. It is a work to command attention and to cause discussion as to its significance and relative musical interest. It leaves no doubt that it is a composition of high aspiration in musical expression and a striving for unconventional effects within the scope of the conventional four-movement form. In general it has the freedom of a symphonic poem in the form of a symphony. It is unified by the employment throughout of one central theme, a simple, noble melody, and by the frequent use in one movement of material from another. There can be no question that it is a finely-wrought work, and it had a splendid exposition under the baton of Mr. Fiedler. The concert opened with the overture to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and closed with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

Instead of the Beethoven Concerto in D Major, for which he was programmed, Mr. Elman played Dvorak's Concerto in A Minor, and played it astonishing virtuoso authority. It is not easy to understand how this lad under 20 (official information is lacking as to whether he is just 18 or 19), can give such evidence of mastery, but that he has the technical skill and power of expression of an extraordinary master there can be no doubt. He was recalled again and again, and the audience was unusually demonstrative in expressing approbation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LIFE
From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date JAN 22 1910

THE third concert of the twenty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn fell upon about as wild a night as ever falls to the lot of dwellers in this particular latitude and longitude, and in spite of the advertised appearance of the now celebrated young violinist, Mischa Elman, one might reasonably have expected to find half the seats in the Academy of Music Opera House vacant. Not so. In spite of the raging elements, and a program which made but the meagerest concessions to Philistine tastes, it was a very large audience, for it is a large house, and there were not enough vacant seats anywhere to attract attention to themselves. If this was not a conclusive argument in favor of Brooklyn's claim to being a music loving community, it testifies emphatically to the efficacy of advertising, for no one in the musical world has of late been more talked about than the young Russian genius who was the soloist. On the other hand if it was the celebrity of Elman and not music per se, which was the compelling motive, it was not the automobile owning or even cab hiring class which was conspicuously influenced by it; for the prevalence of daylight apparel even in the orchestra seats testified to the fact that the majority had either availed themselves of such limited public transportation facilities as the conditions permitted, or resorted to the primitive method of locomotion employed by the youth bearing the banner labeled "Votes for"—pardon me—"Excelsior." This vexed question might easily have been decided for Elman himself, provided an excellent opportunity for testing the musical understanding of the audience by substituting without warning Dvorak's concerto in A minor, Op. 53 for Beethoven's concerto in D major, Op. 61, which was on the program. The test would not perhaps be accounted a very exacting one and possibly everybody in the audience was aware of the difference, but at the same time it cannot be denied that a canvass of the house to determine exactly how many knew that they were not listening to Beethoven would have been interesting. Elman's interpretation was singularly beautiful, though marred by mannerisms not particularly pleasing. This and Elgar's symphony in A flat major were sandwiched between the prelude to Lohengrin and the overture to Weber's Euryanthe, and constituted the major part of the program. The prelude and the overture brought the program within hailing distance of the music lover to whom harmony alone is not wholly satisfying, and to whom the Elgar composition at any rate must have seemed somewhat monotonous. As nobody, I presume, will mistake the preceding for the language of a musical critic, it is scarcely necessary to allude to the excellence of the concert which was up to the highest Boston Symphony level. Of the audience it may be incidentally remarked that Mrs. Camden C. Dike, who occupied one of the boxes, appeared in an exquisite cloak and hat of ermine in which she might have been mistaken for a Dowager Duchess. A few others observed in the audience were Dr. and Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Augustus F. Holly, Jr., Miss Chittenden, Mrs. Katharine Perry, Miss Nina Perry, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Esther Low, the Rev. Henry T. Scudder, Mr. Arthur M. Hatch, Mr. Walter Stuart, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Professor Franklin W. Hooper, Dr. Jacques Cortelyou Rushmore, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins and Mr. Walter Perkins.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
FEB 12 1910

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent out the following announcement:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered."

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Newspaper Cutting
Standard Union,
From Brooklyn, N. Y
Address FEB 12

As putting an end to various rumors respecting the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the final announcement is made that the only musicians considered for the post are Max Fielder, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin.

Established and most Complete Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 13 1910

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state, with utmost emphasis, that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

n
ress
e
FEB 13 1910

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 25, and for the first time this year there will be no soloist. This will allow Mr. Fiedler to present the most complete orchestral programme he has been able to do during the present season. The two great works that he has placed on the programme are Brahm's Second Symphony in D Major and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Strauss tone poem is regarded by those who have heard it as quite the most tremendous thing he has ever done. He has had to repeat it in Boston. The other numbers will be Schumann's overture "Geneveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 16 1910

MAX FIEDLER STAYS.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
FEB 19 1910

Howard Brockway, composer and pianist, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opera house, Academy of Music, on Friday evening. The lecture recital is set for Thursday, at 4 P. M., in the music hall of the Academy. It is given under the direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Institute.

Daily
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 19 191

ANOTHER FULL WEEK FOR LOVERS OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Comes on Friday, February 25.

FINE CONCERTS TO-MORROW.

N. Y. Symphony in Brahms-Berlioz Numbers—Philharmonic Has Amato as Soloist.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 25, and for the first time this year there will be no soloist. This will allow Mr. Fiedler to present the most complete orchestral programme he has been able to do during the present season. The two great works that he has placed on the programme are Brahms' Second Symphony in D Major and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Strauss tone poem is regarded by those who have heard it as quite the finest thing he has ever done. He has had to repeat it in Boston. The other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Geneveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 19 1910

An exclusively orchestral programme has been planned for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Having greater leeway than usual Mr. Fiedler will conduct a programme of striking contrasts, while holding to the serious ideal befitting the character of the concerts. Schumann's "Geneveva" overture will be followed by Brahm's Second Symphony. The second part of the programme will consist of Strauss' tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz.

Daily
Brooklyn
FEB 19 1910

Howard Brockway, composer and pianist, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opera house, Academy of Music, Friday evening. The lecture recital is set for Thursday, at 4 P.M., in the music hall of the Academy. It is given under the direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 19 1910

Mr. Fiedler has arranged an important programme for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, to be given at the Academy, under Institute auspices, next Friday night.

NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Brooklyn, N.Y.
FEB 13 1910

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state, with utmost emphasis, that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
FEB 19 1910

Howard Brockway, composer and pianist, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opera house, Academy of Music, Friday evening. The lecture recital is set for Thursday, at 4 P. M., in the music hall of the Academy. It is given under the direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Institute.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R.
DEC 26

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the series of four to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 4. For the first time Providence will be able to hear Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist play the stupendous Tschaikowsky concerto with orchestra. Elman made nothing short of a sensation here a year ago, when he gave a recital, and the mere announcement of his coming with the Boston Symphony should be sufficient to give an overflowing house.

The orchestral numbers will include Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony which has not been heard here in many years, and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The sale of seats will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on Saturday, Jan. 1.

[103]

Daily Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 15 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Attendance at the Academy of Music and a Fine Programme Was Played.

An attendance at the Boston Symphony's fourth concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening, was so large that it may be concluded that weather has no appreciable effect on society music lovers. Nearly every seat was filled and it was noticed that the usually frequent automobile was distinguished by its absence, the old-time four-wheelers gathering in such force that they filled the block from Hanson place to Lafayette avenue, on Ashland place. The few autos on view traveled through the deep snow with as much difficulty as though it were sand. In the opera house of the Academy a refreshing and contrasting sight was a row of greenery across the space for the footlights, with a spot of color in the way of flowers at the center, in front of Conductor Fiedler's music rack.

Mr. Fiedler's men were in fine form and the programme was well fitted to show his merits and style of conducting. Sir Edward Elgar's colossal Symphony in A flat major, opus 55, claimed attention as conveying the deepest musical thought. More than any other number on the programme it called for a crisp picking out of the various choirs with the baton in order to make it eloquent and interpretative of Elgar's meaning. It had this treatment by the conductor, from the opening by the violas with the main theme, in a marching chant, through the tremendous allegro, introducing phases of joy and sorrow, struggle and conquest, through an adagio, depicting further struggle of a soul amid its earthly surroundings, and to the final serene victory over all ills. So much of the symphony depicts intense emotion that there is little opportunity for delicacy of nuancing; the task of the conductor was directed to maintaining the swing and flow of the piece, while the voices of the separate choirs were kept pure, instrument answering to instrument and choir to choir. And this with constant full-throated and ever-varying harmonies. The symphony was a concert in itself and Mr. Fiedler's incisive baton accomplished for it a beautiful interpretation such as would add laurels to the brow of any conductor.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, was to have played with the orchestra a Beethoven concerto, the D major, opus 61, but Dvorak's concerto in A minor, opus 53, was substituted. Elman's facility, in this romantically scored concerto, was fully appreciated. He was felicitous in lyric quality with the orchestra delicately in the background, the first violins being most of the time rather hushed, so that the musicianly quality of the young player's work came well to the front. His mannerisms are many and one could often better appreciate the eloquence of his bow, his trickling runs up and down the neck of the violin, as well as his beautiful utterance, if eyes were averted from his genuflections. No one could deny that he declares his enjoyment of his music to the eye as well as to the ear. And he communicated his enjoyment to the audience. His genuine merit, his opulence of tone, his complete command of himself and the violin, gave him so strong a hold on the audience that he was recalled by count seven times to bow to applause.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" was the opening number and Mr. Fiedler leaned rather to the intellectual than to the sensuous in giving it voice through his players. Every sentence was cleanly cut and yet the mass movement was carried forward logically and yet without undue insistence on the brasses. One of Mr. Fiedler's strong points, indeed, is his good taste in never overdoing the dynamics. The closing number was Weber's overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," with its introduction of arias in the opera. Old arias, they are, seldom heard and all the more grateful on that account, brilliantly orchestrated and full of accent and fiery passion.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
JAN 15 1910

MUSICAL.

Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Mischa Elman as Soloist.

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came off according to schedule at the Academy of Music, last night, and a splendid concert it was. Added to the playing of the orchestra itself, which always ensures a full measure of satisfaction, was the playing of Mischa Elman, the youthful violinist, who astonished the musical world a year ago, and who has returned to call forth further laudation of his remarkable ability. The house had been sold out, and that there were some empty seats was due to the severity of the storm. Those who braved the wind and the snow had ample reward.

Edward Elgar's Symphony in A Flat, introduced to this country a year ago, was the principal orchestral number, and was heard for the first time in Brooklyn. It is a work to command attention and to cause discussion as to its significance and relative musical interest. It leaves no doubt that it is a composition of high aspiration in musical expression and a striving for unconventional effects within the scope of the conventional four-movement form. In general it has the freedom of a symphonic poem in the form of a symphony. It is unified by the employment throughout of one central theme, a simple, noble melody, and by the frequent use in one movement of material from another. There can be no question that it is a finely-wrought work, and it had a splendid exposition under the baton of Mr. Fiedler. The concert opened with the overture to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and closed with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

Instead of the Beethoven Concerto in D Major, for which he was programmed, Mr. Elman played Dvorak's Concerto in A Minor, and played it astonishing virtuoso authority. It is not easy to understand how this lad under 20 (official information is lacking as to whether he is just 18 or 19), can give such evidence of mastery, but that he has the technical skill and power of expression of an extraordinary master there can be no doubt. He was recalled again and again, and the audience was unusually demonstrative in expressing approbation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date JAN 15 1910

THE third concert of the twenty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn fell upon about as wild a night as ever falls to the lot of dwellers in this particular latitude and longitude, and in spite of the advertised appearance of the now celebrated young violinist, Mischa Elman, one might reasonably have expected to find half the seats in the Academy of Music Opera House vacant. Not so. In spite of the raging elements, and a program which made but the meagerest concessions to Philistine tastes, it was a very large audience, for it is a large house, and there were not enough vacant seats anywhere to attract attention to themselves. If this was not a conclusive argument in favor of Brooklyn's claim to being a music loving community, it testifies emphatically to the efficacy of advertising, for no one in the musical world has of late been more talked about than the young Russian genius who was the soloist. On the other hand if it was the celebrity of Elman and not music per se, which was the compelling motive, it was not the automobile owning or even cab hiring class which was conspicuously influenced by it; for the prevalence of daylight apparel even in the orchestra seats testified to the fact that the majority had either availed themselves of such limited public transportation facilities as the conditions permitted, or resorted to the primitive method of locomotion employed by the youth bearing the banner labeled "Votes for"—pardon me—"Excelsior." This vexed question might easily have been decided for Elman himself, provided an excellent opportunity for testing the musical understanding of the audience by substituting without warning Dvorak's concerto in A minor, Op. 53 for Beethoven's concerto in D major, Op. 61, which was on the program. The test would not perhaps be accounted a very exacting one and possibly everybody in the audience was aware of the difference, but at the same time it cannot be denied that a canvass of the house to determine exactly how many knew that they were not listening to Beethoven would have been interesting. Elman's interpretation was singularly beautiful, though marred by mannerisms not particularly pleasing. This and Elgar's symphony in A flat major were sandwiched between the prelude to Lohengrin and the overture to Weber's Euryanthe, and constituted the major part of the program. The prelude and the overture brought the program within hailing distance of the music lover to whom harmony alone is not wholly satisfying, and to whom the Elgar composition at any rate must have seemed somewhat monotonous. As nobody, I presume, will mistake the preceding for the language of a musical critic, it is scarcely necessary to allude to the excellence of the concert which was up to the highest Boston Symphony level. Of the audience it may be incidentally remarked that Mrs. Camden C. Dike, who occupied one of the boxes, appeared in an exquisite cloak and hat of ermine in which she might have been mistaken for a Dowager Duchess. A few others observed in the audience were Dr. and Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Augustus F. Holly, Jr., Miss Chittenden, Mrs. Katharine Perry, Miss Nina Perry, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Esther Low, the Rev. Henry T. Scudder, Mr. Arthur M. Hatch, Mr. Walter Stuart, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Professor Franklin W. Hooper, Dr. Jacques Cortelyou Rushmore, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins and Mr. Walter Perkins.

om
ldress
te
Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.
FEB 19 1910

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent out the following announcement:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered." C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 19

As putting an end to various rumors respecting the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the final announcement is made that the only musicians considered for the post are Max Fielder, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin.

Established and most Complete
Cutting Bureau in the World

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state, with utmost emphasis, that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

n
ress
e

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 25, and for the first time this year there will be no soloist. This will allow Mr. Fiedler to present the most complete orchestral programme he has been able to do during the present season. The two great works that he has placed on the programme are Brahm's Second Symphony in D Major and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Strauss tone poem is regarded by those who have heard it as quite the most tremendous thing he has ever done. He has had to repeat it in Boston. The other numbers will be Schumann's overture "Geneveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Citizen,
N. Y.
FEB 16 1910

MAX FIEDLER STAYS.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

Daily
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 19 191

ANOTHER FULL WEEK FOR LOVERS OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Comes on Friday, February 25.

FINE CONCERTS TO-MORROW.

N. Y. Symphony in Brahms-Berlioz Numbers—Philharmonic Has Amato as Soloist.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 25, and for the first time this year there will be no soloist. This will allow Mr. Fiedler to present the most complete orchestral programme he has been able to do during the present season. The two great works that he has placed on the programme are Brahms' Second Symphony in D Major and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Strauss tone poem is regarded by those who have heard it as quite the finest thing he has ever done. He has had to repeat it in Boston. The other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Geneveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

ss

An exclusively orchestral programme has been planned for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Having greater leeway than usual Mr. Fiedler will conduct a programme of striking contrasts, while holding to the serious ideal befitting the character of the concerts. Schumann's "Geneveva" overture will be followed by Brahm's Second Symphony. The second part of the programme will consist of Strauss' tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zaralhustra," "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz.

Howard Brockway, composer and pianist, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opera house, Academy of Music, Friday evening. The lecture recital is set for Thursday, at 4 P.M., in the music hall of the Academy. It is given under the direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

LE ADDRESS
KE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
s

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra desires to state, with utmost emphasis, that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr Muck been even considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ss

Mr. Fiedler has arranged an important programme for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, to be given at the Academy, under Institute auspices, next Friday night.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R.
DEC 2

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the series of four to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 4. For the first time Providence will be able to hear Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist, play the stupendous Tschaikowsky concerto with orchestra. Elman made nothing short of a sensation here a year ago, when he gave a recital, and the mere announcement of his coming with the Boston Symphony should be sufficient to give an overflowing house.

The orchestral numbers will include Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which has not been heard here in many years, and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The sale of seats will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on Saturday, Jan. 1.

[103]

Daily Citizen,
ss ... B... N. Y.
FEB 19 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT FRIDAY EVENING

Unusual Programme Prepared by Conductor Fiedler.

PHILHARMONIC GOES ON TOUR

Many Things of Musical Interest Scheduled for This Borough and Manhattan.

In many respects the most important programme that Max Fiedler has yet given in Brooklyn has been arranged for the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday night. There will be no soloist, which fact gives Mr. Fiedler greater leeway than usual, and while the programme is serious, it contains sharp contrasts of manner and style which go to make a concert enjoyable.

The programme will open with Schumann's "Geneveva" overture, and this will be followed by Brahms' Symphony in D Major, No. 2. Both in Schumann and Brahms, Mr. Fiedler has demonstrated that he is peculiarly a master, for he realizes the romanticism of the one and is able to show the melodic beauty and lucidity of the other. The Brahms Second Symphony, generally speaking, is the most popular of the four, because of its intrinsic melodic value, its grace and lightness.

The second part of the programme will begin with Richard Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This work has not been heard in Brooklyn for a great many years, and when it was first played it was even more incomprehensible to trained ears than the last thing from his pen, the opera "Electra." To-day "Zarathustra" shows itself a well-ordered symphonic work with episodes of great grandeur and episodes of extreme beauty. It is questionable whether any musical work contains a more sublime episode than the opening of this tone-poem. Mr. Fiedler has shown Brooklyn how thoroughly he is in sympathy with Strauss' aims and ideals, and in Boston, at least, his performance of "Zarathustra" is regarded as the greatest ever given by the orchestra.

The final number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

ss ... Bro...
FEB 19 1910

TWO ORCHESTRAS AND "LA BOHEME"

Will Be the Chief Musical Incidents in Brooklyn Next Week.

FINE OPERA PROGRAMMES

And Some Notable Concerts to Be Heard in Manhattan.

In many respects the most important programme that Mr. Fiedler has yet given in Brooklyn has been arranged for the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday night. There will be no soloist, which fact gives Mr. Fiedler greater leeway than usual, and while the programme is serious it contains sharp contrasts of manner and style which go to make a concert enjoyable. The programme opens with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and this will be followed by Brahms' Symphony in D Major No. 2. The second part of the programme will begin with Richard Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler has shown Brooklyn how thoroughly he is in sympathy with Strauss' aims and ideals, and in Boston his performance of "Zarathustra" is regarded as the greatest ever given by the orchestra.

The final number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Standard Union,
om ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
dress ...
FEB 20 1910
te ...

In many respects the most important programme that Mr. Fiedler has yet given in Brooklyn has been arranged for the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday night. There will be no soloist, which fact gives Mr. Fiedler greater leeway than usual, and while the programme is serious, it contains sharp contrasts of manner and style, which go to make a concert enjoyable. The programme opens with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and this will be followed by Brahm's symphony in D major, No. 2. Both in Schumann and Brahms Mr. Fiedler has demonstrated that he is peculiarly a master, for he realizes the romanticism of the one and is able to show the melodic beauty and lucidity of the other. The Brahms second symphony, generally speaking, is the most popular of the four, because of its intrinsic melodic value, its grace and lightness. The second part of the programme will begin with Richard Strauss' monumental tone opera, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This work has not been heard in Brooklyn for a great many years, and when it was first played it was even more uncomprehensible to trained ears than the last thing from his pen, the opera, "Elektra." To-day "Zarathustra" shows itself a well ordered symphonic work with episode of great grandeur and extrtme beauty. It is questionable whether any musical work contains a more sublime episode than the opening of this tone-poem. Mr. Fiedler has shown Brooklyn how thoroughly he is in sympathy with Strauss' aims and ideals, and in Boston, at least, his performance of Zarathustra" is regarded as the greatest ever given by the orchestra. The final number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture to Geneva .....Schumann
Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 73. Brahms
"Thus Spake Zarathustra .....Strauss
Organist, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, The Roman Carnival....Berlioz

GRANT
From ...
HARTFORD, CONN.
Address ...
JAN 10
Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The noted Boston Symphony Orchestra is now on its third tour to the cities favored with its delightful performances every fifth week during the musical season. Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn, New York and Hartford will be visited within the week and at each concert Mischa Elman will appear as soloist. During the week this remarkable young violinist will perform concertas by Brahms, Lalo, Dvorak, Tchaikowsky and Beethoven. In the interpretation of all these is exhibited musical equipment seldom equalled. To quote the "New York Herald," "He is a master of technic such as one hears but rarely. His trills, double-stopping, runs and hormonics will impress every violinist as little short of extraordinary. In lyric passages he can make his violin sob and sing; in brilliant cadenzas the music comes in dazzling scintillations." Elman has won the most spontaneous enthusiasm with his performance of the Tchaikowsky concerto which he will play with the orchestra at the Parsons Theater next Monday evening. Seats are now on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER
From ...
Address ...
Date ... JAN 3 ...

Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Parsons Theater on Monday, January 17, will be a most welcome visit as the work of this remarkable organization is always a delight. On this occasion, however, there is almost as much interest in the appearance of Mischa Elman, the famous young Russian violinist, who has captivated the music-loving world with his magic bow. Elman, with the orchestra, will perform Tchaikowsky's "Violin Concerto in D major, op. 35," for the first time in Hartford. Orchestral numbers are Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," Wagner's "Prelude" and "Liebastod" from "Tristan and Isolde," and "Ride of the Valkyries," completing a program of rare excellence. The sale of reserved seats opens this morning at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store. As many of the seats are taken by subscribers to the series the remaining tickets should be applied for at once.

Bridgeport, Conn.
DEC 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT A NOTABLE EVENT

Music Lovers Waiting for Monday Evening at Jackson's with Great Expectancy.

The principal event of the coming week and the great musical event of the season will be the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestry in Jackson's theatre next Monday evening. It is almost three years since this famous organization visited Bridgeport and the interest, therefore, in the concert is unusually keen. A very large sale is reported and the prospects are now that the house will be practically sold out.

Music is coming to have each year a more important part in the life of the American public. Never before have there been so many orchestras, never before has there been so much opera, never before has there been so many miscellaneous concerts as during the present season and although there is a cry everywhere of over production, the fact is that practically every musical enterprise that is real music is prospering. The Boston Symphony orchestra which is now in its twenty-ninth year holds more firmly today than ever its position as the greatest organization of its kind in the world. It ranks far and above in material and performance any other orchestra in the United States and all foreign artists who visit this country are free to say that even in Europe there is no orchestra which is quite in its class. It has always stood for the highest ideals of the art of music. If it has never been a self supporting institution it is because no effort has ever been spared to make it as nearly perfect as humanly possible. Its yearly receipts are at least double those of any other orchestra in this country and its concerts wherever given attract the finest audiences of the season.

Four years ago when the orchestra first came here it had as its conductor Mr. Gericke. Three years ago when it gave a concert here its conductor was Dr. Karl Muck and now it brings Max Fiedler, who is in his second year as holder of this important post. During his stay in this country Mr. Fiedler has not only made a reputation as a great conductor but he has shown himself what is even more rare, a most skilled compiler of programmes. His programs always will stand as models for others to follow, and in this respect he has not failed for Bridgeport for he has arranged a more than usually attractive program for this concert.

The soloist in the first place will be Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey who stands at the head of our concert sopranos. Madame Rider-Kelsey is not unknown here for she has already sung in Bridgeport with much success and her return will be warmly welcomed. The program that Mr. Fieldler has arranged begins with the stunning prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" by Wagner. Tere in a short space of a few minutes this great master prophesies in a way the whole content of the greatest "musical comedy" that was ever written. In the music is heard the pompous importance of the Mastersingers, the beautiful love passages between Walter and Eva, the bickerings and quarrelings of Beckmesser winding up with the triumph of the new art which the young Franconian knight brought to Nuremberg.

Next follows Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, "Swan Song" of the most tragic figure in modern music. The "Pathetic" today is unquestionably the greatest of modern symphonies and by the same token it is the most popular. Highly emotional, with wonderful melodies in it, it appeals to all classes of music lovers.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is familiar to all for it is one of the most hackneyed of modern works and Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for restoring it to its proper place, for this wonderfully picturesque music is among the most beautiful in modern literature and deserves to have such performances as the Boston Symphony gives. The other orchestral number will be the great "Leonora" overture No. 3 by Beethoven.

Madame Rider-Kelsey will sing two numbers, the aria of Agatha from "Der Freischutz" and the beautiful aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro."

The program in full is as follows:

Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Tsaikowsky—Symphony in B-Minor, No. 6 "Pathetic," Op. 74.

Weber—Scene, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered" and Aria "Softly Sighing" from the opera "Der Freischutz."

Grieg—Orchestral suite from the music to "Peer Gynt" dramatic poem by H. Ibsen, arranged for concert performance, Op. 46.

Mozart—Recitative "How Susanna Delays" and Aria "Flown Forever" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Beethoven — Overture "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72.

FARMER
Bridgeport, Conn.
DEC 14 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again proved itself a great musical organization last night. It is undoubtedly the greatest orchestra in the world, playing with a unity and finish that is an almost unbelievable product of talent and discipline. No other group of musicians perhaps would have the drawing power to bring out an audience as numerous as that in Jackson's theatre last night during such a storm as raged from early in the evening to early in the following morning. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey gave a performance that was entirely satisfactory in all save one respect. She refused absolutely to respond to the tumultuous demand for an encore, possibly because the work required of her was sustained and difficult. Her voice is less brilliant than that of some other singers, but it is wonderfully sweet and sympathetic and is used with remarkable expression and technique.

The program opened with the prelude to Wagner's "The Master Singers of Nuremberg", a composition which was greeted with coldness when it was first produced under the direction of its author, and which even now is difficult to the comprehension of the ordinary musician. Nevertheless the great merits of the composition were successfully emphasized.

Max Fiedler proved a worthy successor of the famous leaders who have preceded him at the head of the Symphony. He has all the intellectual and physical characteristics that are necessary to great orchestral leadership. It is perhaps dropping from the high plane of musical criticism to remark that it is a help to a leader if he presents a good rear view to the audience and it is certainly true that Fiedler, tall, slender and graceful, does so.

The greatest appeal to the audience was made by Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which is decidedly more understandable than "The Master Singers." Highly emotional, and sprinkled through with touching melodies the "Pathetic" rendered by the Boston Symphony was a treat worth

...ss ...
DEC 28 1909

Symphony Concert.

A very large and fashionable audience assembled for the first Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening. In the audience were Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. Walter Stokes Irons, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan W. Littlefield, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. George Hall, Mr. Charles H. Child, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Lyra Brown Nickerson, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Miss Helen Ostby, Miss Margaret Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. S. Y. Cushing, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mrs. Charles B. Frye, Mrs. Luther Comstock, Washington; Mrs. John R. Tillinghast, Mrs. Grace L. Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Dr. Dodge, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Douglass Pearce, Mrs. Samuel M. Nickerson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, Miss Rockwell, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Lomas, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mrs. C. E. Lincoln, Miss Hope K. Lincoln.

...m ... MORNING
...ress ... PROVIDENCE, R. I.
... DEC 26

Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 4, and the sale of tickets for this concert will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, next Saturday morning. Elman is one of the most remarkable figures now before the musical public. His recital here will be remembered by those who were present as a remarkable event, and his appearance with the Boston Symphony, when he will play the Tschaikowsky "Concerto," will arouse a likely interest. The symphony will be a little lighter than usual and thus appropriate to the holiday season. It is Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony, and the other numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischuts" overture and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

[104]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
DEC 27 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 4th. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, who in recital here made such a sensation a year ago. Mr. Fiedler has arranged an interesting program. The symphony will be Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding." The sale of seats will open at Steinert's, 327 Westminster street, on Saturday, Jan. 1st.

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 30 1909

Mischa Elman and Boston Symphony.

More than usual interest is attached to the appearance of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, inasmuch as it will be his first public appearance in America since his successful season a year ago. Mischa Elman has been engaged for 12 consecutive concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which that in this city is the first, and it was this extraordinary engagement, unparalleled in the history of the orchestra, that was primarily responsible for his return to America this year because he expected to put off his reappearance in the United States until the season of 1910-1911. The sale of tickets for the concert opens at Steinert's, 310 Westminster street, Saturday morning.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
From
Address
Date
JAN 1 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON TUESDAY

The program which Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, has arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening will, so far as the Symphony is concerned at least, be of rather lighter character than is the rule, for he has chosen Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony. Goldmark, who at an advanced age is still able to write entrancing music, has done nothing more charming than this so-called symphony, which purists in music call a "suite." Until Mr. Fiedler revived it for a Boston concert earlier in the season it had not appeared on a Boston Symphony program for nearly 10 years. Mr. Gericke was always fond of it, as he was fond of all of Goldmark's music, and it is through him that the American public came to know this Austrian composer, who writes so ingratiatingly for the orchestra.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Mischa Elman, who, after an extraordinary career as a prodigy in Europe, came to America last winter to win triumph after triumph wherever he played and to be acclaimed as one of the greatest geniuses of the violin this country had ever heard. Elman is no longer in the prodigy class, for he is now a lad of 18 and very mature for his age; in fact, his performances are to be measured only by the performances of the great masters of his instrument. He was heard here in recital last winter and those who were present will remember the wonderful tone he brought from his Stradivarius, the splendid technique which was so perfect that one almost forgot its presence, and his keen musical sense and romantic fancy. He has chosen for this concert Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin in D-major. It is an interesting fact that this work was written for Elman's teacher, the great Leopold Auer, and Auer refused to play it because it was too difficult. Later Auer became one of its most famous interpreters. The work is one of stupendous difficulty and is far beyond the reach of any violinist who is not a complete master of the technique of his instrument. The work, moreover, is one of great melodic beauty, is good music and appeals to all classes of music lovers.

The other numbers on the program will be the overture to "Der Freischutz" and the Prelude and "Love Death" from Tristan and Isolde."

The program in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz."

Goldmark—"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E-flat major, No. 1, Op. 26.

1. Wedding March: Variations: moderato molto.
2. Bridal Song: Intermezzo, allegretto.
3. Serenade: Scherzo: Allegro moderato Scherzando.
4. In the Garden: Andante.
5. Dance: Allegro molto.

Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, Op. 35.

1. Allegro moderato.
2. Canzonetta: Andante.
3. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

Wagner—Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 2 - 1910

For the Symphony concert on Tuesday night the principal orchestral work will be the charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony of Goldmark. The ever-popular overture to "Der Freischutz" and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristam and Isolde" are the other two orchestral numbers. The soloist will be Mischa Elman. At this late date this great artist needs no words of introduction to an American public. He will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D-major, which, generally speaking, is the most difficult of all the works of its kind for the violin. Despite its difficulty, it is a work that has qualities which make it popular with the general public, and in the hands of a master like Elman it never fails to excite an audience to the utmost enthusiasm.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will give its second concert of the season in Infantry Hall tonight. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist and the program is as follows:

Weber—Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz"

Goldmark—"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E-flat Major, No. 1, Op. 26.

1. Wedding March, Variations, moderato molto.
2. Bridal Song, Intermezzo, allegretto.
3. Serenade, Scherzo, allegro moderato Scherzando.
4. In the Garden, andante.
5. Dance, allegro molto.

Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, Op. 35.

1. Allegro moderato.
2. Canzonetta, andante.
3. Finale, allegro vivacissimo.

Wagner—Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address
Date
JAN 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony To-night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Infantry Hall to-night. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist and the programme is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz"..... Weber

"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E-flat major, No. 1, op. 26.....Goldmark

I. Wedding March. Variations. Moderato molto.
II. Bridal Song. Intermezzo. Allegretto.
III. Serenade. Scherzo. Allegro moderato Scherzando.
IV. In the Garden. Andante.
V. Dance. Allegro molto.

Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, op. 86.....Tschaikowsky

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta. Andante.
III. Finale. Allegro vivacissimo.

Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address
Date
JAN 5 -

Symphony Concert.

An audience made up largely of society and musical people filled Infantry Hall last evening at the second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the throng were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Edward Douglass Pearce, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. Lawrence Richmond, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Comstock, Miss Harriet Talbot, Mrs. E. C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Miss Alexander, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mr. Raymond Havens, Mrs. Gertrude Rugg Field, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. Fred Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John F. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. Horace G. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mrs. Henry W. Cooke, Miss Maud Robinson, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. Charles H. Child, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Crandall, Mrs. Martin S. Budlong, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mr. Huger Elliott, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Miss Hartwell.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 5 - 1910

BIG AUDIENCE ENJOYED SYMPHONY CONCERT

A large and most appreciative audience assembled in Infantry Hall last evening, to listen to the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and, it can be truly said that never has a more pleasing concert been given in this city, and never one that appealed to music lovers, both in the concerted numbers and the solo work.

When it is stated that the soloist was Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, enough has been said ordinarily, but of his playing of the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major, too much cannot be said, for it was a most brilliant and marvelious performance, and that the audience thought so was proven by the fact that he was called again and again to bow his acknowledgments. The program arranged by Mr. Max Fiedler, the talented director of the orchestra, was:

Weber—Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz."

Goldmark—"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E flat major, No. 1, Op. 26.

1. Wedding march, variations, moderato molto.
2. Bridal song, intermezzo, allegretto.
3. Serenade, scherzo, allegro moderato, scherzando.
4. In the Garden, andante.
5. Dance, allegro molto.

Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, Op. 35.

1. Allegro moderato.
2. Canzonetta, andante.
3. Finale, allegro vivacissimo.

Wagner—Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The three orchestral numbers, offering as they did a most marked contrast, brought out all there was of the virtuosity of the musicians, and proved beyond all doubt that while this magnificent orchestral organization has had many talented conductors, none of them has surpassed Mr. Fiedler, and, perhaps, it is not too much to say that few have equalled him. In his interpretation of Wagner's mighty "Liebestod" his work and that of the orchestra was of the highest order.

The playing of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," was equally grand, the charming melodies of the Weber composition being brought out with rare mastery, while the more brilliant and highly colored music of Goldmark, showed that the capabilities of the orchestra were almost without limit.

Of the work of the soloist, it is difficult to write, for mere words and cold type cannot give any idea, even in a faint way, of the glorious playing of this remarkable young man, whose technique is so wonderful that the listener can only sit and marvel. Not only from the audience came the more than deserved applause, but from the members of the orchestra, many of them recognized as masters of the violin, there was an outburst of applause that was as spontaneous as it was unusual.

Mischa Elman is a wonder as a violinist, and when that is said little remains to be said, and the fact that he chose the Tschaikowsky concerto as his number last evening, proves that he is a wonder, for it is recognized as the most difficult work of its class. Mr. Elman was particularly fortunate in having the more than splendid accompaniment furnished by Mr. Fiedler's musicians.

It was a grand concert, and one that will be long remembered by music lovers in Providence. The next concert of the series will be given Tuesday evening, Feb. 15.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 5 - 191

ELMAN A GREAT VIOLINIST.

Young Russian Artist Made a Decided Hit at Infantry Hall.

Much has been said of the musical ability of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has been creating an impression throughout the country that he is one of the greatest bow artists that has been seen, and last evening he added to his list of ardent admirers every person in the large audience which filled Infantry Hall on the occasion of his appearance at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Elman so thoroughly demonstrated his mastery of the violin that the audience was loth to allow him to leave the stage, especially after his magnificent rendition of Tschaikowski's concerto, which was so brilliantly given that he was called out by the audience more than a half-dozen times.

This remarkably difficult work is seldom essayed except by one who is sure of his ground and who realizes that if well rendered it offers an excellent opportunity to thoroughly demonstrate brilliant technique. Elman was safely at home in its most difficult passages and when he had finished the audience applauded in a way unusual for Providence music lovers. Had there been no other numbers this would have sufficed to appease the listeners, for Elman proved conclusively that in the most difficult music he is a master. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz"..Weber
"Rustic Wedding" Symphony, E-at major, No. 1, Op. 26.....Goldmark
1. Wedding March: Variations; moderato molto
2. Bridal Song: Intermezzo, Allegretto.
3. Serenade: Scherzo, Allegro moderato Scherzando.
4. In the Garden: Adante.
5. Dance: Allegro molto.

Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, Op. 35 .....Tschaikowsky
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Canzonetta Andante.
3. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" .....Wagner

Charming as was the playing of Elman it was by no means the only commendable feature of the entertainment, for Conductor Fiedler had arranged a most evenly balanced programme, which served to add to the individual performance of the young Russian. Mr. Fiedler has been particularly happy and fortunate in the selection of his concert numbers and his well-known ability as a leader was an assurance that the orchestral work would be far above the ordinary. In the overture he selected a work which enabled his accomplished assistants to establish themselves in popular favor at the outset and in the more intricate numbers which followed and in the accompaniments his men won deserved applause.

The audience was particularly interested in the young violinist, however, and it was no reflection on the orchestra that the auditors preferred his brilliant playing. He is a genius with the violin and any announcement that he will again appear in Providence will unquestionably result in a big demand for tickets.

The programme was of more than ordinary length, but it was so well arranged and so admirably carried out that the audience did not realize that the entertainment was not over until an unusual-ly late hour.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
From
Address
Date
FEB 5 - 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of seats for the third Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, which will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on next Saturday morning. The concert promises to be another in the remarkable series which Mr. Fiedler has given to this city in the past two seasons. The soloist, Ernest Hutcheson, is unknown to the greater part of the Providence musical public except by name. He is the head of the piano department of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, and ranks among the first pianists of the world. An Australian by birth, his musical training was had in Germany, and the early part of his career was spent in that country. He came to America about ten years ago, and his success is so notable that he has stayed here ever since. He will play the "Emperor" concerto for piano by Beethoven.

The symphony of the evening will be the second one of Brahms, that in D major. This work has come to be one of the most popular in symphonic literature. It is idyllic and pastoral in character and most exquisitely melodious. The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 6 - 1910

THE sale of seats for the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, next Saturday morning. The concert promises to be another in the remarkable series which Mr. Fiedler has given to this city in the past two seasons. The soloist, Ernest Hutcheson, is unknown to the greater part of Providence musical public except by name. He is the head of the piano department of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore and ranks among the first pianists of the world.

An Australian by birth, his musical training was had in Germany and the early part of his career was spent in that country. He came to America 10 years ago and his success is so notable that he has stayed here ever since. He will play the "Emperor Concerto" for piano by Beethoven.

The symphony of the evening will be the second one of Brahms, that in D-major. This work has come to be one of the most popular in symphonic literature. It is idyllic and pastoral in character and most exquisitely melodious. The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

CHURCH MUSIC

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 9 - 1910

Symphony Concert.

An audience made up largely of society and musical people filled Infantry Hall Tuesday night at the second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the throng were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Edward Douglass Pearce, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. Lawrence Richmond, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Comstock, Miss Harriet Talbot, Mr. E. C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Miss Alexander, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mr. Raymond Havens, Mrs. Gertrude Rugg Field, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. Fred Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John F. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert S. Maine, Mrs. Horace G. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mrs. Henry W. Cooke, Miss Maud Robinson, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. Charles H. Child, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Crandall, Mrs. Martin S. Budlong, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mr. Huger Elliott, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Miss Hartwell, Miss Hope K. Lincoln.

Three Interesting Concerts.

Society and musical people revelled in music of a varied and high character Friday night for not often does it happen that three concerts of interest to the local musical world occur in a single evening.

In Infantry Hall a representative and cultivated audience manifested great enthusiasm at the joint appearance here of Lina Cavalieri, soprano of the Manhattan Opera Company, New York and George Harris, Jr., son of President and Mrs. Harris of Amherst College. In the audience were Col. Robert H. Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. William Gammell, Miss Frances Lippitt, Mr. and Mrs. Rush Sturges, Col. and Mrs. H. Anthony Dyer, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Mr. Jeffrey Hazard, Miss Harriet Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Lauriston Hazard, Dr. Jules Jordan, Col. and Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. Merwin White, Mrs. Grenville Brown, Miss Rorita Rhodes, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Mrs. A. Duncan Chapin, Mrs. A. Duncan Chapin, Jr., Miss Caroline Grosvenor, Mr. Morris Congdon, Miss Rose Grosvenor, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Col. and Mrs. Arthur H. Watson, Miss Isabel R. Brown, Miss Hope Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Col. and Mrs. Frank W. Matteson, Mrs. W. A. Potter, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Allen, Mrs. Ernst Fischer, Miss Edith Knight, Miss Hope Smith, Mr. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mrs. Martin S. Budlong, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rala.

Under the auspices of the Rhode Island Congress of Mothers, of which Mrs. Louis L. Angell is President, a musicale of exceptionally high character was given in Churchill House Friday evening. The musicale was arranged by Mrs. William Osborn Todd and the artists were Mrs. Anna Ellis Dexter, soprano; Mr. Raymond L. Havens, concert pianist; Miss Helen Tyler Grant, cellist, and Mr. Jane W. accompanist.

Among those present were Mrs. Henr. Fletcher, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Tillinghast, Mrs. Charles V. Chapin, Mr. Robert Todd, Master Louis L. Angell, Mrs. George M. Baker, Mrs. George H. Tillinghast, Mrs. E. P. Sheldon, Mrs. Charles E. Havens, Mrs. P. Francis Walker, Mrs. Willard C. Perkins, Mrs. Gertrude Rugg Field, Mrs. James A. Kinghorn, Mrs. Jay Perkins, Mrs. George L. Gross, Mrs. Harry O. Curtis, Mrs. Daniel Webster, Miss Jessie L. Cole, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan B. Barton, Miss Atwood, Miss Elizabeth B. Carpenter, Mrs. George H. Cahoone, Mrs. George H. Gardiner, Miss Bessie Gavitt, Mrs. Frank T. Rogers and Mrs. F. A. W. Harris.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 9 - 1910

Symphony Concert Feb. 15.

In his programme for the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, Mr. Fiedler sticks closely to the classics. A majority of the works presented by him in the last two years have been of the modern school of music and therefore the patrons will more than welcome the appearance of works which, while possibly not so exciting, contain more pure beauty than the highly colored compositions of the composers of to-day. The only representative of the moderns on this programme is Liszt and his symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," has become, in a sense, a classic.

The symphony will be Brahm's Second in D-Major, one of the most delightful works in symphonic literature and the overture will be Weber's "Euryanthe." The soloist, Ernest Hutcheson, will play what is generally conceded to be the greatest of all concertos for the piano, Beethoven's "The Emperor," in E flat major.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 6 1910

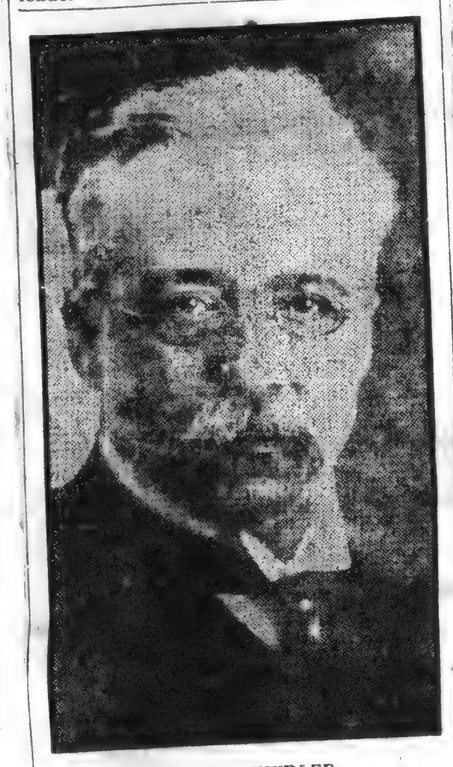
DR. FIEDLER TO REMAIN.

Re-engaged as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Feb. 5.—For the past month several New York musical journals have been arranging, to their own satisfaction, evidently, the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and have assigned a half-dozen famous conductors to direct the organization after this season closes. But as there was no unanimity in choice, of course the matter was not definitely settled

Such men as Mahler, Muck, Campanini and even Nikisch were in the roster of names specified to succeed Dr. Fiedler, and despite the fact that the management of the orchestra did not affirm in any way that a change was contemplated Dame Rumor kept the report in quite active circulation.

Dr. Max Fiedler came to Boston as leader of the orchestra in September,



DR. MAX FIEDLER.
Re-engaged as Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

1908. He soon displayed abilities which proved him a worthy successor to the baton of Gericke, Nikisch and Dr. Muck, and although his ideas differed in many ways from those of his predecessors, his masterly command of men and thorough knowledge of his work quickly won for him the appreciation and regard of players and his audiences.

Catholic and progressive in his tastes, he favors alike music of the old or new schools, and worthy American composers receive prompt recognition in his makeup of programmes. "Take him for all in all," he is a representative of the best thought in the musical field, and his sojourn here has resulted in keeping the standard of the orchestra on that plane which has made it one of the few great orchestras of the world.

Gossip has had its run for a while without an authentic basis. But now Bostonians and many others will be gratified to learn that Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, announced yesterday that Dr. Fiedler will not retire at the close of the season, but has been re-engaged for the seasons of 1910-11 and 1911-12.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 6- 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15. The soloist will be Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, who is one of the most distinguished pianists now before the public. He is at the head of the piano department of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson is a pianist of brilliant parts, being not only the possessor of enormous technique but a musicianly player. He will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor."

The symphony will be the delightful one in D-major by Brahms. The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." The seats go on sale at Steinert's music store next Saturday morning.

m JOURNAL
ress PROVIDENCE, R.
FEB 18 19

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening with Ernest Hutcheson as soloist. Mr. Hutcheson was born in Melbourne, Australia. When about 15 she went to Leipsic and studied there for six years. He then made a tour through Australia and played in other lands. Then he went to Weimar, where he studied the pianoforte under Stavenhagen. In 1898 he settled in Berlin and in 1900 he was invited to be the chief pianoforte teacher at the Conservatory of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore. Here he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. The programme in order is as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; symphony in D-major, No. 2, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "The Emperor," Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 14 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony, Max Fiedler, conductor, is to give its third concert in Providence on next Tuesday evening in Infantry hall. Unquestionably an even warmer welcome than usual will be given Mr. Fiedler in recognition of his renewed engagement with the Boston Symphony for two years, which has just been announced. The fact that he has been retained for two years has been very pleasing news to the very many admirers he has made in Providence.

His program is one of usual interest. The symphony will be Brahms D-Major No. 2, the idyllic work which has been a final denial of the many accusations that Brahms was not a melodist. It is one of the most gracious works in symphonic literature and particularly appealing to Mr. Fiedler. The other orchestral numbers will be the favorite "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." The soloist will be Ernest Hutcheson, the distinguished pianist at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson, although a resident of this country now, was born in Melbourne, Australia, July 20, 1871. When he was about fifteen years old, he went to Leipsic and studied there for six years—the pianoforte under Zwintscher and Reinecke, composition under Jadassohn. He wrote a pianoforte trio; he won the Mozart prize. He then made a tour through Australia and he played in other lands. He went to Weimar, where he studied the pianoforte under Stevenhagen. In 1898 he settled in Berlin, and the next year he married the Baroness Senfft von Pilsach. In 1900 he was invited to be the chief pianoforte teacher at the Conservatory of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and his first appearance as a pianist in this country was at Baltimore, Oct. 19, 1900, where he now resides.

Mr. Hutcheson has given concerts in Russia, Germany and England. During the past winter he has been gaining a great deal of praise through his illustrated lectures on Richard Strauss's "Electra." Here he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

The program in order is as follows:

Overture "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony in D-Major, No. 2, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "The Emperor," Beethoven; Symphonic Poem "Les Preludes," Liszt; soloist—Ernest Hutcheson.

The Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 18 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give its third concert in Providence Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Unquestionably an even warmer welcome than usual will be given Mr. Fiedler in recognition of his renewed engagement with the Boston Symphony for two years, which has just been announced. The fact that he has been retained for two years has been very pleasing news to the very many admirers he has made in Providence.

His programme is one of usual interest. The symphony will be Brahms's D-major No. 2, the idyllic work which has been a final denial of the many accusations that Brahms was not a melodist. It is one of the most gracious works in symphonic literature and particularly appealing to Mr. Fiedler. The other orchestral numbers will be the favorite "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

The soloist will be Ernest Hutcheson, the distinguished pianist at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson, although now a resident of this country, was born in Melbourne, Australia, July 20, 1871. When he was about 15 years old he went to Leipsic and studied there for six years—the pianoforte under Bruno Zwintscher and Reinecke, composition under Jadassohn. He wrote a pianoforte trio; he won the Mozart prize. He then made a tour through Australia and he played in other lands.

He went to Weimar, where he studied the pianoforte under Stevenhagen. In 1898 he settled in Berlin and the next year he married the Baroness Senfft von Pilsach. In 1900 he was invited to be chief pianoforte teacher at the Conservatory of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore; and his first appearance as a pianist in this country was at Baltimore, Oct. 19, 1900, where he now resides. Mr. Hutcheson has given concerts in Russia, Germany and England. During the past winter he has been gaining a great deal of praise through his illustrated lectures on Richard Strauss's "Electra." Here he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

The programme in order is as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony in D-Major, No. 2.....Brahms

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 18 1910

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the management of the orchestra [illegible] to state that the only men who have been considered for the position of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for the term of two years, and Dr. Muck of Berlin. No other conductor has been approached nor has the thought of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

vspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 15 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings the fourth Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, at Infantry hall, with Ernest Hutcheson, the distinguished pianist of the Peabody institute of Baltimore, as soloist. The program is as follows:

Weber, Overture "Euryanthe"; Brahms, Symphony in D-Major, No. 2; Beethoven, concerts for pianoforte and orchestra, "The Emperor" Liszt, Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Soloist, Ernest Hutcheson.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third of the Season Given in Infantry Hall Last Night.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Infantry Hall before a large and enthusiastic audience, whose frequent and hearty applause was no more than appropriate recognition of an extremely well-balanced and well-played programme. Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, pianist, was the assisting soloist, and the order of the music was as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73.....Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for pianforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, op. 73.....Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No. 3....Liszt

A thoroughly typical German programme, solid, substantial, the kind of music that endures and grows upon acquaintance. It is impossible, of course, to classify Liszt, the Hungarian, and cosmopolite, as strictly a German composer, but there is no doubt about the others whose compositions comprise the bulk of the programme. A strong trio they are, and of the three Brahams looms up, not perhaps the greatest, but in his music the most characteristically German of them all. Dry and pedantic he may be at times, but when he sets out to cultivate the flower of beauty he produces something worth while. In his second symphony, played last night, he repressed—to quote a famous critic and fellow countryman—"his noble, but dangerous inclination to conceal his ideas under a web of polophony or to cover them with lines of contrapuntal intersection." Instead, he gave full play to his genuine melodic gifts, his humor and fancy, all set forth with his rare technical skill and knowledge of the orchestra. The famous conductor, Felix Weingartner, declares this "the finest symphony since Beethoven—far above all of Schumann." A beautiful work, at all events, and superbly interpreted by Mr. Fielden and his players.

In Mr. Hutcheson the audience had the pleasure of greeting an artist previously unknown here, but who made friends and admirers at once. The distinguishing characteristic of his playing is its supreme finish to the making of which goes a beautifully clear touch, a full degree of sympathy and taste and a strong musical temperament held under just and even control. The noble Beethoven concerto displayed all its worth and beauty under his capable hands, assisted by thoroughly adequate support from the splendid orchestra. Mr. Hutcheson is an artist whom we shall gladly welcome here again.

Weber's charming overture and the bright and fanciful "Preludes" of Liszt rounded out the fine programme adequately. The concert was longer than usual, but the interest was sustained without a break and the audience was unusually demonstrative. The fourth and last concert by the orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, April 5.

W. A. P.

[106]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address ...
Date ... FEB 16 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ernest Hutcheson Scored a Great Hit at Infantry Hall.

Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, pianist, made his first appearance in this city at the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening, and the impression which he made on the very large audience will assure a crowded house when he again comes to this city. His performance was a revelation to those who had known him only from reading of his playing in other places and on several occasions last evening he was given hearty applause.

The programme for the concert was as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73....Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, op. 73.....Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo.
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No. 3...Liszt

Although the great interest was shown in the work of the piano soloist, the work of the orchestra was so superbly finished that the concert numbers were applauded with as much enthusiasm as the solos.

The opening number was Weber's overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," said by some to be the most perfect of Weber's symphonic works, in which are displayed brilliance, conciseness, contrasts of orchestra color and dramatic accent. With this overture and Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E-flat major, Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D-major and and Liszt's "Les Preludes," symphonic poem No. 3, the programme savored decidedly of the German. The programme was well balanced and was interpreted delightfuly by the orchestra under the masterfu leadership of Max Fiedler, whose appearances in this city have endeared him to the music-loving people of Providence.

Mr. Hutcheson's superb playing showed that the pianist possesses the characteristics which go to make up the successful musician. His light, clear touch brought forth the softest tones in a manner that was appreciated in all parts of the hall. His performance was made even more enjoyable by the very satisfactory orchestral work and, although the programme was longer than usual, the audience was intensely interested until the final note, here and there applauding and showing its appreciation of the efforts of the musicians whenever opportunity offered.

The last concert of the series will be given on the evening of Tuesday, April 5.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address ...
Date ... FEB 6 1910

In the audience at the Symphony concert in Infantry Hall last evening were the following: Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Johns H. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mrs. Harold Ostby, former Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Isabel R. Brown, Miss Hope Brown, Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Hoonson, Mr. Charles H. Child, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John Greene, Prof. and Mrs. William Macdonald, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Claflin, Prof. Julian Hershoff, Mr. Albert M. Steinert, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin S. Jewett, Mrs. Charles E. Havens, Mrs. William McDonald, Jr., Mrs. Ernst Fischer, Mr. Lawrence Calder, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mrs. J. J. Brannigan, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Miss Alice Bourne, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Park, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs. John F. Street, Pawtucket; Mr. and Mrs. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. and Mrs. James N. Bourne, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Mrs. George C. Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss Maud Atwood, Mr. George Parker Winship, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mrs. Charles E. Lincoln, Miss Hope Lincoln, Mr. Edward S. Clarke.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From ... PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address ...
Date ... FEB 15 1910

Boston Symphony Concert To-night.

To-night brings the fourth Boston Symphony concert to Infantry Hall, with Ernest Hutcheson, the distinguished pianist of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore as soloist. The programme is as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony in D-major, No. 2; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "The Emperor," Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Ernest Hutcheson, soloist.

From ... DEC 26 1909
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rochester is to have its annual Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this season on Friday evening, February 4, in the Lyeum Theater. The soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who is well and favorably known in this city as one of the most brilliant pianists now before the public. Mr. Fiedler is again the conductor of the Orchestra.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ADVERTISER UNION
... ROCHESTER, N.Y. DEC 31 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Remarkable Musical Organization to Be Heard at the Lyceum Early In February.

It is in response to requests by many of the regular patrons here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the management has engaged as soloist for its concert in Rochester in the Lyceum Theater on Friday, February 4th, Madame Olga Samaroff. Rochester was one of the first cities to recognize the extraordinary talent of this young American artist and since she first played here, absolutely unknown, she has risen to the front rank of pianists and has won as enthusiastic praise in Europe as she has in America.

Mr. Fiedler is, of course, the conductor of the orchestra this year and he will assuredly arrange a most attractive programme for there are few conductors in the world more skilled in this than he.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
... DEC 31 1909

Soloist of Boston Symphony.

It is in response to requests by many of the regular patrons here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the management has engaged as soloist for its concert in Rochester in the Lyceum Theater on Friday, February 4, Madame Olga Samaroff. Rochester was one of the first cities to recognize the extraordinary talent of this young American artist, and since she first played here, absolutely unknown, she has risen to the front rank of pianists and has won as enthusiastic praise in Europe as she has in America. Mr. Fiedler is, of course, the conductor of the orchestra this year, and he will assuredly arrange a most attractive programme, for there are few conductors in the world more skilled in this than he.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... ADVERTISER UNION
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ...

—The seventh visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Rochester will occur next Friday evening when the organization will be heard at the Lyceum Theater. There has been little or no change in the membership of the orchestra since last season. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the noted pianist, will be the soloist at the coming concert. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor. 1884

From ... TRIBUNE
Address ...
Date ...

Rochester is fortunate in being one of the six cities which will be visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now on its midwinter tour. This noted organization, said to be the most expensive orchestra in the world, comes to the Lyceum next Friday evening. It always has received splendid patronage.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... ADVERTISER UNION
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ... JAN 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra to Play Single Concert at the Lyceum Early Next Month.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Lyceum Theater on Friday evening, February 4th, will mark this year, as it always has in the past, when this great organization has come to Rochester, the high-water mark of the current musical season. With the exception of one year this will be the fifth consecutive visit of the Boston Symphony to Rochester, and each concert has had an increased patronage, demonstrating that the Orchestra has a very firm hold on the affections of Rochester's musical public.

This year the orchestra brings as soloist Madame Olga Samaroff, the most brilliant woman pianist of the younger generation. Rochester will always regard Madame Samaroff with more than friendly interest because this city was among the first to realize and appreciate the talent of this remarkable artist in days when she was all but absolutely unknown. To hear her here with the Boston Symphony playing the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major will be a greatly added attraction to the programme. The rest of the programme will comprise Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scherzerade" suite; and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried", act two, and prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Richard Wagner.

Musically speaking New York is notoriously the most critical city in the world and it takes the highest grade of talent to please the critics of that city—higher than in London, Berlin, Vienna or Paris. All the more notable then is the success which attends the Boston Symphony concerts in that city where ten are given each winter. Despite the increased competition of opera and other orchestras, Carnegie Hall is always packed to its utmost capacity when the Boston Symphony plays there. After one of its November concerts Mr. Richard Aldrich, the critic of the New York Times, wrote as follows:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has rarely played better, with more brilliancy, delicacy, richness and variety of color, more transparent clarity, more perfect suppleness under the hand of its conductor, than it did yesterday afternoon at its second concert in Carnegie Hall. To hear such playing was a transporting delight. Mr. Fiedler has earned the gratitute of everybody who appreciates such a performance for demonstrating, at the beginning of his second season with this extraordinary organization, that he has kept it to its highest level of efficiency; and there is none higher anywhere in the world—probably even none other so high."

ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... ADVERTISER UNION
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ... JAN 31 1910

—The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyceum Friday evening began at noon to-day at the theater. From all appearance the big crowd which the orchestra attracted here last season will again be in evidence, at the coming engagement. Applications for seats from out of town have been been unusually large. 1884

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... POST EXPRESS
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ... JAN 31 1910

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert next Friday evening at the Lyceum went on sale at noon to-day at the theater. There is every probability that all seats will be sold before Friday. Many applications for sittings from out-of-town places have been received.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... HERALD
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ... JAN 23 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Coming to the Lyceum February 4, With Mme. Samaroff as Soloist.

The amount of interest shown in the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum on Friday evening, February 4, seems to indicate that the interest manifested in this organization's former visits will be greater than ever this year. Although the sale does not open until noon on Monday, January 31, at the boxoffice of the Lyceum, a large number of mail orders have been received and it may be confidently expected that the house will be sold out.

This annual visit of Boston's great orchestra always marks a high point of the musical season in Rochester. This year the orchestra brings with it as soloist Madame Olga Samaroff, who is unquestionably one of the greatest of the younger generation of women pianists. As a matter of fact it is not necessary for her to use the qualification of women, for she is able to stand comparison with pianists of the sterner sex. Her coming will be particularly welcome here because she has never appeared in Rochester with an orchestra and yet it was Rochester's musical public which was among the first to recognize her talent when she was practically unknown.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most delightful programme. Madame Samaroff will play the Liszt E-flat Concerto and the orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Freischutz" overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and two Wagnerian excerpts, the "Waldweben," from Siegfried," act 2, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersingers."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... POST EXPRESS
Address ... ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date ... JAN 24 1910

The Boston Symphony is to give a concert here on Friday evening next, at the Lyceum. An important factor in the coming of the orchestra is the maintenance of practically the same personnel every year. There are three men in the orchestra now who have been in it since it was originated. It is interesting to look over the list of the term of service. Three men have been in the orchestra twenty-nine years; two, twenty-eight; two, twenty-seven; seven, twenty-five; three, twenty-four; four, twenty-three; one, twenty-one; five, twenty; five, nineteen; six, sixteen; two, fifteen; three, fourteen; one, thirteen; six, twelve; four, ten years. The majority of the remaining members have been in the orchestra between five and ten years. The orchestra has had but five concert masters—Bernhard Listemann, now of Chicago, who held the post during the first four seasons; Franz Kneisel, who succeeded him and held the post until the spring of 1903; E. Fernandez-Arbos, who held the post in 1903 and 1904; Willy Hess, the present concert-master, who succeeded him, and Carl Wendling, who occupied the position two years ago when Mr. Hess was taking a leave of absence in Europe. Once a season or so at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston or New York, the regular conductor steps down and takes his seat as a spectator and a short, spectacled, unassuming man from the desks of the first violins takes his place to conduct a composition of his own. This man is Gustav Strube, who, besides being one of the first violins of the orchestra, is one of the conductors of the Worcester Musical festivals and one of the conductors of the "Pop" concerts in Boston. His works show talent that is not only recognized in Boston and New York, but in Europe, where his name appears often on the great symphony programmes of Berlin, Vienna, Leipsic and Dresden. He is an illustration of the quality of the men that have helped to make the Boston Symphony orchestra the tremendous band that it is. Another composer of even wider fame who graduated from the first violins after he had been a member for twenty years, is Charles Martin Loeffler, of Boston, the principal upholder of the modern French school of music in America.

Friday's programme is as follows:

Weber .....Overture to "Der Freischutz"
Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") Op. 35.
Liszt ....Concerto in E Flat Major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1. Soloist, Madame Samaroff.
Wagner ....."Waldweben" from "Siegfried" Act II, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 29 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Remarkable Organization to Be Heard in Fine Programme at the Lyceum on Friday Night.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyceum Theater on Next Friday evening, will open at the box office of the theater on Monday at noon. The concert, which has become an annual event for Rochester, has been looked forward to with high anticipations of pleasure and the programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged and the soloist that the management has provided, combine to promise one of the most interesting evenings of music this city has ever had.

No conductor has made a more profound impression on Rochester's mu[sic] lovers than Mr. Fiedler did a year [ago]. The obvious sincerity of the man, his unassuming simplicity, his masterful control of his forces and the splendid spirit which he put into all he did exercised a powerful fascination over the audience and he will be very warmly welcomed on his return. This year he has aranged a programme of unusual charm. The principal orchestral number will be a Russian, a symphonic suite entitled "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died a year and a half ago. As the title implies, the suite draws its inspiration from that huge collection of Arabian folk-tales entitled "The Thousand Nights and a Night" of more familiarly known to the reading public of this country as "The Arabian Nights. The orcrestral score bears the following descriptive sketch:

"The Sultan Schahriar persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of woman, has sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Pricked by curiosity, he put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan.

"Many marvels were told Schahriar by the Sultana Scheherazade. For her stories the Sultana borrowed from poets their verses, from folk-songs their words; and she strung together tales and adventures.

I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

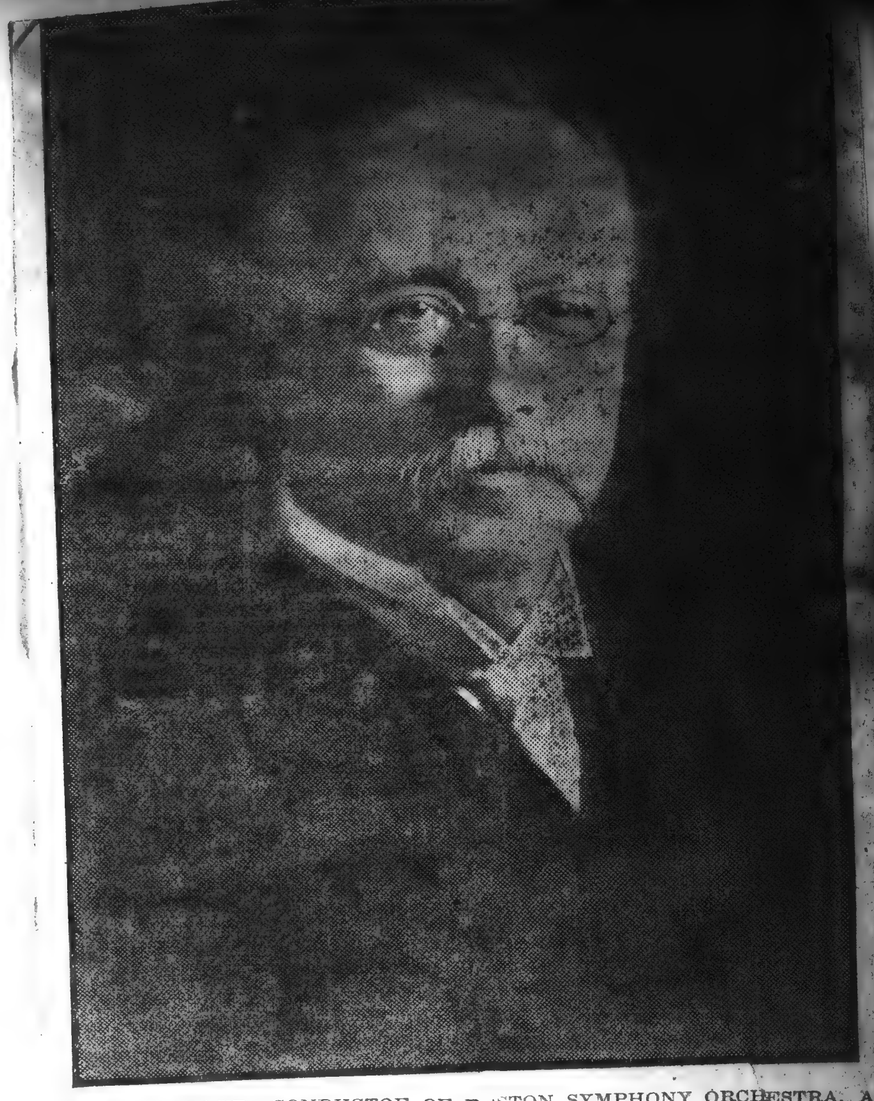
"This programme is deliberately vague. To which one of Sinbad's voyages in reference made? The story of which Kalandar, for there were three that knocked on that fateful night at the gate of the house of the three ladies of Bagdad? 'The Young Prince and the Young Princess'—but there are so many in the 'Thousand Nights and a Night.' 'The Ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.' Here is a distinct reference to the third Kalandar's tale, the marvelous adventure of the Prince Ajib son of Khazib; for the magnetic mountain which shipwrecked Sindbad on his voyage was not surmounted by 'a dome of yellow laton from Andalusia vaulted upon ten columns; and on its crown is a horseman who rideth a horse of brass and holdeth in hand a lance of laton; and there hangeth on his bosom a tablet of lead graven with names and talismans.' The composer did not attempt to interline any specific text with music; he endeavored to put the mood of the many tales in music."

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the composer, has been generally acknowledged after the death of Tschaikowsky to be the greatest among the Russians. His music is not characterized by the enormous emotional depths found in that of Tschaikowsky. Generally speaking it is of lighter quality, melodious and brilliant. He was a past master in the art of orchestration and instrumentation and in his symphonic suite he gives full rein to his fancy which always influenced by the Orient, becomes very Oriental in the depiction of the episodes contained in the programme.

The other orchestral numbers will include Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" and two excerpts from Wagner, the exquisite "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

Enough is known of Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist, to make sure that her playing of the Liszt concerto with the orchestra will be a rare pleasure to hear. Among the many pianists now before the public hardly one has found more favor with critics and public than this splendid artist. To appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony is an honor valued by the greatest virtuosi. Mme. Samaroff's continued engagements with that organization is perhaps the highest compliment to be paid her artistic attainments. The complete programme for Friday evening:

I. Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz ..... Weber
II. Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35
III. Concerto in E flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1 ..... Liszt
IV. "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" Act II prelude to ""The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..... Wagner
Soloist, Madame Olga Samaroff.



MAX FIELDLER, CONDUCTOF OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT THE LYCEUM.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....
ress .....
JAN 30 1910

The pre-eminence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert at the Lyceum on next Friday evening is recognized by all musicians that visit this country. In fact, it is a serious handicap for a musician—that is to say, a pianist, violinist or 'cellist—who comes to make a tour of America, if he does not get an engagement with this orchestra. The orchestra does not use many soloists, and there is a hard and fast rule that it never engages any soloists but those of foremost rank. Moreover, unlike every other orchestra in this country, and one may say with equal truth every other orchestra in the world, the Boston Symphony, as such, can never be engaged. It exists solely for the purpose of giving its own concerts, and while smaller orchestras are often made up of men belonging to the Boston Symphony, at such times the the leading members of the orchestra do not play and naturally its conductor does not conduct.

Not the least point of interest in connection with the orchestra visit here this season will be the appearance of Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, as soloist. Mme. Samaroff has played in Rochester before, and is well remembered as an artist of the first rank. This will be the programme:

Overture, "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"..... Rumsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in E-flat.....Liszt
Soloist, Mm. Samaroff.
"Waldweben" from "Siegfried," act II .....Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner

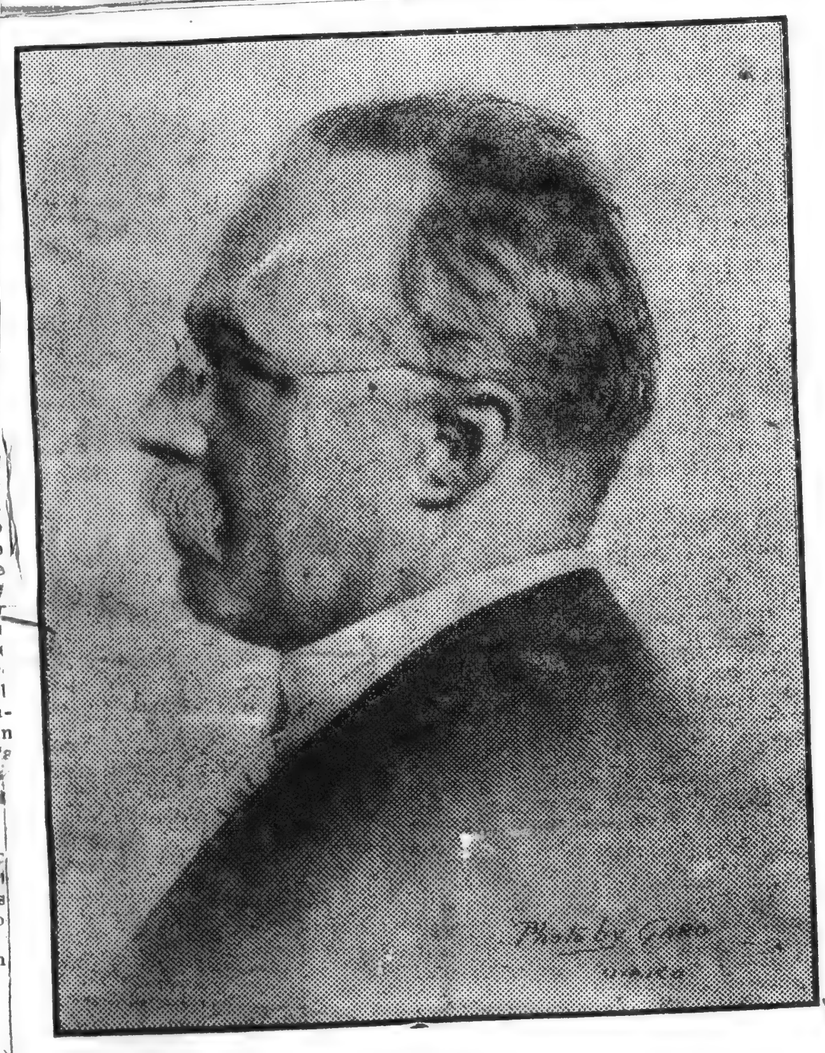
The sale of seats will begin to-morrow noon at the Lyceum. Interest in the engagement is indicated by the number of mail orders already received.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES ROCHESTER, N. Y
Address
Date JAN 31

Seats went on sale at noon today at the Lyceum for the engagement of the Boston Symphony concert next Friday evening. The very large audience which the orchestra drew here last year will evidently be duplicated on this visit, to judge from the applications for seats already received.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date FEB 1 - 1910

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Lyceum on Friday evening promises to be the most interesting the orchestra has ever given here. The programme, with its mixture of modern schools, is more than ordinarily attractive, and the soloist, Madame Samaroff, is a prime favorite here. This year this brilliant pianist is astonishing her most ardent admirers. Never has her art been so compelling. She will play the great Liszt Concerto in E-flat



MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Lyceum.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From POST
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date FEB - 1910

The opening of the sale for the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyceum next Friday night began yesterday. It fully came up to expectations and the chances are that the concert will be even more successful than last season's. The orchestra passed through Rochester in three special Pullmans yesterday en route to Buffalo, where the first concert was given last night.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m .....
ress .....
ROCHESTER, N. Y
FEB 3 - 1910

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is giving its annual concert here in the Lyceum to-morrow evening, gives seven concerts on its so-called western trip. Next year the chances are that it will go further west and give a concert in Chicago where it has been heard only once since the World's Fair, in January, 1907. Then it broke all records for orchestral concerts in this country, if not in the world. The concert was given in the Auditorium and the receipts were just less than $3,000. The reason that the Orchestra does not go further west is that it has but one week to give to this trip and the management wants to do as little traveling as is absolutely necessary.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
s .....
ROCHESTER, N. Y
FEB - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Lyceum to-night takes pla[ce] the annual concert of the Boston Sym[phony] phony Orchestra. The organization comes this year under the leadership of Max Fiedler, who made such a favorable impression last year on the music lovers who heard the orchestra under his direction.

Madame Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianiste, who has many friends in this city, will be the soloist with the orchestra concert. The hour for the beginning of the concert is 8.15 o'clock.

The programme follows:

Overture to the opera, Der Freischutz.....Weber
Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade (after The Thousand Nights and a Night) op. 34 ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff Concerto in E-flat Major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1..... Liszt Waldweben from Siegfried, Act II, prelude to The Mastersinger of Nuremberg ..... Wagner

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ADVERTISER
ROCHESTER, N.
FEB 2-

JUST A LITTLE STORY.

Conditions surrounding the giving of orchestral concerts in this part of the country are very different from what they were twenty-five years ago or so when the Boston Symphony Orchestra first began to travel. The late Fred R. Comee, its assistant manager whose sudden death last spring was such a shock to all the friends of the orchestra, used to tell an amusing story of a visit paid to a prosperous city in the middle of this state back in the 80's. It was the first time an orchestra had ever come there and the manager of the theater where the concert was to be given had vague ideas as to what sort of entertainment the Boston Symphony gave. When Mr. Comee went to the theater on his arrival in the city and had assured the manager that the "troupe" had arrived, the manager asked him how many ladies were in it.

"Not a one,' answered Mr. Comee with a grin.

"Oh!" ejaculated the manager. "Sort of minstrel troup, eh?"

"Yes," admitted Comee, grinning still wider.

"Well," asked the manager, "when do you parade?"

"We're cutting that out this time," said Mr. Comee.

"Then, you're a frost," said the manager, wisely. "No minstrel troupe can go here with a parade, take my word for it."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From POST EXPRESS
Address ROCHESTER, N.
Date FEB 4- 1910

At the Lyceum to-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual concert before a large audience. Mme. Olga Samaroff will be the soloist. Many of the best known names in the world of instrumentalists are included among the players of this famous organization. In the strings are such famous violinists as Hess, Noack, Roth, Kuntz, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Barleben; Warnke, Keller, Belinski, Kautzenbach, among the 'cellos; Ferir, Gietzen and Rennert among the violas; Keller, Huber, Agnesy among the double basses; men all of them famous as virtuoso of their instruments aside from their work in the orchestra. In the wood-wind section is Longy, greatest master of the oboe in the world, and only less famous than he are Andre Maquarre, the first flute; Grisez, the first clarinet, and Sadony the first bassoon. In the horn sections are Max Hess and George Wendler, artists that are the envy of every other orchestra in this country, while in Kloepfel the orchestra possesses probably the finest trumpet in the world. Here is the programme:

Weber .....Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz."
Rimsky-Korsakoff....Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") Op. 35.
Liszt.....Concerto in E-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1.
Wagner....."Waldweben" from "Siegfried" Act II, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date FEB 5- 1910

AMUSEMENTS

Lyceum Theater ..... Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Lyceum Theater last night, was distinguished by two features of more than ordinary interest. These were the introduction to a Rochester audience of Rimsky-Korsakoff through the medium of one of his symphonic compositions, and the appearance of Madame Olga Samaroff in circumstances befitting her merits as a pianist. One or two of Rimsky-Korsakoff's smaller works have been heard here before, and they whetted the appetite for his more pretentious musical structure built on tales from "The Arabian Nights." Madame Samaroff had already established herself in the favor of Rochester music lovers by two or three piano recitals, but last night she had an opportunity to give a more impressive demonstration of her artistic skill in that brilliant product of Liszt's collossal genius, the E-flat concerto for piano and orchestra.

The concert opened with von Weber's good old overture to "Der Freischutz" long a model of simple elegance and melodic grace, and given, of course, with the perfection of tone and technic for which this orchestra is world-famous. Its familiar strains, now ninety years old, seemed invested with new beauties under the interpretation of Mr. Fiedler and his men.

The Liszt concerto is one of the most difficult and imposing of piano compositions. Its construction is to a certain extent an adaptation of the symphonic poem to the concerto form, although there are two movements, each subdivided into two divisions with their own rhythmic and thematic characteristics. Upon this composition Liszt lavished the treasures of his musical knowledge and imagination, joined with his prodigious pianistic resources, with the result of producing a work which every virtuoso idolizes and deems worthy of his or her best efforts. Madame Samaroff's rendering was superb. It called into action her almost matchless perception of every large or small musical detail, her warmth and delicacy of temperament, her immense resources in execution, her power and breadth, her magic mastery of tonal effects, her blending of authority and persuasiveness in interpretation. Her support by the orchestra was, of course, all that could be desired and more than is often attained by even the best bodies of instrumentalists. Tremendous applause followed the performance, and it was so long continued that Madame Samaroff was compelled again and again to bow her acknowledgements, being prevented from granting an encore only by a rule that prevails at all concerts of the Boston symphony Orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff ranked next to Tschaikowsky among modern Russian composers. The two were contemporaries and admirers of each other. Korsakoff, if less profound than Tsaikowsky, was equally bold, brilliant and original, and his works have contributed their share of sensations to the musical world. The "Scheherazade" suite is in four movements with the following titles: (1) "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship"; (2) "The Story of the Kalendar Prince"; (3) "The Young Prince and the Young Princess"; (4) "Festival at Bagdad; the sea; the ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior; conclusion." Avowedly, this is "programme music." Actually, it is a series of free fantastics, the products (presumably) of moods induced by the four tales from "The Thousand and One Nights." That is the extent of their descriptive function. The work itself is a riot of melody, harmony and instrumentation. It amazes, dazzles and fascinates. Its variety is constant; its hold on the interest never relaxes; its grip on the listener is firm; its appeals are astonishing, impetuously eloquent, exciting and irresistible. The performance last night was a revelation of orchestral virtuosity.

The concluding numbers were "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." These two Wagnerian gems were given with immaculate purity and exaltation of spirit. The audience was large, cordial and enthusiastic. The concert was under the local management of J. E. Furlong.

Last night's programme announced the coming engagement of Mischa Elman, the violinist, for February 16th at the Hotel Seneca ball room. Since the programme was printed the date and place of the engagement have been changed to February 21st, at Convention Hall, the latter place having been engaged on account of its larger seating capacity.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 5- 1910

The music lovers of this city were given the opportunity last evening of hearing what is generally conceded to be the best orchestra in this country, and they took full advantage of the opportunity. It is doubtful if the Boston orchestra ever played as well before, or was as enthusiastically received by a Rochester audience. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, happily does not share the opinion of certain other visiting conductors that Rochester, being a provincial city, is satisfied, or should be, with the compositions of an earlier period. Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were mighty men, but Rochester's own orchestra is able to cope quite successfully with a number of their works. So it was refreshing to have Mr. Fiedler bring a great modern work, the instrumental requirements of which are such as to preclude local production. May other conductors follow his example; they will profit by drawing good houses. There is hope of yet hearing some Strauss.

"Scheherazade," being a Symphonic Suite after "The Thousands Nights and a Night" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who is regarded as the greatest representative of the Russian school since the death of Tschaikowsky, was the principal work o fthe evening—programme music of wondrous beauty—and Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of it was most poetical. If impulse were followed, one would say only: "I have lived in Arabia!" The suite is in four movements—"The Sea and Sinbad's Shop," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," the fourth movement depicting a festival at Bagdad, the sea and the wreck of Sinbad's ship on the magnetic rock. The composer has not treated his thematic material contrapuntally, but has chosen to paint his tone-pictures with transformations of melody, harmony and rythm, the rythmic effects being especially interesting. The orchestration is daring and in color, from flaming scarlet to soft, lustrous, Oriental hues. Gladly would the Lyceum audience have listened to it again.

Weber's ever fresh overture to "Der Trieschutz" was given a good reading although twice or thrice there was some scrambling and uncertainty of rythm at changes of tempi.

"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," was well played, but both conductor and orchestra were better in the prelude to "The Mastersingers." This great music—considered, in the advent of the more modern moderns, the test piece for conductors and men—was given with a breadth and mastery truly inspiring. Mr. Fiedler is more en rapport with his musicians this season than last.

Mme. Samaroff, the soloist, received such an ovation as is rarely accorded an artis in this city. She played the Liszt "Concerts in E-flat No. 1" with such beauty of tone and musicianship that at its concussion she was recalled many times but she laughingly refused to play again. Added to her fine ability as a pianst and musician is personal charm irresistible. Concert-goers will have a most hospitable welcome for Mme. Samaroff, Mr. Fiedler and his musicians whenever fortune may favor them with the opportunity of extending it.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date FEB 2- 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade," which is the principal orchestral number on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here on Friday evening in the Lyceum, the part of the narrator, that is of Scheherazade, the Sultan's wife, who saves her own neck and that of her sister by keeping her husband amused with stories for a thousand nights and a night, is taken as a solo [illegible] by Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra. Professor Hess calls it "His Female Impersonation."

Last season Professor Hess and Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, saw a female impersonator on the stage. At the end of the performance Mr. Fiedler turned to Professor Hess and said solemnly: "My dear Hess, you are a great artist, but as a female impersonator this gentleman can shoy you something. He understands how to handle his back hair better." "Yes, my dear Mr. Fiedler," replied Hess, "but if I understand correctly Turkish ladies don't wear back hair."

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From UNION
Address
Date FEB 4-

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which will play at the Lyceum to-night, has been called in the past an "orchestra of virtuosi" and if this was true five years ago when the phrase was coined, it is true to-day. With the possible exception of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, there is no organization of the kind in the world that contains so many acknowledged masters of the art and the Paris Conservatoire is hardly to be classed with the Boston Symphony because its concerts are only occasional and it lacks the opportunity for complete drilling that the Boston Symphony has. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the noted pianist, will be the soloist at to-night's concert. She will play the Liszt concerto in F-flat. There will be no symphony; in the place of this usual feature of an orchestra's programme, will be the extraordinary brilliant symphonic suit of Rimsky-Korsaffok—"Scheherazade." The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" and two excerpts from Wagner. "Forest Murmurings" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the Prelude from "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT

Madame Olga Samaroff the Soloist.

A splend'd audience is assured for the concert to be given tonight at the Lyceum by the Boston Symphony Orchestra The noted organization of musicians arrives from the west this afternoon.

Only by adhering steadfastly to the highest ideals since its foundation has the Orchestra been able to hold its present position—without a superior in the world, and without a peer in this country. Commercial considerations have never been permitted to interfere with or to obstruct its artistic progress. It has existed as nearly for art's sake alone as is possible in such a great organization. The result of this wise policy is an orchestra which is famous in all countries where the art of music is practised, an orchestra which is accepted as a model to be followed by all others, an orchestra whose concerts are eagerly sought by all cities.

The programme in full is as follows:

I. Weber—Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz."
II. Rimsky-Korsakoff — Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35.
III. Liszt—Concerto in E-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1.
IV. Wagner — "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," Act II. Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

Soloist—Madame Olga Samaroff.

ENQUIRER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 2 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY SALE.

Once a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra forsakes its home city for an entire week and goes on a Western tour. The tour this winter opens in Buffalo, where next Monday night America's greatest orchestra will give its annual concert in Convention Hall, Max Fiedler conducting. The orchestra will also introduce to a Buffalo audience the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer, pianist and conductor, who will be the solist, playing his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date FEB 4- 1910

Conductorship of Boston Symphony.

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra states with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Carl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached, nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even coisidered.

...ing Daily in the world
HERALD
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 5 1910

FINE CONCERT AT LYCEUM

Boston Symphony and Mme. Samaroff Unite Forces.

PIANISTE SCORES TRIUMPH

Entire Programme of Interesting Numbers Superbly Played—Audience Fills the Theater.

Most offerings in the way of public entertainment are properly judged by standards of taste; some few are known to be of themselves standards by which other like offerings may be measured. In the latter category, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be placed. For the musical rank of this body of players is unquestioned, and this is one of the great orchestras of the musical world. The hearer may be sure that the music which he hears is a superb rendering of the composer's score, as the orchestra's conductor understands and interprets it. The more complete the mastery of technical matters on the part of an orchestra, the more its personnel includes fine musicians, and only these, and the more its discipline approaches perfection, in like increasing ratio does the director become a soloist on the most wonderfully capable and composite of instruments.

Max Fiedler, under whose direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard here last year, is a masterful individualist. The first evidence of his personality was seen in the programme, and to the last note of its rendition this personality was sounded by the players. The programme leaned markedly to the romantic in musical content. The traditional symphony was replaced by a symphonic suite, though this is rather a distinction in name than in form, for Dvorak's "New World" or Goldmark's "Country Wedding" might well be symphonic suites instead of symphonies.

Then the one classicist among the composers was Weber, who was a genuine romancer in music, though he was beautifully consistent in adherence to formal development, particularly in the splendid "Freischuetz Overture," with which the programme opened. This overture never loses its charm, though its many arrangements for band, small orchestra or piano are often far from charmingly played. Last night it came into its own again; the horns were never more deliciously heard in concert, and here and there were little instrumental episodes that sounded a new meaning in an old favorite.

The second number, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, was, in point of novelty, of unique interest in the programme's content. It is written on themal matter suggested by some of the narratives of the wonderful story teller of the "Arabian Nights" tales, and is frankly designed to suggest in musical expression the scenes of the text. The work is so full of melodic material, so resourceful in orchestral color, so fertile in instrumentation and so elusive in rhythmic content, that a number of hearings would be necessary to realize it in detail. But it appeals at once in the charm of its constant interest. The first movement, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," is introduced by a delightful minor melody, given to solo violin with harp accompaniment which typifies the narrator, Scheherazade, and constantly recurs as connecting link to the four movements. The entire first movement is bold in melodic outline and vivid in its instrumental suggestiveness. The Russian composer has written the sea into his music; the sharp breaking of his long surges of sound, interspersed with a delicate, frothy tracery of melody in flutes and woodwinds, is fine in conception and in its technical working out.

The second movement is a remarkable effort at making an orchestra suggest a narrative. The fertility with which the solo instruments and then the various ensembles were made to handle related musical ideas was wonderful and the effect almost bewildering. The third movement is more quietly formal, and its melodic and harmonic beauty was quickly recognized. The fourth movement is a prodigious riot of orchestral color, in which the composer has, with remarkable mastery, summed up his musical story. The effect of the whole composition was stimulative of great interest. Its technical requirements on orchestra and conductor are enormous, and they were superbly met.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, whom Rochester greets as one of its favorite pianistes, was the soloist, and elected Liszt's E-flat major concerto as her vehicle. It is always a pleasure to hear this concerto receive a fine rendition. It is brilliant in content, both for the solo instrument and for the orchestra. Liszt knew very well what can be done with delightful effect by both these mediums, and he used his knowledge in this concerto. It is always interesting, is not unduly discursive, and gives the soloist some splendid pianistic things to do. Mme. Samaroff did them charmingly. Her attitude is so sincere, her mechanical means so capable and her understanding so musical in every detail that the result is full satisfaction. In her playing there are poise and dignity, a beautiful suavity and an adherence to the melodic line that marks her work as distinctive among that of the many pianists whom we hear. The cordial recalls she received last night, she fully earned.

Two Wagner excerpts closed the programme, the forest music from "Siegfried" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." There is no music of the woods like this of Wagner, and the strings last night were fairly alive with woodland atmosphere in tonal suggestiveness. The Prelude was superb; it was so splendidly statuesque without being rigid, and so robust without any hint of boistrousness, that it seemed a perfect realization of this most genial and most richly scored of all Wagner's programme numbers. The audience completely filled the theater and lingered at the end of the programme to convey its appreciation to conductor and orchestra.

EVENING NEWS
...ss Buffalo, N. Y. ...10

Boston Symphony to Play Novelties.

Next Thursday morning the sale of seats for the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 31, will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. This year the orchestra will introduce as soloists, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who will play his own second piano concerto, appearing for the first time in Buffalo. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is called the greatest of Russian composers and the direct successor to his master Tschaikowsky. Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged a program in every way characteristic of the noble reputation of the organization. It includes Weber's Euryanthe overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, Scheherazade, based on familiar tales from the "Arabian Nights," heard here for the first time; Rachmaninoff's piano concerto, played by the composer; the final numbers will be Wagnerian, the Waldweben, from the second act of "Siegfried" and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Mail orders for seats, sent to the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place, will be filed in the order of their receipt and in advance of the public sale, but to be honored, they must be accompanied by a check payable to her. The prices are: First 16 rows of Convention Hall $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; next 15, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

TIMES
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 29 1910

THE REALM OF MUSIC

Boston Spmphony Orchestra and Mme. Samaroff—Popularity of of Mischa Ellman. Musical Notes of Interest.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Olga Samaroff as soloist, will come to the Lyceum theater for a concert on next Friday evening. Seats will be placed on sale next Monday noon at the Lyceum. The very general interest felt in the concert is evidenced by the large number of applications for seats already received at the theater and it seems likely that an audience equaling in numbers the great crowd which heard the orchestra last season will be present for the coming engagement.

No conductor has made a more profound impression on Rochester's music lovers than Mr. Fiedler did a year ago. The obvious sincerity of the man, his unassuming simplicity, his masterful control of his forces and the splendid spirit which he put into all he did exercised a powerful fascination over the audience and he will be very warmly welcomed on his return. This year he has arranged a programme of unusual charm. The principal orchestral number will be Russian, a symphonic suite entitled "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died a year and a half ago. As the title implies, the suite draws its inspiration from that huge collection of Arabian folk-tales entitled "The Thousand Nights and a Night" or more familiarly known to the reading public of this country as "The Arabian Nights." On the fly-leaf of the orchestral score the following programme is printed.

"The Sultan Schahriar persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, has sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Pricked by curiosity, he put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan.

"Many marvels were told Schahriar by the Sultana Scheherazade. For her stories the Sultana borrowed from poets their verses, from folk-songs their words; and she strung together tales and adventures.

"I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.

"II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.

"III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.

"IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion."

This programme is deliberately vague. To which one of Sinbad's voyages is reference made? The story which Kalandar, for there were three that knocked on that fateful night at the gate of the house of the three ladies of Bagdad? "The Young Prince and the Young Princess"—but there are so many in the "Thousand Nights and a Night." "The Ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior." Here is a distinct reference to the third Kalandar's tale, the marvellous adventure of the Prince Ajib, son of Khazib; for the magnetic mountain which shipwrecked Sinbad on his voyage was not surmounted by "a dome of yellow laton from Andalusia, vaulted upon ten columns; and on its crown is a horseman who rideth a horse of brass and holdeth in hand a lance of laton; and there hangeth on his bosom a tablet of lead graven with names and talismans." The composer did not attempt to interline any specific text with music; he endeavored to put the mood of the many tales into music."

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the composer, has been generally acknowledged after the death of Tschaikowsky to be the greatest among the Russians. His music is not characterized by the enormous emotional depths found in that of Tschaikowsky. Generally speaking it is of lighter quality, melodious and brilliant. He was a past-master in the art of orchestration and instrumentation and in this symphonic suite he gives full rein to his fancy which always influenced by the Orient, becomes very Oriental in the depiction of the episodes contained in the programme.

The other orchestral numbers will include Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" and two excerpts from Wagner, the splendid "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the animating prelude to the "Meistersinger."

The reputation of Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist for the concert, is so well known here that an extended review of that splendid artiste's ability would be almost superfluous. From the time of her first appearance in this city Mme. Samaroff has steadily advanced in her art and in reputation and she has received the warmest praise from critics wherever she has played. This programme will be given:

I. Weber—Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz."
II. Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35.
III. Liszt—Concerto in E flat Major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1.
IV. Wagner—"Waldweben" from "Siegfried" Act II. Prelude to "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg."
Soloist—Madame Olga Samaroff.

High School next Tuesday evening. The programme includes the Hayden Clock Symphony, Mendelssohn's Molusina Overture, two numbers from Hoffman's Opus 19, Gounod's Cradle Song for strings, and Wagner's Huldigunsmarsch.

Arrangements have been made with the Street Railway Company to provide plenty of cars both before and after the concert, the ending of which, Mr. Schenck will time in such a way that the cars will be at the school about five minutes after the closing of the last number.

There is no charge for admission, but because of the limited seating capacity of the West High auditorium the admission will be by ticket only. Tickets can be had from members of the orchestra, also on Monday and Tuesday, at the orchestra office, 207 Beckley Building, from the librarian, as long as they last.

...ADVERTISER.
From
Address
Date FEB 5 1910

REMARKABLE CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Rouses Capacity Audience to Wild Enthusiasm at Lyceum.

There are many orchestras in the country and many good ones, but there is only one Boston Symphony under the direction of Max Fiedler, and Rochesterians had an opportunity of enjoying their concert last night at the Lyceum. The fact that people are becoming more fond of orchestra music was demonstrated by the size of the audience, which filled every available bit of space in the theater, while a few years ago, a mere handful would attend an orchestra concert. The opening number was "Der Freischutz" overture and it is safe to say that though most of us are familiar with it, it has never been played in Rochester as it was played last night under Mr. Fiedler's leadership.

The symphonic suite, "Thousand Nights and a Night," by Renisky-Korsakoff, was a revelation to the hearers. It is in four numbers, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship" is descriptive to a degree, and gives opportunity for solos by various members of the orchestra, Mr. Willy Hess doing a great deal of the solo work and doing it well. The second movement, "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," and the third, "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," are both wonderfully beautiful with their simple form and yet the elaborate Oriental coloring, while the last movement introduces in the "Festival at Bagdad," all of the din and confusion attendant upon carnival time, then follows the voyage on the sea and the shipwreck, which brings the suite to a wild and tragic close.

The other two orchestra numbers were "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the "Prelude to the Meistersingers," and both received tumultuous applause. Mr. Fiedler has a wonderful magnetism about him and seems to get results by a mere look, and his musical interpretation is exceptional, while each player seems an artist in his line, making the orchestra the leading one of the country.

Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist of the evening and a happier combination could not have been arranged. She is already well known here and received an ovation last night, after playing Liszt's concerto in E flat. Her wonderful technic, musical feeling and simple, unaffected manner all join in making her one of the leading pianists of the day, and her audience showed their appreciation by insistent demands for an encore, but Mme. Samaroff returned four or five times and bowed her acknowledgment, after which the piano was moved back, plainly telling the audience that there was no hope of an extra number.

[110]

...Clipper Clipping Bureau in the World
...ST EXPRESS
m ... ress ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 5 - 1910
...

In Musical Circles

Last night Rochester put off its old timorous conservatism and dared to be enthusiastic. Never during the last decade has there been so obviously delighted a musical audience as filled the Lyceum. The occasion justified its change of heart; for it was the annual visit of the Boston Symphony—an orchestra which has no equal in America and no superior in Europe. It is well enough to practice modesty; but it is low humility to permit fear of what may be said by foreigners to make us deny to Boston that recognition which is its due. The world's best instrumentalists are recruited for Boston's orchestra; Europe sends its greatest conductors and America supplies the initiative, the system, and the money to fit the separate units into a perfect whole.

It was a beautiful concert and criticism can only take the form of reverent approbation. Max Fiedler was the director, a musician whose manner suggests some military disciplinarian of the Fatherland with the unlooked for attributes of imagination and sensibility. His manner breathes authority and calm confidence. Yet he is no animated metronome. The way he conducted the "Meistersinger" overture proved that. When the orchestra was playing that quaintly rigid polyphony in which Wagner burlesques the schoolmen of music, his figure took on an angularity that suggested Dore's Don Quixote; when, on the other hand, the instruments were weaving the dulcet strands of the "Preislied," his movements were fluent and as graceful as the gestures of a man designed on so soldierly a plan could be.

Weber, that poet of German romanticism, gave us the first number on the programme. It was the "Freischutz" overture, a work which is as young today as it was when it was first listened to by an overjoyed Fatherland. There was no mistaking the Bostonians in the playing of this glorious number. Here is an orchestra whose members are one and all such competent artists, that together they become an instrument upon which a man like Fiedler can play with the assured mastery of a Liszt on the piano or an Ysaye on the violin. When the strings play in unison the tone has choral richness and individual purity. The reeds are the finest that France—that home of the oboe and clarinet—can furnish; the brass has the sonority and precision of Germany's best executants. The "Freischutz" overture acted upon players and audience like an elixir. The first number of a concert is always listened to—at the beginning, at least, rather coldly. But this initial frigidity disappeared like snow before the sunshine; the sympathy of the house reacted upon the orchestra and, from end to end, the concert was as pure a thing of joy as it is possible for an evening of music to be.

The second number was a novelty to most Rochesterians. It was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky Korsakoff, a Russian who started out to be an ultra-Muscovite, but was saved for happier things by the virtue of an example. Your Russian, as Arminius Vambery warningly informed the English diplomats, is really an oriental; so it is natural to find Rimsky Korsakoff giving musical expression to the "Thousand and One Nights." As Philip Hale tells in the programme notes, which, by the way, are a veritable contribution to the story of music, the composer describes in theme and in tone coloring the story-telling princess, Sinbad, the wanderer, the Eastern monk, loves of golden prince and princess, and the picturesque circumstance of a festival at Bagdad. It is music in which the art of the West is informed by the spirit of the Orient, with its longings and its raptures, its strange rhythms and suggestions of exotic instruments. Limpid ripplings of the harp, the Arcadian note of the oboe, the subdued pathos of the bassoon contribute to produce an atmosphere gorgeously Eastern. Scheherazade's plaint, sung by the violin, was so beautifully played by Willy Hess that Mr. Fiedler made him rise to share the ovation which followed the close of the number.

In addition to the "Meistersinger" Overture, to which reference has already been made, the orchestra also played the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." The performance was marked by that mixture of unobstrusive virtuosity and poetic sympathy which makes the performances of the Boston symphony the delight of amateurs and the despair of emulators.

Madame Samaroff was the soloist. She is a pianist in whom Rochester takes all the more kindly interest because it was in the Flower City that she won her earliest American triumphs. Since then she has virtually conquered the world. She played the Liszt E Flat Concerto—the one which Hanslick, blindly pedantic, temporarily blighted with the title of the "Triangle." Concerto. But the world has not ratified his depreciation. It is the work of a man through whom the piano spoke a language wonderfully eloquent. Madame Samaroff has gained in breadth and musicianship. She always had aplomb and impeccable technique. She now has the master's power to make the piano woo the orchestra, sympathize with it, not be in rivalry with it, as it is only too apt to be when a Concerto is played by an artist not overburdened with sensibility. The audience applauded her to the echo. They would fain have heard a solo; but that was not to be expected.

Rochester is not so far from Boston; why should we not have two concerts a year—or even three? Then we should get more of that divine discontent which leads municipalities, like individuals, to accomplish things.

m COURIER
ress Buffalo, N. Y.
te JAN 2 3 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Manhattan Opera Comique Company at Teck Theater—Success of Buffalo Girl—What the Mendelssohn Choir will sing.

CONCERT BY BUFFALO ORPHEUS

On Thursday morning of this week the sale of seats for the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 31st, will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be the great feature of Buffalo's musical season, not only because the orchestra itself is so superior in every way to most orchestras in the whole world, but because it has always something interesting to offer to the Buffalo public, both in the way of programme and of soloists. Last year it brought to Buffalo the great Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, whose playing here caused nothing short of a tremendous sensation. This year the orchestra brings another Russian, but one of very different calibre, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who from all accounts is the most interesting personality that has come to American shores this year.

Rachmaninoff is today the leader of the Russian school of composers, although he denies himself that there is anything particularly national in his music, saying that the last of the true Russian composers died in Rimsky-Korsakoff. None the less as a composer, Rachmaninoff, by birth and training, must be reckoned among the Russians, and by his music also, for if it has not the peculiar folk-quality found in Rimsky-Korsakoff, the atmosphere of Russia is certainly evident.

Rachmaninoff comes here in the twofold capacity of pianist and composer, for he will play his own second Concerto for piano, a work with which he has had great success at his various appearances this year, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler made a most favorable impression last year, not only by his conducting, but by the programme that he offered. This year his programme is of the same high quality. It begins with Weber's Euryanthe overture and then comes a Russian work, which, preceding the Concerto by Rachmaninoff, will bring into sharp contrast the methods pursued by the two greatest Russians since Tschaikowsky; Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, Scheherazade, as a specimen of brilliantly glittering orchestration, stands almost without a peer in modern music. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a pastmaster in the art of instrumentation and this suite, based on familiar tales from the Arabian Nights, glows with Eastern color and demands of an orchestra, virtuosi of the highest quality.

The other two numbers will be Wagnerian—the Waldweben from the second act of Siegfried, and the Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde.

Up to noon on Wednesday, mail orders for seats, sent to the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place, and accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled in the order of their receipt prior to the opening of the public sale. The prices are: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

Address Buffalo, N. Y.
Date JAN 2 3 1910
Establishe
...
ess ...
... JAN 26 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Finest in the World Will Present a Splendid Program at Convention Hall Next Monday Evening.

Once a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra forsakes its home city for an entire week and goes on a Western tour. The tour this winter opens in Buffalo, where next Monday night America's greatest orchestra will give its annual concert in Convention Hall, Max Fiedler conducting. The orchestra will also introduce to a Buffalo audience the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer, pianist and conductor, who will be the soloist, playing his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be in Buffalo for the concert. He, Mr. Fiedler and Rachmaninoff will be here next Sunday and the orchestra will come in on Monday morning. W. E. Walter, representing the orchestra, is already in Buffalo. Mr. Walter is a prother of Eugene Walter, author of "Just a Wife," in which Charlotte Walker is playing the first half of this week at the Teck.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert opens tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels'. Already there has been a heavy mail order sale. Prices are as follows: First 16 rows of Convention Hall, $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; next 15, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

From COMMERCIAL
Address Buffalo, N. Y.
Date ...

Monday evening, January 31st, brings the annual concert in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the sale of seats for the concert will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels on next Thursday morning, January 27th. This year it presents in Buffalo for the first time as soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who, at least since Rimsky-Korsakoff's death, is the greatest of Russian composers, and, in the opinion of many, the mantle of Tschaikowsky has descended on his shoulders directly.

Again Mr. Fiedler, who made so favorable an impression on Buffalo last year, will lead Boston's Orchestra. Not a little of Mr. Fiedler's popularity is due to his extraordinary skill in the making of programs. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for Buffalo is, with the excepton of the first number, entirely modern. The first number will be Weber's Euryanthe overture. Then will come Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade, one of the most brilliant works in the literature of the orchestra and strongly in contrast with the other Russian work—Rachmaninoff's Concerto—which follows it. The last two numbers will be the "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Up to next Wednesday noon mail orders for seats, accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place. Usual prices will prevail.

m EVENING NEWS
ress Buffalo, N. Y.
te JAN 2 = 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S VISIT

Annual Concert is to Be Given at Convention Hall Next Monday Evening.

Once a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra forsakes its home city for an entire week and goes on a Western tour. The tour this winter opens in Buffalo, where next Monday night America's greatest orchestra will give its annual concert in Convention Hall, Max Fielder conducting. The orchestra will also introduce to a Buffalo audience the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer, pianist and conductor, who will be the soloist, playing his own concerto for pianforte and orchestra.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be in Buffalo for the concert. He, Mr. Fielder, and Rachmaninoff, will be here next Sunday and the orchestra, is already in Buffalo. Mr. Walter is a brother of Eugene Walter, author of "Just a Wife," in which Charlotte Walker is playing the first half of this week at the Teck, and he came a day ahead of his schedule in order to witness a performance of his brother's play.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert opens tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels'. Already there has been a heavy mail order sale. Prices are as follows: First 16 rows of Convention Hall, $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; next 15, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

m COURIER
ress Buffalo, N. Y.
te JAN 2 1910

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a more than ordinarily attractive programme for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 31st. There will be no symphony; in its place will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," which is one of the most attractive orchestral works that the Boston Symphony has ever played. The other orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," and two works by Wagner—"Forest Murmurings," from "Siegfried," Act 2, and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The soloist on this occasion will be Sergei Rachmanioff, the distinguished pianist and composer, who will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

The local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announces that she will fill mail orders in the sequence of their receipt and in advance of the public sale. They must be accompanied by check payable to her and sent to No. 26 Irving Place. This is the scale of prices: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the rest of the lower floor and balcony, 75 cents.

BIGGEST SEASON EVER FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Star to Be Introduced at the Local Concert.

W. E. Walter of Boston, a brother of Eugene Walter, author of "Just a Wife," is in town in the interests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual concert in Convention Hall next Monday night.

"Never in the history of the Boston orchestra have we had such a season," said Mr. Walter, enthusiastically, "and our road tour, which opens in Buffalo next Monday night, might have been for two months instead of a week.

"The Boston orchestra is not only coming to Buffalo in its entirety for next Monday night, but it will introduce to this city as soloist one of the season's biggest musical stars, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who will play his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Rachmaninoff is the musical sensation of the year in America.

"It is the custom of the Boston orchestra to present these great artists as soloists at its concerts. Rachmaninoff will, we expect, eclipse even the triumphs of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, whom we brought to Buffalo last year."

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert opens tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

[111]

COURIER

ess Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 23 1910

On Thursday morning of this week the sale of seats for the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 31st, will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels'. The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be the great feature of Buffalo's musical season, not only because the orchestra itself is so far superior in every way to any other in this country, but because it has always something interesting to offer to the Buffalo public both in the way of programme and of soloists. Last year the orchestra brought to Buffalo the great Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, whose playing here caused nothing short of a tremendous sensation. This year the orchestra brings another Russian, but one of very different calibre, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who from all accounts is the most interesting personality that has come to American shores this year.

Rachmaninoff is today the leader of the Russian school of composers, although he denies himself that there is anything particularly nationalistic in his music, saying that the last of the true Russian composers died in Rimsky-Korsakoff. None the less, as a composer, Rachmaninoff by his birth and training must be reckoned among the Russians, and by his music also, for if it has not the peculiar folk-quality found in Rimsky-Korsakoff and some of the traits, the atmosphere of Russia is certainly evident.

Rachmaninoff comes here in the two-fold capacity of pianist and composer, for he will play his own second concerto for pianoforte, a work with which he has had great success at his various appearances this year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As last year it was the privilege of the Boston Symphony to introduce Mischa Elman to the larger cities of the East, so this year it was its privilege to introduce Rachmaninoff in like manner.

Mr. Fiedler made a most favorable impression last year, not only by his conducting, but by the programme that he offered and this year his programme is of the same high quality. It begins with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and then comes a Russian work, which, preceding the concerto by Rachmaninoff, will bring into sharp contrast the methods pursued by the two greatest Russians since Tschaikowsky. Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which will be heard here for the first time, as a specimen of brilliantly glittering orchestration stands almost without a peer in modern music. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a past master in the art of instrumentation and a genius in orchestration, and this suite, based on familiar tales from the "Arabian Nights," glows with Eastern color and demands of an orchestra virtuosi of the highest quality.

The other two numbers will be Wagnerian—the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried," and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Up to noon on Wednesday, mail orders for seats, sent to the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled in the order of receipt in advance of the public sale. Prices are: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the r floor and the balcony,

DE...MIT

COMMERCIAL

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN

ON ANNUAL TOUR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give a Concert in This City Next Monday Evening.

Once a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra forsakes its home city for an entire week and goes on a western tour. The tour this winter opens in Buffalo, where next Monday night America's greatest orchestra will give its annual concert in Convention Hall, Max Fiedler conducting. The orchestra will also introduce to a Buffalo audience the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, composer, pianist and conductor, who will be the soloist, playing his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert opens tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Already there has been a heavy mail order sale. Prices are as follows: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

From MORNING EXPRESS

Address Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 26 191

Date

GREAT CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Rachmaninoff on Monday Night.

W. E. Walter of Boston, a brother of Eugene Walter, author of Just a Wife, in which Charlotte Walker is playing the first half of this week at the Teck, is in town in the interests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual concert in Convention Hall next Monday night. Mr. Walter came to Buffalo a day ahead of his time in order to witness a performance of his brother's new play.

"Never in the history of the Boston Orchestra have we had such a season," said Mr. Walter enthusiastically, "and our road tour, which opens in Buffalo next Monday night, might have been for two months instead of a week, yet we could not have filled all the dates for which we have had requests.

"The Boston Orchestra is not only coming to Buffalo in its entirety for next Monday night, but it will introduce to this city as soloist one of the season's biggest musical stars, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who will play his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Rachmaninoff is the musical sensation of the year in America. It is the custom of the Boston Orchestra to present these great artists as soloists at its concerts. Last year we brought to Buffalo Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, and I do not need to remind anyone who attended that concert of the furore he created. Rachmaninoff will, we expect, eclipse even Elman's triumphs.

"Opening our tour in Buffalo next Monday night, we go on through the West for six concerts, returning to Boston a week from Sunday.

"Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be here. Max Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, Rachmaninoff and Mr. Ellis will arrive on Sunday, and the orchestra will come in early next Monday morning."

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert opens tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Up to noon today mail orders, accompanied by check payable to her, sent to the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place, will be filled in the order of receipt prior to the opening of the public sale. Prices are as follows: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

COURIER

ess Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEAT SALE WILL OPEN TODAY

Promptly at 9 o'clock this morning the seat sale will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' for the concert to be given next Monday night in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting. The Boston Symphony's annual concert is always the musical event of the winter in Buffalo and this season the orchestra will introduce as soloist the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor, who will play his own concerto for pianforte and orchestra.

om MORNING EXPRESS

ldress Buffalo, N. Y.

ate JAN 27

Seat Sale Today for Boston Symphony and Rachmaninoff

Promptly at 9 o'clock this morning the seat sale opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels for the concert to be given next Monday night in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting.

The Boston Symphony's annual concert is always the musical event of the winter in Buffalo, and this season the orchestra will introduce as soloist the musical sensation of the year, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor, who will play his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

Prices for the concert are: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1; the rest of the lower floor and the balcony, 75 cents.

om COURIER

ldress Buffalo, N. Y.

ate JAN 27

MUSICAL CAREER OF SERGEI RACHMANINOFF BRILLIANT

Soloist Who Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its annual concert here in Convention Hall next Monday evening, January 31st, is easily the greatest of living Russian composers, having succeeded to that place at the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Indeed, it is a question whether the mantle of the great Tschaikowsky has not descended immediately on the shoulders of this serious young man, who has made such a profound impression on the musical public of the United States during the present winter. If he lacks the glittering brilliancy of Rimsky-Korsakoff, it is because his mind is more serious and does not run in that direction. His works are more profound and it is fair to say, more musical, than those of any of the Russians that have flourished since Tschaikowsky. He is a big man and all the greater because of his sincerity, his simplicity, and his lack of pose.

He was born April 1, 1873, on an estate in the government of Novgorod. His musical instinct was discovered at an early age and carefully developed. When he was nine years old, he was sent to the Conservatory of St. Petersburg, and he studied the pianoforte there with Denyanski, but in 1885 he left the conservatory to enter the one at Moscow. There he studied the pianoforte, first with Zvireff, a pupil of Liszt, and afterward with Alexander Siloti, a cousin of Rachmaninoff. His teachers in composition were Arenssky and Taneieff. In 1891 he was awarded the highest honors as a pianist, and in 1892 the highest honors in composition, the gold medal of honor, for his opera, "Eleko," in one act (with the libretto after Pushkin.) He then traveled for some years, and gave many concerts in Russia.

In 1899 he visited London at the invitation of the Philharmonic Society, and conducted his fantasia, "The Cliff," based on Lermontoff's poem, and appeared as pianist at the Philharmonic concert, April 19th. In 1902 he appeared at Vienna as a pianist, and in 1907 he visited Paris. In 1897 he was appointed conductor of the Moscow Private Opera, but he gave up this position at the end of a year. In 1893 he was appointed professor of the pianoforte at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls in Moscow. In 1904 he was appointed first conductor at the Imperial Theater of Moscow, and it is said that he accepted the position with the condition that he should conduct only Russian opera. In 1906 he resigned the position to devote himself to composition and he left Moscow to make Dresden his dwelling place. He has visited St. Petersburg and Moscow to conduct concerts of the Philharmonic Association in the former city, and of the Imperial Musical Association of the latter.

m

dress BUFFALO, N. Y.

te JAN 27 1910

SALE OF SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seldom in a lifetime does one have the opportunity to enjoy such a musical combination as Buffalo is promised at Convention Hall Next Monday night—the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder conducting, with Rachmanioff, the Russian pianist, composer and conductor, as soloist, and the concert will be attended by music lovers from all over Western New York.

This will be Rachmaninoff's first appearance here. He has been in America only a month and is easily the musical sensation of the season. At Monday night's concern he will play his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. To hear him with America's great orchestra is the crowning triumph for Buffalo's musical season.

The seat sale opened with a rush this morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.' Prices are from $2 to 75c.

MORNING EXPRESS

ess Buffalo, N. Y,

JAN 28 191

RACHMANINOFF.

Sketch of Russian Artist who plays with the Boston Symphony.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here in Convention Hall next Monday evening, is easily the greatest of living Russian composers, having succeeded to that place at the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Indeed, it is a question whether the mantle of the great Tschaikowsky has not descended immediately on the shoulders of this serious young man who has made such a profound impression on the musical public of the United States during the present winter. If he lacks the glittering brilliancy of Rimsky-Korsakoff, it is because his mind is more serious and does not run in that direction. His works are more profound, and, it is fair to say, more musical than those of any of the Russians that have flourished since Tschaikowsky. He is a big man, and all the greater because of his sincerity, his simplicity and his lack of pose.

He was born on April 1, 1873, on an estate in the Government of Novgorod. His musical instinct was discovered at an early age, and carefully developed. When he was nine years old, he was sent to the Conservatory of Saint Petersburg, and he studied the pianoforte there with Denyanski, but in 1885 he left the conservatory to enter the one at Moscow. There he studied the pianoforte, first with Zviereff, a pupil of Liszt, and afterward with Alexander Siloti, a cousin of Rachmaninoff. His teachers in composition were Arensky and Taneieff. In 1891 he was awarded the highest honors as a pianist, and in 1892 the highest honors in composition, the gold medal of honor, for his opera Aleko in one act (with the libretto after Pushkin). He then traveled for some years, and gave many concerts in Russia. In 1899 he visited London at the invitation of the Philharmonic Society, and conducted his Fantasia, The Cliff, based on Lermontoff's poem, and appeared as pianist at the Philharmonic concert on April 19th. In 1902 he appeared at Vienna as a pianist, and in 1907 he visited Paris. In 1897 he was appointed conductor of the Moscow Private Opera, but he gave up this position at the end of a year. In 1893 he was appointed professor of the pianoforte at the Maryinsky Institute for girls in Moscow. In 1904 he was appointed first conductor at the Imperial Theater of Moscow, and it is said that he accepted the position with the condition that he should conduct only Russian opera. In 1906 he resigned the position to devote himself to composition, and he left Moscow to make Dresden his dwelling-place. He has visited Saint Petersburg and Moscow to conduct concerts of the Philharmonic Association in the former city, and of the Imperial Musical Association of the latter.

COURIER

ess Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN

RACHMANINOFF HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall next Monday night is the biggest musical combination that Buffalo has been promised in several seasons and interest in the event is widespread. Once a year, America's greatest orchestra makes a week's tour of the West, which, this season, opens in Buffalo.

Rachmaninoff, composer, pianist and conductor, is the musical sensation of the year in America and he will play with the Boston Symphony his own concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. This will be Rachmaninoff's first appearance in Buffalo.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS

PROVIDENCE, R.

JAN 29 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15. The soloist on this occasion will be Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, who is one of the best resident pianists we have in this country. He is chief instructor of the piano at the Peabody institute in Baltimore and has done a great deal of solo work throughout this country and Europe. The program will be announced later.

[112]

COMMERCIAL

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 29 1910

[illegible] program has been arranged [illegible] Fiedler, conductor of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, for its concert next [illegible] night in Convention Hall, introducing as soloist Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor. With the exception of the old romantic "Euryanthe" overture, by Weber, the works belong decidedly to the modern school. The program is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"..Weber
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 18 .....Rachmaninoff
a. "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," Act II .....Wagner
b. Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" .....Wagner

The two Russian works have never been played in Buffalo and they are important not merely because they represent two of the greatest names in Russian music, but because in themselves they are regarded as the best examples of Russian music.

"Scheherazade," a suite in four parts with solo violin—the violin characterizing Scheherazade, the narrator—is the most brilliant legacy left to us by Tschaikowsky's greatest successor. The first movement is entitled "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship"—our old friend, Sindbad, the sailor. The second is from one of the most amusing episodes in the whole collection, "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince." The third has to do with "The Young Prince and the Young Princess." The fourth movement and finale is made up of several stories beginning with the Festival at Bagdad and including one of Sindbad"s adventures, "The Ship," which went to pieces on a rock which is surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.

Sharply contrasted with this is Rachmaninoff's Concerto, which has the seriousness and the gray, gloomy colors which seem inevitably to characterize Russian music. Rachmaninoff, the composer, who by great good fortune has been secured as the soloist for the evening, is generally regarded today as the foremost of Russian composers and there are many who believe that the mantle of Tschaikowsky has fallen directly on his shoulders.

The concluding numbers on the program will be the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The First Established Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From

Address BUFFALO

Date JAN 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A beautiful programme has been arranged by Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its concert next Monday night in Convention Hall, introducing as soloist Sergi Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor. With the exception of the old romantic "Euryanthe" overture, by Weber, the works belong decidedly to the modern school. The programme is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphonic suite "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 18.....Rachmaninoff
(a) "Waldweben" from Siegfried" Act II.....Wagner
(b) Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"....Wagner

Busoni, who comes to Convention Hall on Friday evening, February 11th, gave his first New York recital in Carnegie Hall this week and the demonstration was overpowering, the audience refusing to leave the hall until the piano had been closed and moved away and Busoni's manager, Mr. Hanson, had announced that Busoni was no longer in the building. The New York Sun said of the recital:

"Mr. Busoni's technical equipment is something to throw the average pianist into despair and the student into a fervor of ambition."

Busoni's Buffalo recital is under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, to whom mail orders for seats may be sent, accompanied by check payable to her. They will be filled in advance of the public sale. The customary scale of prices will prevail.

EVENING NEWS

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 29 1910

COMING GREAT WEEK OF MUSIC IN BUFFALO

Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday —Saengerbund Concert on Wednesday —Busoni Recital on Friday—Fetrazzini at Shea's on Sunday.

Mendelssoln Choir of Toronto and Thomas Orchestra Have Superb Program. Concerts By Buffalo Artists and Plans for Church Music.

No greater event will occur in Buffalo's present musical season than the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening. The reputation of this great organization has grown far beyond national to being international, and none are more tireless in singing its praises than the most famous artists who have been associated with it, some of the most famous of the world's greatest conductors.

Max Fiedler, the present conductor, has arranged a program of extraordinary interest, only one number of which will be familiar to the audience. The principal orchestral work will be "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the last of that mighty group, among which was Tschaikowsky, that placed Russia in the foremost rank of modern music.

Many conneisseurs give to the soloist of the evening, Rachmaninoff, the place held in turn by Tschaikowski and Rimsky-Korsakoff as the greatest of living Russian composers. His visit to Buffalo is one of the red letter events in local musical history. He will play his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Orchestral numbers by Weber, overture to "Euranthe," and Wagner: "Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," complete the beautiful program.

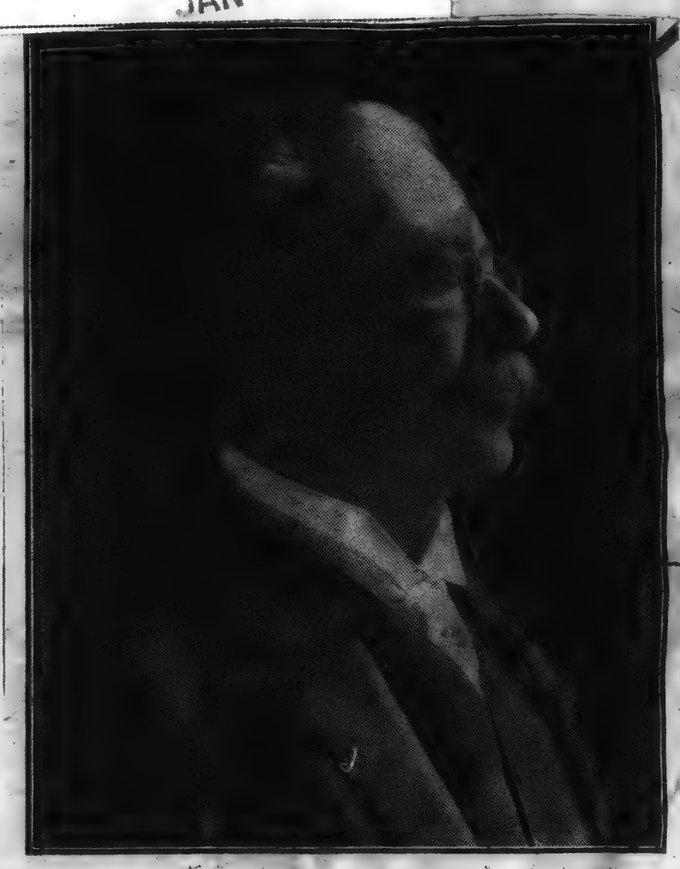
TETRAZZINI TO SING

The same violin was formerly used by Remenyi at his last concert prior to his death in San Francisco.

MORNING EXPRESS

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 30 1910



MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Convention Hall on January 31st.

TRUTH

From

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date JAN 28 1910

Next Monday evening, January 31st, brings the annual concert in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the sale of seats for the concert is now in progress at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Again this wonderful orchestra of Boston brings to Buffalo something unusual. Last year it presented as soloist Mischa Elman, the wonderful young Russian violinist, and this year it will present in Buffalo for the first time as soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who, at least since Rimsky-Korsakoff's death, is the greatest of the Russian composers and in the opinion of many, the mantle of Tschaikowsky has descended on his shoulders directly.

Rachmaninoff who has made so profound an impression throughout the East this year as a pianist, composer and conductor, will appear here as pianist, playing his own Second Concerto with which he has had such success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities earlier in the winter.

Again Mr. Fiedler, who made so favorable an impression on Buffalo last year, will lead Boston's Orchestra. The growth of his popularity in the East has been remarkable and today with the concert-going public of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, he has no rival. Never has the patronage given to the orchestra been so great as in this second year of his dispensation.

Not a little of Mr. Fiedler's popularity is due to his extraordinary skill in the making of programs. It is generally conceded that the only man who could be compared with him in this respect is the lamented Theodore Thomas who was a genius in program making. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for Buffalo is, with the exception of the first number, entirely modern. The first number will be Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Then will come Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," one of the most brilliant works in the literature of the orchestra and strongly in contrast with the other Russian work—Rachmaninoff's Concerto—which follows it. The last two numbers will be the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

MORNING EXPRESS

[illegible]ress Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible]e JAN 30 19

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall tomorrow evening is one of the gala events in Buffalo's entire musical season. The coming of this splendid organization is always something to anticipate with keenest pleasure, not only because of the wonderful work of the orchestra itself, but because the orchestra always offers something of particular fascination, either in programme or soloist or in both. This year the latter is the case. Max Fiedler, the conductor who made so profound an impression a year ago, when he first visited Buffalo, has arranged a programme of extraordinary interest, mainly composed of novelties. The programme is distinctly Russian in tone and this Russian element will be increased by the presence as soloist pianist, as well as a composer, of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who has been so conspicuous a figure in the world of music since his arrival in the United States last fall.

The principal orchestral work will be Scheherazade, a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Rimsky-Korsakoff died a year and a half ago and with him disappeared the last of that mighty group of men who placed Russia in the forerank of modern music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestral work is characterized by brilliancy of color and colossal skill of orchestration. If he does not sound the depths of emotion that Tschaikowsky did before him and Rachmaninoff has done since, he dazzles with the glitter of his orchestral effects and charms by his lovely melodies. His symphonic suite, as the name implies, is inspired by certain stories in that wonderful collection of Arabian folktales familiarly known as The Arabian Nights. It is in four parts; the first is entitled, The Sea and Sindbad's Ship; the second, The Story of the Kalendar-Prince; the third, The Young Prince and the Young Princess; and the fourth is a mosiac, made up of excerpts from various stories.

Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, was introduced to the larger cities of this country by means of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps no musician has ever visited this country who has made a deeper inpression on the musical public than this tall, unassuming Russian, who as a matter of fact looks more like a New England Yankee than he does like a typical Russian.

The full programme for tomorrow evening reads:

Overture to the opera Euryanthe.....Weber
Symphonic Suite Scheherazade, after The Thousand Nights and a Night..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 18 ..... Rachmaninoff
(a) Waldweben, from Siegfried, act II..... Wagner
(b) Prelude and Love Death, from Tristan and Isolde ..... Wagner

---

TIM[illegible]

n

ress BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 31 1910

FAMOUS ORCHESTRA HERE

Manager Ellis Accompanies the Boston Symphony Organization.

The 2 o'clock train from Boston this afternoon brought in the three extra sleepers loaded with a precious burden, 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the most famous organization of its kind in the world. Its annual concert in Buffalo is to take place in Convention Hall this evening and as soloist the orchestra brought with it Serger Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, who has been the sensation of the present musical season in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago. Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, came on yesterday, arriving last evening. With him were Mrs. Fiedler, the charming Englishwoman, who made so many friends here last year; Willy Hess, the great concertmaster of the orchestra, and Mr. Sauerquelle, the librarian.

The orchestra came in charge of Mr. William H. Brennan, its new assistant manager, who succeeded to the post last spring after the death of Mr. Comee, who had charge of the orchestra's tours for so many years. Moreover, for the first time in nearly 20 years C. A. Ellis, the manager, accompanies the orchestra on its Western trip. His name is one of the best known in the musical world.

The orchestra leaves Buffalo tomorrow morning for Detroit, where it plays tomorrow night. It brings with it all the famous artists who have done so much to make its name famous throughout the world. Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler and Mr. Hess, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan, are stopping at the Iroquois; the rest of the orchestra is at the Lafayette.

COMMERCIAL

[illegible]dress Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible]te FEB 8 - 1910

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past two seasons, has been re-engaged for the seasons of 1910 and 1911. This announcement follows Herr Fiedler's recent denial of a report that he was to conduct a symphony orchestra at Liverpool, England.

COMMERCIAL

[illegible]ress Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible]e JAN 31 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE.

Annual Concert Will Be Held This Evening in Convention Hall at 8.15 O'Clock.

Tonight brings the principal musical event of the year, the annual concert in Convention Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fielder, conconductor of the orchestra, accompanied by his wife and by Willy Hess, the concertmaster, arrived in Buffalo last evening, having made the day trip from Boston. The orchestra, some 80 strong, in charge of W. H. Brennan, the new assistant manager, arrived from Boston this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

With the orchestra also comes C. A. Ellis of Boston, who has been its manager since it was organized in 1881. The Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who is not only making his first appearance in Buffalo, but his last appearance in America tonight, accompanied the orchestra. Rachmaninoff is a tall man, considerably over six feet, gaunt and rough hewn and looks much more like a typical down east Yankee than a Russian. He has been the sensation of the present musical season. Arriving in America early in November he made his debut in the principal cities of the east as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no musician coming to America in recent years has received more enthusiastic and general praise from the critical press of the east. His music has been accepted as fine and sincere, and as a pianist he has easily been ranked with the greatest known.

This evening's concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock, and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated during the performance of a number.

MORNING EXPRESS

[illegible]m Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible]ress

[illegible]te FEB 13 19

[illegible]as been re-engaged for [illegible]years as conductor of the [113]

COMMERCIAL

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 29 1910

A beautiful program has been arranged by Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its concert next Monday night in Convention Hall, introducing as soloist Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor. With the exception of the old romantic "Euryanthe" overture, by Weber, the works belong decidedly to the modern school. The program is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"..Weber
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 18 .....Rachmaninoff
a. "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," Act II .....Wagner
b. Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" .....Wagner

The two Russian works have never been played in Buffalo and they are important not merely because they represent two of the greatest names in Russian music, but because in themselves they are regarded as the best examples of Russian music.

"Scheherazade," a suite in four parts with solo violin—the violin characterizing Scheherazade, the narrator—is the most brilliant legacy left to us by Tschaikowsky's greatest successor. The first movement is entitled "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship"—our old friend, Sindbad, the sailor. The second is from one of the most amusing episodes in the whole collection, "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince." The third has to do with "The Young Prince and the Young Princess." The fourth movement and finale is made up of several stories beginning with the Festival at Bagdad and including one of Sindbad"s adventures, "The Ship," which went to pieces on a rock which is surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.

Sharply contrasted with this is Rachmaninoff's Concerto, which has the seriousness and the gray, gloomy colors which seem inevitably to characterize Russian music. Rachmaninoff, the composer, who by great good fortune has been secured as the soloist for the evening, is generally regarded today as the foremost of Russian composers and there are many who believe that the mantle of Tschaikowsky has fallen directly on his shoulders.

The concluding numbers on the program will be the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

The First Established and Most Co... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the...

From ..... BUFFALO, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... JAN 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A beautiful programme has been arranged by Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its concert next Monday night in Convention Hall, introducing as soloist Sergi Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, pianist and conductor. With the exception of the old romantic "Euryanthe" overture, by Weber, the works belong decidedly to the modern school. The programme is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphonic suite "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 18.....Rachmaninoff
(a) "Waldweben" from Siegfried" Act II.....Wagner
(b) Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Busoni, who comes to Convention Hall on Friday evening, February 11th, gave his first New York recital in Carnegie Hall this week and the demonstration was overpowering, the audience refusing to leave the hall until the piano had been closed and moved away and Busoni's manager, Mr. Hanson, had announced that Busoni was no longer in the building. The New York Sun said of the recital:

"Mr. Busoni's technical equipment is something to throw the average pianist into despair and the student into a fervor of ambition."

Busoni's Buffalo recital is under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, to whom mail orders for seats may be sent, accompanied by check payable to her. They will be filled in advance of the public sale. The customary scale of prices will prevail.

---

1 ..... MORNING EXPRESS

ess ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

EVENING NEWS

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 29 1910

COMING GREAT WEEK OF MUSIC IN BUFFALO

Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday —Saengerbund Concert on Wednesday —Busoni Recital on Friday—Fetrazzini at Shea's on Sunday.

Mendelssoln Choir of Toronto and Thomas Orchestra Have Superb Program. Concerts By Buffalo Artists and Plans for Church Music.

No greater event will occur in Buffalo's present musical season than the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening. The reputation of this great organization has grown far beyond national to being international, and none are more tireless in singing its praises than the most famous artists who have been associated with it, some of the most famous of the world's greatest conductors.

Max Fiedler, the present conductor, has arranged a program of extraordinary interest, only one number of which will be familiar to the audience. The principal orchestral work will be "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the last of that mighty group, among which was Tschaikowsky, that placed Russia in the forerank of modern music.

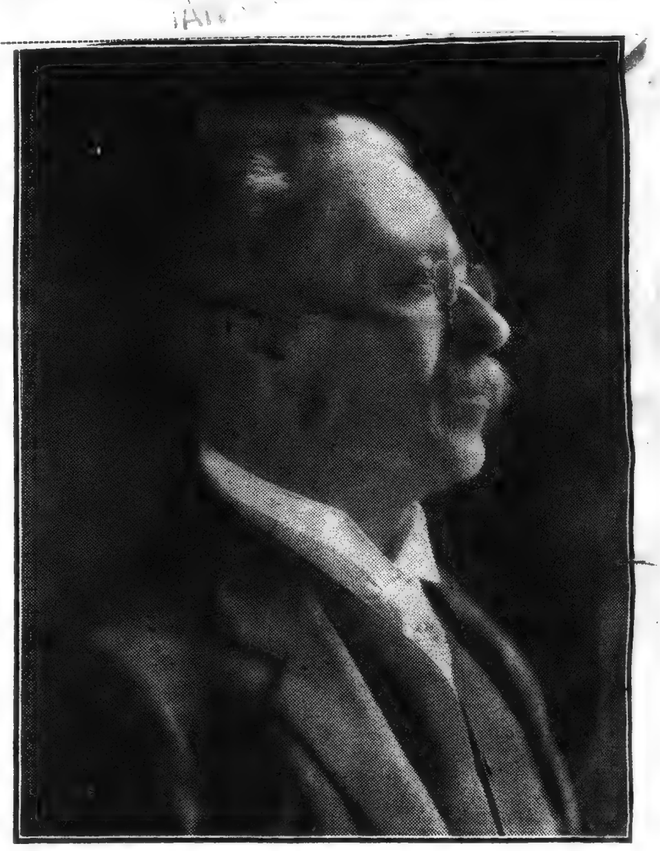
Many conneiseurs give to the soloist of the evening, Rachmaninoff, the place held in turn by Tschaikowski and Rimsky-Korsakoff as the greatest of living Russian composers. His visit to Buffalo is one of the red letter events in local musical history. He will play his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Orchestral numbers by Weber, overture to "Euranthe," and Wagner; "Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," complete the beautiful program.

TETRAZZINI TO SING

The same violin was formerly used by Remenyi at his last concert prior to his death in San Francisco.

MORNING EXPRESS

Buffalo, N. Y.



MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Convention Hall on January 31st.

TRUTH

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Next Monday evening, January 31st, brings the annual concert in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the sale of seats for the concert is now in progress at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Again this wonderful orchestra of Boston brings to Buffalo something unusual. Last year it presented as soloist Mischa Elman, the wonderful young Russian violinist, and this year it will present in Buffalo for the first time as soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who, at least since Rimsky-Korsakoff's death, is the greatest of the Russian composers and in the opinion of many, the mantle of Tschaikowsky has descended on his shoulders directly.

Rachmaninoff who has made so profound an impression throughout the East this year as a pianist, composer and conductor, will appear here as pianist, playing his own Second Concerto with which he has had such success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities earlier in the winter.

Again Mr. Fiedler, who made so favorable an impression on Buffalo last year, will lead Boston's Orchestra. The growth of his popularity in the East has been remarkable and today with the concert-going public of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, he has no rival. Never has the patronage given to the orchestra been so great as in this second year of his dispensation.

Not a little of Mr. Fiedler's popularity is due to his extraordinary skill in the making of programs. It is generally conceded that the only man who could be compared with him in this respect is the lamented Theodore Thomas who was a genius in program making. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for Buffalo is, with the exception of the first number, entirely modern. The first number will be Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Then will come Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," one of the most brilliant works in the literature of the orchestra and strongly in contrast with the other Russian work—Rachmaninoff's Concerto—which follows it. The last two numbers will be the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

---

e .....

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall tomorrow evening is one of the gala events in Buffalo's entire musical season. The coming of this splendid organization is always something to anticipate with keenest pleasure, not only because of the wonderful work of the orchestra itself, but because the orchestra always offers something of particular fascination, either in programme or soloist or in both. This year the latter is the case. Max Fiedler, the conductor who made so profound an impression a year ago, when he first visited Buffalo, has arranged a programme of extraordinary interest, mainly composed of novelties. The programme is distinctly Russian in tone and this Russian element will be increased by the presence as soloist pianist, as well as a composer, of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who has been so conspicuous a figure in the world of music since his arrival in the United States last fall.

The principal orchestral work will be Scheherazade, a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Rimsky-Korsakoff died a year and a half ago and with him disappeared the last of that mighty group of men who placed Russia in the forerank of modern music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestral work is characterized by brilliancy of color and colossal skill of orchestration. If he does not sound the depths of emotion that Tschaikowsky did before him and Rachmaninoff has done since, he dazzles with the glitter of his orchestral effects and charms by his lovely melodies. His symphonic suite, as the name implies, is inspired by certain stories in that wonderful collection of Arabian folktales familiarly known as The Arabian Nights. It is in four parts; the first is entitled, The Sea and Sindbad's Ship; the second, The Story of the Kalendar-Prince; the third, The Young Prince and the Young Princess; and the fourth is a mosiac, made up of excerpts from various stories.

Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, was introduced to the larger cities of this country by means of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps no musician has ever visited this country who has made a deeper inpression on the musical public than this tall, unassuming Russian, who as a matter of fact looks more like a New England Yankee than he does like a typical Russian.

The full programme for tomorrow evening reads:

Overture to the opera Euryanthe.....Weber
Symphonic Suite Scheherazade, after The Thousand Nights and a Night..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 18 ..... Rachmaninoff
(a) Waldweben, from Siegfried, act II.... Wagner
(b) Prelude and Love Death, from Tristan and Isolde ..... Wagner

---

n .....

ress .....

FAMOUS ORCHESTRA HERE

Manager Ellis Accompanies the Boston Symphony Organization.

The 2 o'clock train from Boston this afternoon brought in the three extra sleepers loaded with a precious burden, 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the most famous organization of its kind in the world. Its annual concert in Buffalo is to take place in Convention Hall this evening and as soloist the orchestra brought with it Serger Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, who has been the sensation of the present musical season in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago. Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, came on yesterday, arriving last evening. With him were Mrs. Fiedler, the charming Englishwoman, who made so many friends here last year; Willy Hess, the great concertmaster of the orchestra, and Mr. Sauerquelle, the librarian.

The orchestra came in charge of Mr. William H. Brennan, its new assistant manager, who succeeded to the post last spring after the death of Mr. Comee, who had charge of the orchestra's tours for so many years. Moreover, for the first time in nearly 20 years C. A. Ellis, the manager, accompanies the orchestra on its Western trip. His name is one of the best known in the musical world.

The orchestra leaves Buffalo tomorrow morning for Detroit, where it plays tomorrow night. It brings with it all the famous artists who have done so much to make its name famous throughout the world. Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler and Mr. Hess, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Brennan, are stopping at the Iroquois; the rest of the orchestra is at the Lafayette.

---

m ..... COMMERCIAL dress ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

te ..... FEB 8 - 1910

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past two seasons, has been re-engaged for the seasons of 1910 and 1911. This announcement follows Herr Fiedler's recent denial of a report that he was to conduct a symphony orchestra at Liverpool, England.

---

m ..... COMMERCIAL

lress ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE.

Annual Concert Will Be Held This Evening in Convention Hall at 8.15 O'Clock.

Tonight brings the principal musical event of the year, the annual concert in Convention Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fielder, conconductor of the orchestra, accompanied by his wife and by Willy Hess, the concertmaster, arrived in Buffalo last evening, having made the day trip from Boston. The orchestra, some 80 strong, in charge of W. H. Brennan, the new assistant manager, arrived from Boston this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

With the orchestra also comes C. A. Ellis of Boston, who has been its manager since it was organized in 1881. The Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who is not only making his first appearance in Buffalo, but his last appearance in America tonight, accompanied the orchestra. Rachmaninoff is a tall man, considerably over six feet, gaunt and rough hewn and looks much more like a typical down east Yankee than a Russian. He has been the sensation of the present musical season. Arriving in America early in November he made his debut in the principal cities of the east as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no musician coming to America in recent years has received more enthusiastic and general praise from the critical press of the east. His music has been accepted as fine and sincere, and as a pianist he has easily been ranked with the greatest known.

This evening's concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock, and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated during the performance of a number.

---

m ..... MORNING EXPRESS

dress ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

te .....

...er has been re-engaged for ...wo years as conductor of the ...Orchestra.

---

[113]

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

Tomorrow night brings the culminating point of Buffalo's musical career, the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall at 8:15 o'clock. The coming of this splendid organization is always an event worth waiting twelve months for, not only because it gives one the opportunity of hearing the wondrously beautiful tone quality which seems to be its unique possession, but something is always offered to Buffalo by the orchestra beyond itself, either in programme or soloist or in both, and this year the latter is the case. Max Fiedler, the conductor, who made so profound an impression a year ago when he first visited Buffalo, has arranged a programme of extraordinary interest for this concert, for it may be said that there is only one number on it which will be familiar to the audience. The programme, so far as its two principal works are concerned, is distinctly Russian in tone, and this Russian element will be increased by the presence as solo pianist, as well as composer, of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who has been cutting so much of a figure in the American world of music since his arrival in the United States early last November.

The principal orchestral work will be "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Rimsky-Korsakoff died a year and a half ago and with him disappeared the last of that mighty group of men that placed Russia in the forerank of modern music. Of these the greatest was Tschaikowsky, but close after him followed Rimsky-Korsakoff, and it is an interesting fact that connoisseurs in particular and the world in general give to the soloist of the evening, Rachmaninoff, the place held in turn by Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff as the greatest of living Russian composers.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestral work is characterized by brilliancy of color and colossal skill of orchestration. If he does not sound the depths of emotion that Tschaikowsky did before him and Rachmaninoff has done since, he dazzles with the glitter of his orchestral effects and charms by the melodiousness of his tunes. His symphonic suite, as the name implies, is inspired by certain stories in that wonderful collection of Arabian folk-tales entitled "The Thousand Nights and a Night," more familiarly known as "The Arabian Nights." It is in four parts; the first is entitled "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" the second "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince;" the third, "The Young Prince and the Young Princess." and the fourth is a Mosaic, made up of excerpts from various stories.

Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, was introduced to the larger cities of this country by means of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one need not exaggerate by saying that no musician has ever visited this country who has made a deeper impression on the musical public than this tall, simple-mannered, unassuming Russian, who as a matter of fact looks much more like a New England Yankee than he does like a typical Russian. Rachmaninoff is a great composer; he has shown himself to be a great conductor; and unlike most great composers, he is a truly great pianist. He has an enormous technique of which he is so thoroughly a master that one forgets the wonders he performs with his fingers and wrists. He is the possessor of a tone of luscious quality and he has a personality which fascinates an audience immediately. At least, that has been true wherever he has played so far. He will play his own Second Concerto for piano and orchestra.

The other numbers on the programme will be the ever welcome "Euryanthe" overture, by Weber; the "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried" and the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, op 18 .....Rachmaninoff
(a) "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Act II. .....Wagner
(b) Prelude and "Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Soloist—Sergei Rachmaninoff.

—Photo by Garo.

MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. This peerless organization will be heard at Convention Hall tomorrow evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JAN 31 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighty strong, arrived in Buffalo today in three special Pullmans from Boston. Tonight it gives its annual concert in Convention Hall, and the event will be more than ordinarily notable in that it will introduce as soloist the great Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who arrived in the city on the same train.

Bostons great orchestra devotes but one week out of the thirty of its season to its Western trip. With the orchestra came all of its famous members, Willy Hess, the concert master; Sylvian Noack, its second concert master; Emil Ferir, its leading viola; Heinrich Warnke, its leading 'cello; Longy, the greatest oboe; Maquarre, its first flute; Grisez, its leading clarionette; Sadony, its first bassoone; Max Hess and George Wendler, its wonderful horns.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IS ON TONIGHT

Advance Guard Arrives—Rest Coming Today.

The first installment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived at the Iroquois last evening in Mr. and Mrs. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra; Willy Hess, the concert master, and John Sauerquell, the librarian. They left Boston yesterday morning ahead of the orchestra, which does not arrive until this afternoon at 2 o'clock. They came this early for two reasons: Mr. Fiedler does not like to travel at night, and, moreover, he wishes never to lose an opportunity to see Niagara Falls. Last year he visited the falls and this year he is sorely disappointed that the soft weather of the last week or so has destroyed hope of seeing an ice bridge.

Speaking of the programme for the concert this evening, Mr. Fiedler called attention to the fact that the two principal works are Russian. They are also representative of the greatest Russian composers since Tschaikowsky. Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose Symphonic Suite Scherherazade is the principal orchestral work on the programme, was, in Mr. Fiedler's opinion, one of the greatest masters of orchestration the world has ever known.

Mr. Fiedler said that he was greatly interested in Rachmanioff, the composer, who is to appear this evening with the orchestra in the dual capacity of composer and pianist, for he is to play his own concerto for piano. Mr. Fiedler regards him as one of the greatest of living composers, and as an executive artist he has a magnetism which wins for him the sympathy of an audience at once.

The rest of the orchestra, eighty strong, are due to arrive from Boston this afternoon at two o'clock, and with them will come Charles A. Ellis, who has been the manager of the orchestra since its organization, twenty-nine years ago. With it also will come its new assistant manager, William H. Heinman, who is an old Buffalonian. The orchestra will leave tomorrow morning over the Michigan Central for Detroit.

Tonight's concert at Convention Hall begins at 8:15 o'clock.

COMMERCIAL

Buffalo, N. Y.

FEB 1 - 1910

ENTHRALLING MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Excellent Program at Convention Hall.

RACHMANINOFF FINE.

Created an Exceptional Furore With His Masterful Performance—Fiedler is a Great Conductor.

The annual concert in Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Convention Hall last evening, and a large audience was on hand to greet Max Fiedler and his fine body of musicians. The music-loving people of Buffalo were aware that the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is one of the most enjoyable musical treats of the season, and the appreciation of the efforts of these well-drilled musicians was amply demonstrated by hearty applause after each number.

In flight of fancy, in poetry of conception, Fiedler is among the foremost of orchestra conductors. His subtle magnetism appeals alike to orchestra and audience. He has absolute control of the orchestra at all times, and his fine artistic reading and intellectual treatment of the different works afforded the deepest pleasure to all who were present.

The program contained two new Russian compositions, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and a pianoforte concerto by Rachmaninoff.

The symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," is a composition of intrinsic worth; it reveals decided creative talent, structural excellence and a high degree of skill in manipulating the orchestra. Fiedler gave an ideal performance of the novelty and helped it to a very fair success.

The first movement contains original melodies for the solo violin and 'cello, which in turn are taken up by the flute, oboe and clarinet. In the second movement the melody goes from the strings to the wood-wind and soon it is taken up by the trombones and trumpets. The third movement is a beautiful singing melody of folk-song character. The orchestra played this movement with a wealth of feeling and the pathos of the sad, heavenly melody made a deep impression. The last part of the suite is highly original and the daringly effective orchestration is characteristic of this great Russian tone-poet. Never will the swash and sonorous heaving of waves be painted in tone with a greater sympathy than Rimsky-Korsakoff has attained in his "Scheherezade."

The program was opened with an admirable reading of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." The other numbers were "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Both were magnificently played.

Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer-pianist, was the soloist at this concert and he played his own concerto in C minor with great aplomb and verve, magnificent tone, and abundant technical finish. His success was immense. Rachmaninoff is a complete master of the piano; he combines a beautiful and big tone with a brilliant technique, thus ranking him as a virtuoso among the most prominent pianists of the present age. He has great impressive power and his charming personality added greatly to his success. No soloist of the present season has achieved anything that approaches his success. He had to acknowledge the overwhelming applause many times.

Rachmaninoff's concerto, heard for the first time in Buffalo last night, is decided in originality, and it possesses elements of real musical power. The composer-pianist gave a fine rendering of the work and he was excellently well supported by the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 1- 1910

GRAND TRIUMPH BY BOSTON SYMPHONY AND RACHMANIOFI

Marvelous Musical Splendor and Mastery of Voice Thrilled Great Audience at Convention Hall—Mr Fiedler's Direction Masterful.

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at once received their welcome, a warmly appreciative one, when they appeared last night at Convention Hall, under the local management of Mrs. Mae Davis Smith. Clearly both conductor and orchestra were in the mood to respond, for the brilliantly sonorous and finely balanced performance of Weber's highly dramatic overture to the opera "Euryanthe," which opened the program, was ample reason for a renewal of the thunderous applause which came from a vast crowd. The marvelous symphonic suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), by Rimsky-Korsakoff, gave no less pleasure.

Throughout this masterpiece of flaming instrumental splendor, Mr. Fiedler was in his most characteristic vigorous form. His gestures made visible all the eager impulses that were the composer's as well as his own. Just as surely was the orchestra alert to his energetic precision in the sustained and sensuous prelude through to the final tonal tragedy of the wreck of the ship against the rock. This was so vivid, so full of passion, that the audience leaned forward, breathless, to catch every tone, stirring perceptibly to the temperament of the conductor.

The soloist was Sergei Rachnamioff. He mastered the composer, the orchestra, the instrument and his audience by a dynamo of power seldom witnessed.

The program closed with Wagner's "Life and Stir of the Forest" and "Love Death," from Tristan and Isolde. The music of this last blazes with pictorial fires.

om COURIER

dress Buffalo, N. Y.

ite 1910

In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Mr. Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fiedler or Dr. Muck been even considered.

MORNING EXPRESS

Buffalo, N. Y.

FEB 1- 191

RUSSIAN AIRS PLEASED ALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra scores gratifying Success.

RACHMANINOFF, TOO

Pianist of great Virtuosity and artistic Ability.

One of the gala musical events to which Buffalo looks forward each season, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, took place last evening in Convention Hall. That Buffalonians appreciated and enjoyed the rare musical treat was proved by the very large audience present and the ovations with which the achievements of Mr. Fiedler, his players and the assisting soloist were greeted.

The programme contained Weber's Euryanthe, the overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, Scheherazade; Waldweben, from Siegfried, and the Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde. Of special interest was the Russian suite, founded upon stories from the Arabian Nights. It was given last evening for the first time in its entirety in this city, although the third movement of the suite was played a few seasons ago by the Pittsburg Orchestra, under Mr. Paur.

The first three numbers in the Scheherazade suite are named, respectively, The Sea and Sindbad's Ship, Story of the Calendar Prince, The Young Prince and Princess; the fourth is a mosaic, describing especially the wreck of the ship. Rimsky-Korsakoff, was in his later life music inspector of the Russian fleet, with the rank of admiral, and he knew every phase of the sea. It is not strange, therefore, that his tone picture of the waves and the vessel gliding over its surface should be one of particular beauty and effectiveness. The rippling of the harp and the beautiful motive of the woodwind and 'cellos above it formed one of the most lovely passages of a series of beautiful phrases.

The audience showed especial appreciation of the third movement, one of greater simplicity than the other numbers. The entire suite was marked by a gorgeousness of orchestration and a richness of harmony that gave it irresistible fascination. Both the intrisic beauty of the music and the manner of its performance held the absorbed attention of the listeners, and Mr. Fiedler was male to boy his acknowledgments many times at its close before the applause subsided.

The tonal quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so lovely that whatever the orchestra plays is delightful. Mr. Fiedler's readings are always sane, conservative and thoroughly musical. He does not raise into distinct prominence the inner melodic voices, as do some of his colleagues in the field of directing, and sometimes the musical listener longs for greater stress on the unyielding melodies, but all the essentials of beautiful orchestral work are present in the playing of the men under Mr. Fiedler's baton.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer, conductor and pianist, was the soloist. He appeared as the player of his own second concerto for piano, in C minor. His manly, strong and unaffected personality won the favor of the audiance at once, and his artistic ability aroused heartiest admiration. He proved to be a pianist of solid attainments, with fine depth and beauty of tone, and a technique adequate to all demands upon it.

His concerto showed that he has greater instinct for harmony than for melody, at least, that was the impression made at first hearing. Though the work is very rich and full in its harmonies and orchestral scoring, the themes of the concerto do not impress one as being particularly spontaneous or beautiful. In the last movement, a tremendous exhibition of virtuosity was given by the player, and he was recalled many times at its close. Mr. Fiedler provided a finely balanced and discreet accompaniment for the soloist.

M. M. H.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

FEB 1-

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND RACHMANINOFF

Marvelous Beauty and Clarity of Tone Too Heavenly for Words.

DYNAMIC POWER OF RUSSIAN PIANIST EXCELS ROSENTHAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, furnished the greatest treat of the musical season at Convention Hall last evening before an audience that filled the building to the doors and which sat spellbound under the influence of the glorious programme rendered by both orchestra and soloist. Under the able direction of Max Fiedler, the orchestra played with splendid nobility and poise, and his reading of every number was that of the great musician whose reverance for his art was the dominant feature in his conducting.

The opening number was the brilliant overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber, which was characterized by a splendid distinctness of detail and outline. The extraordinary demands made upon the different instruments produced effects that stood forth with marvelous beauty and clarity of tone, and the exquisite harmonies arranged for the strings alone were heavenly beyond description.

The Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, served to bring out the full resources of the orchestra, and this oriental work, almost barbaric at times, riotous with color and sensuous melody, and again, delicate and poetic, offered in its four movements a series of tonal pictures of infinite beauty. The applause that greeted its close was so long that Mr. Fiedler and the members of his orchestra were obliged to bow their acknowledgements before the audience could be quieted.

Two Wagner numbers were a fitting close to the magnificent programme, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II, being superbly played, while the haunting music of the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," was given a matchless interpretation.

Widespread interest was felt in the first appearance in Buffalo of the famous Russian pianist, Rachmaninoff, who took his audience by storm, playing with the orchestra his own Concerto Op. 18. This wonderfully endowed young artist is a veritable Titan at the piano. He possesses all the dynamic power of Rosenthal and seems to excel all others who have gone before him. His is a talent so stupendous that he carries in him resources that respond readily to all the varying moods of the music, while he reveals the most dazzling technic and threads the amazing difficulties of a work with the utmost ease.

The sounding of the first clarion note in the first movement chained the attention of his audience, and the dramatic intensity of the entire movement carried his hearers along with him, leaving them breathless with amazement at the mastery of his instrument. Equally compelling was he in the Adagio, a ravishing melody, while the mighty, insurpassable brilliancy of his genius illumined the charming Allegro Scherzando of the last movement. At its close he was given an ovation seldom accorded any artist in Buffalo. The hall rang with applause and the eminent pianist was compelled to return innumerable times to bow his acknowledgments. Last evening marked the close of Rachmaninoff's American tour. He sails at once for Russia.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Ko

From TIMES

Address ALBANY, N. Y.

Date FEB

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seats are selling in the Albany stor of Cluett and Sons for the concert o the Boston Symphony Orchestra t be given in Music hall, Troy, nex Monday evening, and selling rapidly A host of Albany music lovers will attend the event, the number being constantly increased. It is hardly necessary to call attention to this event, the simple announcement that the Boston Symphony is coming conveying the importance of the occasion. The pleasure of the evening will be greatly enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Samaroff, and in fact the whole evening will be a memorable one.

From TRUTH.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date FEB 5- 1910

It would seem that everything had been said of Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony concert given under his direction at Convention Hall on Monday night, but of the wonderful creative genius and mastering of the piano, Rachmaninoff, the soloist on that occasion, the half has not been told. The audience was completely overwhelmed by the tremendous strength and brilliancy of his performance and his reappearance in concert is certain to draw a full house as he left a hungry audience when he bowed his farewell acknowledgements on Monday night.

Buffalo-[illegible]

FEB 1- 1910

Boston Symphony A Musical Treat

One of the treats of the musical season was furnished at Convention Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff. The vast audience filled the building to the doors. The concert was under the direction of Max Fiedler who revealed the great musician's artistic reverence for his art. The brilliant overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber, was the opening number, followed by the Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Two Wagner numbers were a fitting close to the magnificent programme, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II, being superbly played, while the haunting music of the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," was given a matchless interpretation.

Much interest was felt in the first appearance in Buffalo of the Russian pianist Rachmaninoff who played his own concerto op. 18 with the orchestra.

The sounding of the first clarion note in the first movement chained the attention of his audience, and the dramatic intensity of the entire movement carried his hearers along with him, leaving them breathless with amazement at the mastery of his instrument. Equally compelling was he in the Adagio, a ravishing melody, while the mighty, insurpassable brilliancy of his genius illumined the charming Allegro Scherzando of the last movement. At its close he was given an ovation seldom accorded any artist in Buffalo. The hall rang with applause and the eminent pianist was compelled to return innumerable times to bow his acknowledgments. Last evening marked the close of Rachmaninoff's American tour. He sails at once for Russia.

From TIMES

Address TROY, N. Y.

Date JAN 22

—In giving Trojans another opportunity to enjoy the great Boston Symphony Orchestra Ben Franklin will incidentally introduce to local music-lovers the fourth conductor since he has been giving these famous concerts. At the first concert by the orchestra under Mr. Franklin's local management, Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor. At a later concert of the orchestra Willy Hess, concert meister of the orchestra, conducted, Mr. Gericke being ill, and gave a memorable performance. At the last performance by the organization the conductor was the great Dr. Karl Muck, who had to return to Germany by demand of the Emperor, and at the concert to be given in Music Hall Monday evening, February 7, Mr. Franklin will introduce Max Fiedler, the present eminent conductor. Much interest centres in the appearance of Mr. Fiedler on account of his pronounced success in other cities. The soloist at the concert will be Mme. Samaroff, one of the most proficient pianists of the day.

From TIMES

Address TROY, N.

Date FEB 5

—Monday night will be notable in the local musical history of the season, as it is then that the most famous orchestra in all the world—the Boston Symphony—and one of the most brilliant pianists, Mme. Samaroff, together with the distinguished conductor, Max Fiedler, will give at Music Hall the long awaited concert. Music lovers for miles around will be in attendance at this musical feast, and the audience will be one of great brilliance and size. Last year when it was announced that Boston was to have a new opera house and a permanent opera of its own, great sympathy was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra because nearly everybody thought that this opera would flourish at the expense of the orchestra. This feeling grew stronger when the enormous subscription for the new opera became known, and when the time came for the annual auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts in Boston there was great anxiety on the part of the friends of the organization lest there should be a great slump from the sales of preceding years. But once again the orchestra showed the firm hold it had on the affections of the Boston public. Instead of a decrease, the sale showed a very considerable increase over those of last year.

TROY, N. Y.

FEB 7- 1910

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in concert at Music hall to-night with Olga Samaroff, the pianist, as soloist. The demand for seats has been so large that to-day reservations are being made in the gallery. The concert will be the star event of the musical season in this section of the country, and a rare treat. The orchestra is simply incomparable, while Mme. Samaroff occupies a place among the greatest pianists of the world.

EVENING NEWS

Buffalo, N. Y.

FEB 1- 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SUPERB PROGRAM

Famous Orchestra Led by Max Fiedler Evokes Storm of Applause from Vast Audience

ROCHMANINOFF IS ACCORDED OVATION

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its annual Buffalo concert last night in Convention Hall before an audience which in point of size and appreciation did full honor to the notable event.

Conductor Fiedler's program was most delightful, offering as it did such variety of composition, each so compelling and individual in its interest. It began with Weber's overture to Euryanthe, a work that glows with poetry and enchantment and in which the wonderful powers of the composer in imaginative insight and supremely beautiful orchestral writing are found to an unsurpassed degree. Mr. Fiedler conducted this with a warmth of feeling and enthusiasm for the music that communicated itself to his audience and brought immense applause for the performance.

Vivid Scheherazade.

Scheherazade, a symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was a work that showed the virtuosity of the orchestra and the masterly qualities of Mr. Fiedler. It is program music of the most vivid type, nowhere deeply emotional but of intense interest and might be an exposition of the powers of an orchestra, so abounding is it in searching, poignant and effectual expression.

The Scheherazado motive, which is played by solo violin, opens the first movement which is full of the wave motion of the sea and is heard again in the second, the "Story of the Kalandar-Prince," where there are passages for wood-wind instruments that are as definite and vivid as speech. The third movement is simple, easily followed, being built on a broad melodic strain. The last movement, "Festival at Bagdad," and destruction at sea, is the climax of the composer's remarkable genius for orchestral resource and power of rythmic and thematic elaboration. A brilliant, incisive and colorful performance was given this work that aroused a storm of applause.

A great event of the evening was the first appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who played his own second concerto for piano.

Rachmaninoff Triumphed.

Mr. Rachmaninoff is today one of the most distinguished of the modern Russian school, which is associated the world over with Tschaikowsky. He has written in all the larger forms and while his writing is permeated with the common Russian characteristic of melancholy, he has a style of musical speech that are individual and unique. His second concerto is a most genial work, full of dignity and an impressive quality of earnestness.

The pianist's manner of performance bears the stamp of sincerity and loftiness of spirit absorbed to self-forgetfulness in his task as interpreter. Such qualities are too rare and powerful not to irresistibly impress, and the reception given Mr. Rachmaninoff last night was a repetition of every other since his appearance in America. Numberless recalls brought the famous composer forward.

The concert closed with performances of the "Waldweben," from Siegfried, and the prelude and "Love Death," from Tristan and Isolde, of which the latter was a revelation of Mr. Fiedler's qualities of expressiveness, illumination of poetic beauty and large field of sympathy, all of which were reflected in the delicacy and splendor of tone and sensitiveness of response of the orchestra on which he played as an instrument.

The beautiful concert was under the local management of Mrs. Mal Davis Smith.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

CLEVELAND, O.

JAN 28 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cleveland with Max Fiedler, its conductor, Wednesday, February 2, for its only appearance this season. This orchestra is the first and most successfully subsidized organization of its kind in this country.

[115]

MORNING EXPRESS
Buffalo, N. Y.
FEB 1- 191

RUSSIAN AIRS PLEASED ALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra scores gratifying Success.

RACHMANINOFF, TOO

Pianist of great Virtuosity and artistic Ability.

One of the gala musical events to which Buffalo looks forward each season, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, took place last evening in Convention Hall. That Buffalonians appreciated and enjoyed the rare musical treat was proved by the very large audience present and the ovations with which the achievements of Mr. Fiedler, his players and the assisting soloist were greeted.

The programme contained Weber's Euryanthe, the overture; Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, Scheherazade; Waldweben, from Siegfried, and the Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde. Of special interest was the Russian suite, founded upon stories from the Arabian Nights. It was given last evening for the first time in its entirety in this city, although the third movement of the suite was played a few seasons ago by the Pittsburg Orchestra, under Mr. Paur.

The first three numbers in the Scheherazade suite are named, respectively, The Sea and Sindbad's Ship, Story of the Calendar Prince, The Young Prince and Princess; the fourth is a mosaic, describing especially the wreck of the ship. Rimsky-Korsakoff, was in his later life music inspector of the Russian fleet, with the rank of admiral, and he knew every phase of the sea. It is not strange, therefore, that his tone picture of the waves and the vessel gliding over its surface should be one of particular beauty and effectiveness. The rippling of the harp and the beautiful motive of the woodwind and 'cellos above it formed one of the most lovely passages of a series of beautiful phrases.

The audience showed especial appreciation of the third movement, one of greater simplicity than the other numbers. The entire suite was marked by a gorgeousness of orchestration and a richness of harmony that gave it irresistible fascination. Both the intrisic beauty of the music and the manner of its performance held the absorobed attention of the listeners, and Mr. Fiedler was male to boy his acknowledgments many times at its close before the applause subsided.

The tonal quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so lovely that whatever the orchestra plays is delightful. Mr. Fiedler's readings are always sane, conservative and thoroughly musical. He does not raise into distinct prominence the inner melodic voices, as do some of his colleagues in the field of directing, and sometimes the musical listener longs for greater stress on the underlying melodies, but all the essentials of beautiful orchestral work are present in the playing of the men under Mr. Fiedler's baton.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer, conductor and pianist, was the soloist. He appeared as the player of his own second concerto for piano, in C minor. His manly, strong and unaffected personality won the favor of the audience at once, and his artistic ability aroused heartiest admiration. He proved to be a pianist of solid attainments, with fine depth and beauty of tone, and a technique adequate to all demands upon it.

His concerto showed that he has greater instinct for harmony than for melody, at least, that was the impression made at first hearing. Though the work is very rich and full in its harmonies and orchestral scoring, the themes of the concerto do not impress one as being particularly spontaneous or beautiful. In the last movement, a tremendous exhibition of virtuosity was given by the player, and he was recalled many times at its close. Mr. Fiedler provided a finely balanced and discreet accompaniment for the soloist.

M. M. H.

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

It would seem that everything had been said of Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony concert given under his direction at Convention Hall on Monday night, but of the wonderful creative genius and mastering of the piano, Rachmaninoff, the soloist on that occasion, the half has not been told. The audience was completely overwhelmed by the tremendous strength and brilliancy of his performance and his reappearance in concert is certain to draw a full house as he left a hungry audience when he bowed his farewell acknowledgements on Monday night.

COURIER
Buffalo, N. Y.
FEB 1-

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND RACHMANINOFF

Marvelous Beauty and Clarity of Tone Too Heavenly for Words.

DYNAMIC POWER OF RUSSIAN PIANIST EXCELS ROSENTHAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, furnished the greatest treat of the musical season at Convention Hall last evening before an audience that filled the building to the doors and which sat spellbound under the influence of the glorious programme rendered by both orchestra and soloist. Under the able direction of Max Fiedler, the orchestra played with splendid nobility and poise, and his reading of every number was that of the great musician whose reverence for his art was the dominant feature in his conducting.

The opening number was the brilliant overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber, which was characterized by a splendid distinctness of detail and outline. The extraordinary demands made upon the different instruments produced effects that stood forth with marvelous beauty and clarity of tone, and the exquisite harmonies arranged for the strings alone were heavenly beyond description.

The Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, served to bring out the full resources of the orchestra, and this oriental work, almost barbaric at times, riotous with color and sensuous melody, and again, delicate and poetic, offered in its four movements a series of tonal pictures of infinite beauty. The applause that greeted its close was so long that Mr. Fiedler and the members of his orchestra were obliged to bow their acknowledgements before the audience could be quieted.

Two Wagner numbers were a fitting close to the magnificent programme, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II, being superbly played, while the haunting music of the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," was given a matchless interpretation.

Widespread interest was felt in the first appearance in Buffalo of the famous Russian pianist, Rachmaninoff, who took his audience by storm, playing with the orchestra his own Concerto Op. 18. This wonderfully endowed young artist is a veritable Titan at the piano. He possesses all the dynamic power of Rosenthal and seems to excel all others who have gone before him. His is a talent so stupendous that he carries in him resources that respond readily to all the varying moods of the music, while he reveals the most dazzling technic and threads the amazing difficulties of a work with the utmost ease.

The sounding of the first clarion note in the first movement chained the attention of his audience, and the dramatic intensity of the entire movement carried his hearers along with him, leaving them breathless with amazement at the mastery of his instrument. Equally compelling was he in the Adagio, a ravishing melody, while the mighty, insurpassable brilliancy of his genius illumined the charming Allegro Scherzando of the last movement. At its close he was given an ovation seldom accorded any artist in Buffalo. The hall rang with applause and the eminent pianist was compelled to return innumerable times to bow his acknowledgements. Last evening marked the close of Rachmaninoff's American tour. He sails at once for Russia.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seats are selling in the Albany store of Cluett and Sons for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Music hall, Troy, next Monday evening, and selling rapidly. A host of Albany music lovers will attend the event, the number being constantly increased. It is hardly necessary to call attention to this event, the simple announcement that the Boston Symphony is coming conveying the importance of the occasion. The pleasure of the evening will be greatly enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Samaroff, and in fact the whole evening will be a memorable one.

Buffalo-Express
FEB 1- 1910

Boston Symphony A Musical Treat

One of the treats of the musical season was furnished at Convention Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the Russian composer and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff. The vast audience filled the building to the doors. The concert was under the direction of Max Fiedler who revealed the great musician's artistic reverence for his art. The brilliant overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber, was the opening number, followed by the Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Two Wagner numbers were a fitting close to the magnificent programme, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II, being superbly played, while the haunting music of the Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," was given a matchless interpretation.

Much interest was felt in the first appearance in Buffalo of the Russian pianist Rachmaninoff who played his own concerto op. 18 with the orchestra.

The sounding of the first clarion note in the first movement chained the attention of his audience, and the dramatic intensity of the entire movement carried his hearers along with him, leaving them breathless with amazement at the mastery of his instrument. Equally compelling was he in the Adagio, a ravishing melody, while the mighty, insurpassable brilliancy of his genius illumined the charming Allegro Scherzando of the last movement. At its close he was given an ovation seldom accorded any artist in Buffalo. The hall rang with applause and the eminent pianist was compelled to return innumerable times to bow his acknowledgments. Last evening marked the close of Rachmaninoff's American tour. He sails at once for Russia.

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

—In giving Trojans another opportunity to enjoy the great Boston Symphony Orchestra Ben Franklin will incidentally introduce to local music-lovers the fourth conductor since he has been giving these famous concerts. At the first concert by the orchestra under Mr. Franklin's local management, Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor. At a later concert of the orchestra Willy Hess, concert meister of the orchestra, conducted, Mr. Gericke being ill, and gave a memorable performance. At the last performance by the organization the conductor was the great Dr. Karl Muck, who had to return to Germany by demand of the Emperor, and at the concert to be given in Music Hall Monday evening, February 7, Mr. Franklin will introduce Max Fiedler, the present eminent conductor. Much interest centres in the appearance of Mr. Fiedler on account of his pronounced success in other cities. The soloist at the concert will be Mme. Samaroff, one of the most proficient pianists of the day.

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

—Monday night will be notable in the local musical history of the season, as it is then that the most famous orchestra in all the world—the Boston Symphony—and one of the most brilliant pianists, Mme. Samaroff, together with the distinguished conductor, Max Fiedler, will give at Music Hall the long awaited concert. Music lovers for miles around will be in attendance at this musical feast, and the audience will be one of great brilliance and size. Last year when it was announced that Boston was to have a new opera house and a permanent opera of its own, great sympathy was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra because nearly everybody thought that this opera would flourish at the expense of the orchestra. This feeling grew stronger when the enormous subscription for the new opera became known, and when the time came for the annual auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts in Boston there was great anxiety on the part of the friends of the organization lest there should be a great slump from the sales of preceding years. But once again the orchestra showed the firm hold it had on the affections of the Boston public. Instead of a decrease, the sale showed a very considerable increase over those of last year.

...ages.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in concert at Music hall to-night with Olga Samaroff, the pianist, as soloist. The demand for seats has been so large that to-day reservations are being made in the gallery. The concert will be the star event of the musical season in this section of the country, and a rare treat. The orchestra is simply incomparable, while Mme. Samaroff occupies a place among the greatest pianists of the world.

EVENING NEWS
Buffalo, N. Y.
FEB 1- 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SUPERB PROGRAM

Famous Orchestra Led by Max Fiedler Evokes Storm of Applause from Vast Audience

ROCHMANINOFF IS ACCORDED OVATION

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its annual Buffalo concert last night in Convention Hall before an audience which in point of size and appreciation did full honor to the notable event.

Conductor Fiedler's program was most delightful, offering as it did such variety of composition, each so compelling and individual in its interest. It began with Weber's overture to Euryanthe, a work that glows with poetry and enchantment and in which the wonderful powers of the composer in imaginative insight and supremely beautiful orchestral writing are found to an unsurpassed degree. Mr. Fiedler conducted this with a warmth of feeling and enthusiasm for the music that communicated itself to his audience and brought immense applause for the performance.

Vivid Scheherazade.

Scheherazade, a symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was a work that showed the virtuosity of the orchestra and the masterly qualities of Mr. Fiedler. It is program music of the most vivid type, nowhere deeply emotional but of intense interest and might be an exposition of the powers of an orchestra, so abounding is it in searching, poignant and effectual expression.

The Scheherazado motive, which is played by solo violin, opens the first movement which is full of the wave motion of the sea and is heard again in the second, the "Story of the Kalandar-Prince," where there are passages for wood-wind instruments that are as definite and vivid as speech. The third movement is simple, easily followed, being built on a broad melodic strain. The last movement, "Festival at Bagdad," and destruction at sea, is the climax of the composer's remarkable genius for orchestral resource and power of rythmic and thematic elaboration. A brilliant, incisive and colorful performance was given this work that aroused a storm of applause.

A great event of the evening was the first appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who played his own second concerto for piano.

Rachmaninoff Triumphed.

Mr. Rachmaninoff is today one of the most distinguished of the modern Russian school, which is associated the world over with Tschaikowsky. He has written in all the larger forms and while his writing is permeated with the common Russian characteristic of melancholy, he has a style of musical speech that are individual and unique. His second concerto is a most genial work, full of dignity and an impressive quality of earnestness.

The pianist's manner of performance bears the stamp of sincerity and loftiness of spirit absorbed to self-forgetfulness in his task as interpreter. Such qualities are too rare and powerful not to irresistibly impress, and the reception given Mr. Rachmaninoff last night was a repetition of every other since his appearance in America. Numberless recalls brought the famous composer forward.

The concert closed with performances of the "Waldweben," from Siegfried, and the prelude and "Love Death," from Tristan and Isolde, of which the latter was a revelation of Mr. Fiedler's qualities of expressiveness, illumination of poetic beauty and large field of sympathy, all of which were reflected in the delicacy and splendor of tone and sensitiveness of response of the orchestra on which he played as an instrument.

The beautiful concert was under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ss ....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cleveland with Max Fiedler, its conductor, Wednesday, February 2, for its only appearance this season. This orchestra is the first and most successfully subsidized organization of its kind in this country.

[115]

EVENING NEWS
Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 30 1910

SUNDAY NEWS MUSIC PAGE.

COMING GREAT WEEK OF MUSIC IN BUFFALO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow —Sangerbund Concert on Wednesday —Busoni Recital on Friday—Tetrazzini at Shea's on Sunday.

No greater event will occur in Buffalo's present musical season than the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall tomorrow evening. The reputation of this great organization has grown far beyond national to being international, and none are more tireless in singing its praises than the most famous artists who have been associated with it, some of the most famous of the world's greatest conductors.

Max Fiedler, the present conductor, has arranged a program of extraordinary interest, only one number of which will be familiar to the audience. The principal orchestral work will be "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the last of that mighty group, among which was Tschaikowsky, that placed Russia in the fore rank of modern music.

Many conneiseurs give to the soloist of the evening, Rachmaninoff, the place held in turn by Tschaikowski and Rimsky-Korsakoff as the greatest of living Russian composers. His visit to Buffalo is one of the red letter events in local musical history. He will play his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Orchestral numbers by Weber, overture to "Euranthe," and Wagner; "Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," complete the beautiful program.

Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, was introduced to the larger cities of this country by means of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one need not exaggerate by saying that no musician has ever visited this country who has made a deeper impression on the musical public than this tall, simple-mannered, unassuming Russian. Rachmaninoff is a great composer; he has shown himself to be a great conductor; and unlike most composers, he is a truly great pianist. He has an enormous technique, of which he is so thoroughy a master that one forgets the wonders he performs with his fingers and wrists. He is the possessor of a tone of luscious quality, and he has a personality which fascinates an audience immediately. At least, that has been true wherever he has played so far.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

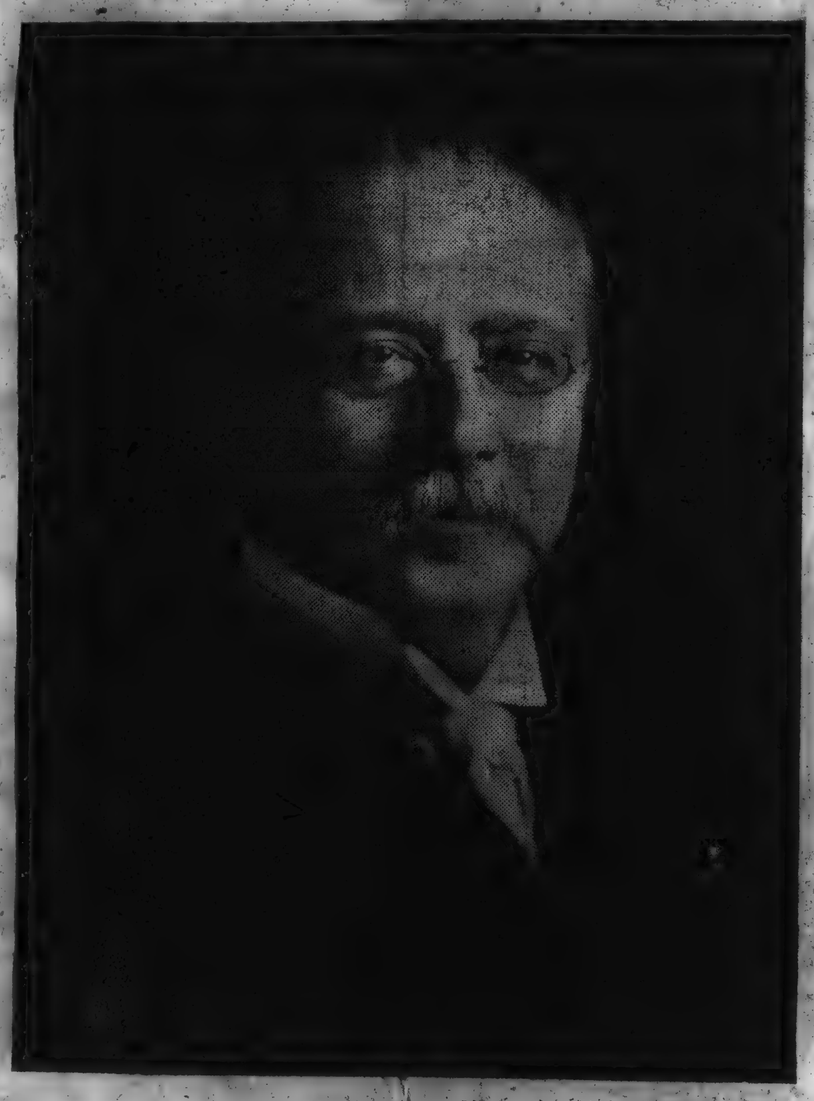
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") .. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 18 ..... Rachmaninoff
(a) "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Act II ..... Wagner
(b) Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

"Bells of St. Michael's Tower" Stewart
Epilogue from "Caractacus" ..... Sir Edward Elgar

TETRAZZINI TO SING CELEBRATED ARIAS.

Mme. Tetrazzini, who is regarded as the most eminent exponent of the Italian art of singing, is to be heard at Shea's Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6. Mme. Tetrazzini is called the "Queen of Coloratura Sopranos," and she has achieved such triumphs as none since the days of Adelina Patti. Not only is she the greatest technician, possessing absolute mastery over her vocal

MAX FIEDLER.



Conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard at Convention Hall tomorrow evening. —Photo by Garo.

From TOWN TOPICS
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date JAN 22 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cleveland on February second for its annual concert in the symphony series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been called in the past an "orchestra of virtusoi," and if this was true five years ago when the phrase was coined, it is true today. With the possible exception of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, there is no organization of the kind in the world that contains so many acknowledged masters of the art, and the Paris Conservatoire is hardly to be classed with the Boston Symphony because its concerts are only occasional, and it lacks the opportunity for complete drilling that the Boston Symphony has.

It would be difficult to say which section of the orchestra excels. Its strings are wonderful in their plangent brilliancy and in the ease with which they overcome technical difficulties of the greatest magnitude. The wood-wind section is celebrated wherever the fame of the orchestra has penetrated, while the brass section with its horns and trumpets and trombones is on a par with the others. In the strings are such famous violinists as Hess, Noack, Roth, Kuntz, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Barbleben; Warnke, Keller, Belinski, Kautzenbach among the 'cellos; Ferir, Gietzen and Rennert among the violas; Keller, Huber and Agnesy among the double basses; men, all of them, famous as virtuosi of their instruments aside from their work in the orchestra. In the wood-wind section is Longy, unquestionably the greatest master of the oboe in the world, and only less famous than he are Andre Maquarre, the first flute, Grisez, the first clarinet, and Sadony, the first bassoon. In the horn sections are Max Hess and Georg Wendler, artists that are the envy of every other orchestra in this country, while in Kloepfel the orchestra possesses probably the finest trumpet in the world. These names are simply picked out at random, for what is said of them is true probably of every other member of the orchestra, for the orchestra has been organized regardless of expense, the sole purpose being to make it better than any other in the world, and in twenty-nine years of existence it has held undisputed place among the bands of America, and now is unquestionably the greatest orchestra in the world.

PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JAN 28 1910

Boston Sympohny Orchestra.

The pre-eminence of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give a concert in Grays' armory, Cleveland, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 2, at 8 o'clock, is recognized by all musicians who visit this country. In fact, it is a very serious handicap for a musician—that is to say, a pianist, violinist or cellist—who comes to make a tour of America if he does not get an engagement with this orchestra. The orchestra does not use many soloists and there is a hard and fast rule that it never engages any soloists but those of foremost rank.

Moreover, unlike every other orchestra in this country, and one may say with equal truth every other orchestra in the world, the Boston Symphony, as such, can never be engaged. It exists solely for the purpose of giving its own concerts, and while smaller orchestras are often made up of men belonging to the Boston Symphony, at such times the leading members of the orchestra do not play and, naturally, its conductor does not conduct. It is practically a "sine qua non" of a successful tour in this country that an artist be able to advertise that he has been engaged by the Boston Symphony. This state of affairs rules with no other orchestra in the country.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From CATHOLIC UNIVERSE
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date FEB 4 1910

Mischa Elman.

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years and perhaps the most remarkable violinistic talent that the world has known since the great Italian Paganini, is what is asserted of Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who will be heard at the Grays' Armory on next Tuesday evening. Mischa Elman came out of Russia four years ago, a boy of fourteen, and conquered Germany. Three years ago he went to London and conquered that great city. Last month he came to New York and it was the same story, and within the last few weeks he has made a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Washington, Rochester and Buffalo, and in Chicago with the Thomas orchestra, and received receptions the like of which have not been seen since Paderewski first began to play before the American public.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
JAN 28 1910

One of the interesting personalities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in the Grays' Armory on Wednesday evening, February 2, is Willy Hess, the concert master. He spent some years in this country at the end of the '60s, when he became famous as a "boy wonder." At that time his father, as well as Theodore Thomas and Morris Steinert, were first violins in an orchestra together. Young Hess returned to Holland when he was a lad of twelve, and there pursued the career of a virtuoso until he came to Boston four years ago to take his present position.

If Hess wished to follow the wandering life of a solo artist he would hold a position among the great violinists. Not a small part of the beauty of the string section of the Boston Symphony is due to his remarkable authority as concert master.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN TOPICS
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JAN 29 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest orchestra in the world, will make its annual visit to Cleveland next Wednesday evening at the Grays' Armory, when Director Max Fiedler, retained for another year, will conduct the following program:

Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride" ..... Smetana
Symphony No. 2 in D major op. 73 ..... Brahms
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphonic Poem "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

The works chosen are well calculated to please a wide variety of tastes. The symphony is one of the most beautiful of Brahms' compositions. It is interesting to read the comment of the famous German critic Hanslick on the work after its first hearing in 1877: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not of effeminate serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to meditated seriousness." And again: "Mozartian blood flows in its veins—it possesses a sunny clearness."

Les Preludes, of Liszt, is one of the familiar things that some one is sure to request each season. It has a poignant beauty and it will be more than delightful to hear it given by the Boston men.

EVENING NEWS
Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 30 1910

SUNDAY NEWS MUSIC PAGE.

COMING GREAT WEEK OF MUSIC IN BUFFALO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow —Sangerbund Concert on Wednesday —Busoni Recital on Friday—Tetrazzini at Shea's on Sunday.

No greater event will occur in Buffalo's present musical season than the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall tomorrow evening. The reputation of this great organization has grown far beyond national to being international, and none are more tireless in singing its praises than the most famous artists who have been associated with it, some of the most famous of the world's greatest conductors.

Max Fiedler, the present conductor, has arranged a program of extraordinary interest, only one number of which will be familiar to the audience. The principal orchestral work will be "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the last of that mighty group, among which was Tschaikowsky, that placed Russia in the forerank of modern music.

Many conneiseurs give to the soloist of the evening, Rachmaninoff, the place held in turn by Tschaikowski and Rimsky-Korsakoff as the greatest of living Russian composers. His visit to Buffalo is one of the red letter events in local musical history. He will play his own second concerto for piano and orchestra. Orchestral numbers by Weber, overture to "Euranthe," and Wagner; "Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," complete the beautiful program.

Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, was introduced to the larger cities of this country by means of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one need not exaggerate by saying that no musician has ever visited this country who has made a deeper impression on the musical public than this tall, simple-mannered, unassuming Russian. Rachmaninoff is a great composer; he has shown himself to be a great conductor; and unlike most composers, he is a truly great pianist. He has an enormous technique, of which he is so thoroughy a master that one forgets the wonders he performs with his fingers and wrists. He is the possessor of a tone of luscious quality, and he has a personality which fascinates an audience immediately. At least, that has been true wherever he has played so far.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

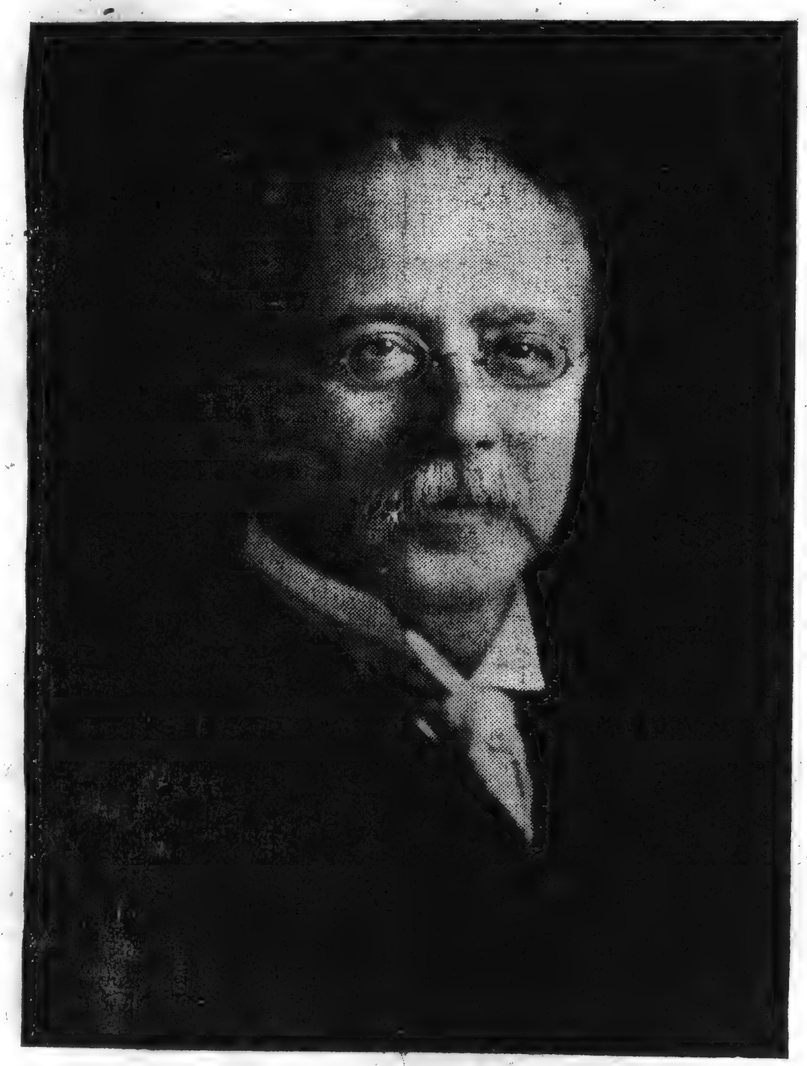
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night").. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 18..... Rachmaninoff
(a) "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Act II..... Wagner
(b) Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde". Wagner
Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

"Bells of St. Michael's Tower". Stewart
Epilogue from "Caractacus"..... Sir Edward Elgar

TETRAZZINI TO SING CELEBRATED ARIAS.

Mme. Tetrazzini, who is regarded as the most eminent exponent of the Italian art of singing, is to be heard at Shea's Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6. Mme. Tetrazzini is called the "Queen of Coloratura Sopranos," and she has achieved such triumphs as none since the days of Adelina Patti. Not only is she the greatest technician, possessing absolute mastery over her vocal

MAX FIEDLER.



—Photo by Garo.

Conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard at Convention Hall tomorrow evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ..... OPIC
Address ..... CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date ..... JAN 22 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cleveland on February second for its annual concert in the symphony series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been called in the past an "orchestra of virtusoi," and if this was true five years ago when the phrase was coined, it is true today. With the possible exception of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, there is no organization of the kind in the world that contains so many acknowledged masters of the art, and the Paris Conservatoire is hardly to be classed with the Boston Symphony because its concerts are only occasional, and it lacks the opportunity for complete drilling that the Boston Symphony has.

It would be difficult to say which section of the orchestra excels. Its strings are wonderful in their plangent brilliancy and in the ease with which they overcome technical difficulties of the greatest magnitude. The woodwind section is celebrated wherever the fame of the orchestra has penetrated, while the brass section with its horns and trumpets and trombones is on a par with the others. In the strings are such famous violinists as Hess, Noack, Roth, Kuntz, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Barbleben; Warnke, Keller, Belinski, Kautzenbach among the 'cellos; Ferir, Gietzen and Rennert among the violas; Keller, Huber and Agnesy among the double basses; men, all of them, famous as virtuosi of their instruments aside from their work in the orchestra. In the wood-wind section is Longy, unquestionably the greatest master of the oboe in the world, and only less famous than he are Andre Maquarre, the first flute, Grisez, the first clarinet, and Sadony, the first bassoon. In the horn sections are Max Hess and Georg Wendler, artists that are the envy of every other orchestra in this country, while in Kloepfel the orchestra possesses probably the finest trumpet in the world. These names are simply picked out at random, for what is said of them is true probably of every other member of the orchestra, for the orchestra has been organized regardless of expense, the sole purpose being to make it better than any other in the world, and in twenty-nine years of existence it has held undisputed place among the bands of America, and now is unquestionably the greatest orchestra in the world.

...ess ..... CLEVELAND, OHIO
...e .....

Boston Sympohny Orchestra.

The pre-eminence of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give a concert in Grays' armory, Cleveland, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 2, at 8 o'clock, is recognized by all musicians who visit this country. In fact, it is a very serious handicap for a musician—that is to say, a pianist, violinist or cellist—who comes to make a tour of America if he does not get an engagement with this orchestra. The orchestra does not use many soloists and there is a hard and fast rule that it never engages any soloists but those of foremost rank.

Moreover, unlike every other orchestra in this country, and one may say with equal truth every other orchestra in the world, the Boston Symphony, as such, can never be engaged. It exists solely for the purpose of giving its own concerts, and while smaller orchestras are often made up of men belonging to the Boston Symphony, at such times the leading members of the orchestra do not play and, naturally, its conductor does not conduct. It is practically a "sine qua non" of a successful tour in this country that an artist be able to advertise that he has been engaged by the Boston Symphony. This state of affairs rules with no other orchestra in the country.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ..... CATHOLIC UNIVERSE
Address ..... CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date ..... FEB 4 1910

Mischa Elman.

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years and perhaps the most remarkable violinistic talent that the world has known since the great Italian Paganini, is what is asserted of Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who will be heard at the Grays' Armory on next Tuesday evening. Mischa Elman came out of Russia four years ago, a boy of fourteen, and conquered Germany. Three years ago he went to London and conquered that great city. Last month he came to New York and it was the same story, and within the last few weeks he has made a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Washington, Rochester and Buffalo, and in Chicago with the Thomas orchestra, and received receptions the like of which have not been seen since Paderewski first began to play before the American public.

...ess ..... CLEVELAND, OHIO
...e ..... JAN 3 1910

One of the interesting personalities in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in the Grays' Armory on Wednesday evening, February 2, is Willy Hess, the concert master. He spent some years in this country at the end of the '60s, when he became famous as a "boy wonder." At that time his father, as well as Theodore Thomas and Morris Steinert, were first violins in an orchestra together. Young Hess returned to Holland when he was a lad of twelve, and there pursued the career of a virtuoso until he came to Boston four years ago to take his present position.

If Hess wished to follow the wandering life of a solo artist he would hold a position among the great violinists. Not a small part of the beauty of the string section of the Boston Symphony is due to his remarkable authority as concert master.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...m ..... TOWN TOPICS
...dress ..... CLEVELAND, OHIO
...e ..... JAN 29 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest orchestra in the world, will make its annual visit to Cleveland next Wednesday evening at the Grays' Armory, when Director Max Fiedler, retained for another year, will conduct the following program:

Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride" ..... Smetana
Symphony No. 2 in D major op. 73 ..... Brahms
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphonic Poem "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

The works chosen are well calculated to please a wide variety of tastes. The symphony is one of the most beautiful of Brahms' compositions. It is interesting to read the comment of the famous German critic Hanslick on the work after its first hearing in 1877: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not of effeminate serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to meditated seriousness." And again: "Mozartian blood flows in its veins—it possesses a sunny clearness."

Les Preludes, of Liszt, is one of the familiar things that some one is sure to request each season. It has a poignant beauty and it will be more than delightful to hear it given by the Boston men.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 29 1910

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years, and, perhaps, the most remarkable violinistic talent since the days of Paganini, are the priceless possessions of Mischa Elman, the young Russian, whose colossal playing captured Cleveland last year, and who is to make his re-appearance Tuesday evening, February eighth, at the Grays' Armory.

The public here has shown an extraordinary interest in this greatest of the younger violinists of the present day, as last week's announcement

MAX FIEDLER
Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

—Photo by Garo

of the opening of the ticket sale at Burrows Brothers, resulted in over two hundred advance orders for seats to Elman's concert. His present American tour is booked to the end of the season. The local management finds it impossible to secure another date for Cleveland.

Elman came out of Russia five years ago, a little Jewish boy of fourteen, and conquered Germany. A year later he captured London. Last season he started on his first American tour and was immediately engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, Washington, Rochester and Buffalo. In Chicago he played with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra and received receptions of sensational character in every city in which he appeared.

The advance orders already received demonstrate that Cleveland has not forgotten Elman's sensational playing last year. At the second concert people stood three deep, filling the rear of Grays' Armory to the fire limit. The closing scenes of both of his concerts were as sensational as his playing. People stood up and cheered for several minutes, forcing Elman to three or four encores, until the janitor turned out the lights.

A very important part of the equipment of a symphony orchestra is its library. Under the present system of publishing music, the scores as a rule are very expensive. Many of the modern scores can not be sold, they can only be rented.

In Symphony Hall, Boston, there is a room which excites the envy and enthusiasm of musicians—the library room of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in existence for twenty-nine years. Naturally the orchestra has a tremendous collection. Under the supervision of John Sauerquell, who has been librarian for over twenty years, the library comprises several thousand titles and represents a total investment of close to a quarter of a million dollars.

At the same time, these scores could not be replaced for the same amount of money, as most of them are not to be had in the open market today at any price. This library, supplemented by the famous Brown collection in the Boston Public Library, gives Boston the finest collection of music in the country, not even excepting that in the Congressional Library at Washington. The Boston orchestra comes only once a year, and its concert next Wednesday night will again demonstrate the great hold it has upon the admiration and affection of its friends.

11

The Tuesday Morning Musical Club

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
FEB 1 - 19

NEWS OF THE RAILROADS.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed through Syracuse on a [illegible] train on the way to Buf- [illegible] orchestra returns to Syra- [illegible] a concert next Saturday night [illegible] Wieting Opera House. Their train [illegible] yesterday as a section of [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date JAN 30 1910

BY PAUL H. TEICHERT.

THE annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Cleveland will take place next Wednesday evening at the Grays' Armory, when Max Fiedler, retained for another year as director, will conduct the following program of modern works:

Overture to the Opera, "The Sold Bride" ..... Smetana
Symphony No. 2 in D major, op. [illegible] ..... Brahms
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

The Boston Symphony Oschestra is no doubt the greatest orchestra in the world today. Its annual visits to certain cities of the Middle West are not made for monetary purposes. These visits serve in the nature to widen musical education rather than offering the public musical entertainment. Curiously enough, the great public is much interested in these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But there is a reason for this.

The orchestra has been in existence for over twenty-five years. It was organized for educational purposes with a $1,000,000 endowment fund. Its financial basis practically secure from the beginning, the different conductors engaged during the past quarter of a century felt at liberty to offer an independent opinion. They made programs regardless of public taste. No concessions were made. This freedom and independence gave the orchestra the power to wield its influence over the public, musically less educated than today. There was no choice. Gradually the Boston people realized the importance of musical education over musical entertainment, and it accepted the situation.

Twenty-five years of the Boston orchestra's monetary independence resulted in a wonderful change of public opinion regarding matters musical all over the East. The orchestra visited every large city of importance east of Washington. Slowly its name and its purpose spread over the cities of the West. Today these cities, Cleveland included, fill the concert auditoriums to the last seat at the annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has the respect of the people.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PLAIN DEALER
ress CLEVELAND, OHIO
e JAN 30 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is no question as to the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give its annual concert in Cleveland next Wednesday evening at the Grays' armory under the direction of Max Fiedler, retained as conductor for another year is at the head of all the orchestras of the country. It is now in its twenty-ninth season, and several of its players have been associated with it from the beginning. It has often been called the "Orchestra of Virtuosi" because of the quality of musicianship of each of its members. It is composed of 100 men each an expert in his own particular line.

One of its chief glories is its wood wind choir which, by good judges, is regarded as the best in the world. This choir holds an important position in the following program of modern works to be presented by the orchestra next Wednesday evening:

Overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride" (Smetana); symphony No. 2 in D major op. 73 (Brahms); symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (Rimsky-Korsakoff); symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" (Liszt).

The wood-wind department is the most important section of an orchestra because of the scarcity of really good players. The different conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra have watched this section most carefully. Today it includes some of the greatest artists in the world.

George Longy, the first oboe player, came to the orchestra in 1898 from Paris, where he won the first prize in the conservatory in 1886 and was successively first oboeist of the Lamoureaux orchestra, the Opera Comique orchestra and the Colonne orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flutist, succeeded Jaquet, one of the La Bourgogne victims. He was a winner of the first prize in solfeggio in the conservatoire in 1892 and for the flute in 1893 and came to Boston from the Lamoureaux orchestra.

George Grisez, the first clarinetist, is a comparatively late comer, having succeeded Lebailly in the fall of 1904. His father was Leon Grisez, one of the greatest clarinetists of France and a winner of first prizes. When he was engaged for Boston he played first clarinet in the famous Conservatoire orchestra, the finest orchestra in France. Peter Sadony, the first bassoonist, came to Boston in the fall of 1905, from Cologne, where he taught in the conservatory and was first bassoonist of the celebrated Guerzenich orchestra. He brought with him a reputation of being the best bassoonist in Germany which he has fully sustained in this country.

The Press Clipping Bureau of the World and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
CLEVELAND, OHIO.
FEB 5- 1910

There is a report current that a movement is on foot to secure the services of Rachmaninoff, the eminent composer, pianist and conductor, for the Boston Symphony orchestra at the expiration of Max Fiedler's contract in 1911. The controlling powers behind the orchestra are evidently favorably inclined toward the popular Russian musician, who is winning laurels on an American tour, but no formal step has been taken. Rachmaninoff has accepted the position for the present of conductor of the orchestra at the St. Petersburg opera house, when Dresden will release him from the Saxon field, and it is improbable that Boston will be able to secure him under the pending conditions.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 1 1910

MISS KING IN CHARGE OF BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will give a concert in the Wieting Opera House Saturday night, February 5. Miss A. Kathleen King of No. 215 Park avenue has taken the Syracuse management of the concert. The orchestra will bring as soloist Madame Olga Samaroff, who appeared here a few years ago at the music festival. Mme. Samaroff, since she was in Syracuse, has played a season in England and on the Continent.

Max Fiedler, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra at Grays' armory Wednesday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
om POST
ddress SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 8 - 1910

PROGRAMME ARRANGED FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the programme for the concert which that orchestra will give in Syracuse Saturday evening, February 5, in the Wieting Opera House. There is no symphony on the programme, but in its place is the symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff entitled "Scheherazade." The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3, and two Wagner numbers, "Forest Murmurings," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the "Tahnhauser" overture.

The soloist, Madame Olga Samaroff, will play Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 29 1910

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years, and, perhaps, the most remarkable violinistic talent since the days of Paganini, are the priceless possessions of Mischa Elman, the young Russian, whose colossal playing captured Cleveland last year, and who is to make his re-appearance Tuesday evening, February eighth, at the Grays' Armory.

The public here has shown an extraordinary interest in this greatest of the younger violinists of the present day, as last week's announcement

MAX FIEDLER
Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

—Photo by Garo

of the opening of the ticket sale at Burrows Brothers, resulted in over two hundred advance orders for seats to Elman's concert. His present American tour is booked to the end of the season. The local management finds it impossible to secure another date for Cleveland.

Elman came out of Russia five years ago, a little Jewish boy of fourteen, and conquered Germany. A year later he captured London. Last season he started on his first American tour and was immediately engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, Washington, Rochester and Buffalo. In Chicago he played with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra and received receptions of sensational character in every city in which he appeared.

The advance orders already received demonstrate that Cleveland has not forgotten Elman's sensational playing last year. At the second concert people stood three deep, filling the rear of Grays' Armory to the fire limit. The closing scenes of both of his concerts were as sensational as his playing. People stood up and cheered for several minutes, forcing Elman to three or four encores, until the janitor turned out the lights.

A very important part of the equipment of a symphony orchestra is its library. Under the present system of publishing music, the scores as a rule are very expensive. Many of the modern scores can not be sold, they can only be rented.

In Symphony Hall, Boston, there is a room which excites the envy and enthusiasm of musicians—the library room of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in existence for twenty-nine years. Naturally the orchestra has a tremendous collection. Under the supervision of John Sauerquell, who has been librarian for over twenty years, the library comprises several thousand titles and represents a total investment of close to a quarter of a million dollars.

At the same time, these scores could not be replaced for the same amount of money, as most of them are not to be had in the open market today at any price. This library, supplemented by the famous Brown collection in the Boston Public Library, gives Boston the finest collection of music in the country, not even excepting that in the Congressional Library at Washington. The Boston orchestra comes only once a year, and its concert next Wednesday night will again demonstrate the great hold it has upon the admiration and affection of its friends.

The Tuesday Morning Musical Club

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
FEB 1 - 19

NEWS OF THE RAILROADS.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed through Syracuse on a special Pullman train on the way to Buffalo. This orchestra returns to Syracuse for a concert next Saturday night at the Wieting Opera House. Their train was handled yesterday as a section of train No. 45 at 10.10 a. m.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date JAN 30 1910

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

THE annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Cleveland will take place next Wednesday evening at the Grays' Armory, when Max Fiedler, retained for another year as director, will conduct the following program of modern works:

Overture to the Opera, "The Sold Bride" ..... Smetana
Symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73 ..... Brahms
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

The Boston Symphony Oschestra is no doubt the greatest orchestra in the world today. Its annual visits to certain cities of the Middle West are not made for monetary purposes. These visits serve in the nature to widen musical education rather than offering the public musical entertainment. Curiously enough, the great public is much interested in these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But there is a reason for this.

The orchestra has been in existence for over twenty-five years. It was organized for educational purposes with a $1,000,000 endowment fund. Its financial basis practically secure from the beginning, the different conductors engaged during the past quarter of a century felt at liberty to offer an independent opinion. They made programs regardless of public taste. No concessions were made. This freedom and independence gave the orchestra the power to wield its influence over the public, musically less educated than today. There was no choice. Gradually the Boston people realized the importance of musical education over musical entertainment, and it accepted the situation.

Twenty-five years of the Boston orchestra's monetary independence resulted in a wonderful change of public opinion regarding matters musical all over the East. The orchestra visited every large city of importance east of Washington. Slowly its name and its purpose spread over the cities of the West. Today these cities, Cleveland included, fill the concert auditoriums to the last seat at the annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has the respect of the people.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ress
e JAN 30 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is no question as to the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give its annual concert in Cleveland next Wednesday evening at the Grays' armory under the direction of Max Fiedler, retained as conductor for another year is at the head of all the orchestras of the country. It is now in its twenty-ninth season, and several of its players have been associated with it from the beginning. It has often been called the "Orchestra of Virtuosi" because of the quality of musicianship of each of its members. It is composed of 100 men each an expert in his own particular line.

One of its chief glories is its wood wind choir which, by good judges, is regarded as the best in the world. This choir holds an important position in the following program of modern works to be presented by the orchestra next Wednesday evening:

Overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride" (Smetana); symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73 (Brahms); symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (Rimsky-Korsakoff); symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" (Liszt).

The wood-wind department is the most important section of an orchestra because of the scarcity of really good players. The different conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra have watched this section most carefully. Today it includes some of the greatest artists in the world.

George Longy, the first oboe player, came to the orchestra in 1898 from Paris, where he won the first prize in the conservatory in 1886 and was successively first oboeist of the Lamoureaux orchestra, the Opera Comique orchestra and the Colonne orchestra. Andre Maquarre, the first flutist, succeeded Jaquet, one of the La Bourgogne victims. He was a winner of the first prize in solfeggio in the conservatoire in 1892 and for the flute in 1893 and came to Boston from the Lamoureaux orchestra.

George Grisez, the first clarinetist, is a comparatively late comer, having succeeded Lebailly in the fall of 1904. His father was Leon Grisez, one of the greatest clarinetists of France and a winner of first prizes. When he was engaged for Boston he played first clarinet in the famous Conservatoire orchestra, the finest orchestra in France. Peter Sadony, the first bassoonist, came to Boston in the fall of 1905, from Cologne, where he taught in the conservatory and was first bassoonist of the celebrated Guerzenich orchestra. He brought with him a reputation of being the best bassoonist in Germany which he has fully sustained in this country.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CLEVELAND, OHIO.
FEB 5- 1910

There is a report current that a movement is on foot to secure the services of Rachmaninoff, the eminent composer, pianist and conductor, for the Boston Symphony orchestra at the expiration of Max Fiedler's contract in 1911. The controlling powers behind the orchestra are evidently favorably inclined toward the popular Russian musician, who is winning laurels on an American tour, but no formal step has been taken. Rachmaninoff has accepted the position for the present of conductor of the orchestra at the St. Petersburg opera house, when Dresden will release him from the Saxon field, and it is improbable that Boston will be able to secure him under the pending conditions.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 1 19

MISS KING IN CHARGE OF BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will give a concert in the Wieting Opera House Saturday night, February 5. Miss A. Kathleen King of No. 215 Park avenue has taken the Syracuse management of the concert. The orchestra will bring as soloist Madame Olga Samaroff, who appeared here a few years ago at the music festival. Mme. Samaroff, since she was in Syracuse, has played a season in England and on the Continent.

Max Fiedler, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra at Grays' armory Wednesday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 8 1910

PROGRAMME ARRANGED FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the programme for the concert which that orchestra will give in Syracuse Saturday evening, February 5, in the Wieting Opera House. There is no symphony on the programme, but in its place is the symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff entitled "Scheherazade." The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3, and two Wagner numbers, "Forest Murmurings," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the "Tahnhauser" overture.

The soloist, Madame Olga Samaroff, will play Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LEADER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
FEB 3 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY VISITS CLEVELAND

Plays Before Large and Fashionable Audience at Armory.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual visit to Cleveland last night drew a capacity house to the Grays' Armory. It brought the familiar lines of hundreds of carriages and automobiles and the familiar bad condition of the streets around the armory. Over two thousand people were forced to wade through slush and water before they reached the street cars waiting on Prospect avenue.

Max Fiedler, the successor of Dr. Muck, stood before the conductor's desk here for the second time last night as leader of that most perfect body of players, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Again his manner and method forced upon the audience the impression that he is a strict disciplinarian; that he is a man of energetic and direct attitude; a leader who drives his will into the orchestra with sledge hammer force. From the moment he lifts his baton he is tense with alertness, merciless in his vigor, even melodramatic in his accomplishment of absolute precision.

A new side of his directorial character—one that stood more or less in the background at his first appearance here—came to the front last night, the emotional, and, strangely enough, during the Brahms Symphony, when it was not expected at all. Brahms, the conservator of classical form in modern dress, was expected to receive a strictly conventional reading. Instead Mr. Fiedler made the symphony a graphic picture of emotional solemnity, with lucid and transparent clarity of intellectual formality as the underlying drawing. The elegiac nature of the slow movement was intensely and insistently emphasized in thought, contents and expression. Rhetorical pauses were less noticeable last night. But his tendency of taking a slow tempo very slow was more perceptible than last year. He seeks, so to speak, a large, precise and kind beauty rather than a grin, gray and powerful persistency in his Brahms.

To the audience Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" was as entertaining as the "Tales of the Thousand Nights and a Night," from which the composer took his inspiration for the work. The oriental atmosphere which persistently and impressionistically fills every bar of this modern symphonic suite, gave Mr. Fiedler an opportunity to demonstrate his ability as an exhibitor of tonal colors and the different sections of the orchestra a chance for solo work in ensemble. It showed what excellent players and what excellent instruments this orchestra possesses. The detail work of the conductor's reading equaled the excellence of the solo players' fine musicianship in every measure. Intensely illuminative in its vivid and interesting contents, orchestra and conductor gave the audience an architectural musical structure of sensitive, subtle and passionate firmness. The "Scheherazade" theme, which weaves its strain through many of the meshes of the musical lacework, in the hands of Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and, subsequently, sounded by many solo instruments, was drained to the last drop of persistent musical beauty. The work left the best impression with the audience. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" (Philip Hale's translation) was excellent in its virtuoso character. Liszt's intense "Les Preludes" closed the concert. Mr. Fiedler and his great orchestra impart an illuminating understanding of music.

PAUL E. TEICHERT.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
FEB 3 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WILSON G. SMITH.

ABAS the meat trust! Banzai the bean, that succulent trade mark of Boston, Mass. If we would become high art producers we must eschew the meat habit and become vegetarians. I'll prove it.

What prevents England ranking as a musical nation? Roast beef. What contributes to the musical pre-eminence of Germany? Sauerkraut. What makes Italy the cradle of art and home of song and romance? Macaroni e spaghetti. And France? Well, anything to beat the meat trust—bonbons. Lastly, China, that altenheim toward which modern musical cacophony is trending? Rice.

It needs no further argument to prove that the bean—the Boston baked variety—is going to prove our artistic salvation. See what its vegetarian atmosphere has evolved. An orchestra the peer of any similar organization in the world. Audiences that absorb the master works of music as easily as a spoon carries soup (bean) to the mouth. That is why I cry a bas the meat trust! and banzai the bean!

Whether the prevailing meat strike had anything to do with Wednesday night's audience I know not. It was one of the largest the armory has housed this season, and appreciative enthusiasm was infectious.

Even the symphony—the greatest classic since Beethoven—was received with acclaim. Director Fiedler gave the monumental work a reading consistent with its classic nature. He infused just enough modern emotionalism into it to carry it beyond the usually philosophic mood of Brahms. It was intellectually controlled emotionalism.

As to its performance, it attained as near perfection as is possible. If it is ever done better I want to be there to hear it. While I am on the subject of near-perfection I want to call attention to the tonal balance in the orchestra. The different choirs melted into the tonal ensemble as unobtrusively as does the snow disappear under the rays of a blazing sun. Liszt's "Preludes," too, was an artistic revelation.

And coming after the impressionistic and bizarre "Arabian Nights" of Korsakoff it was as grateful as a summer breeze. After all, Liszt sounds human and normal after some of the ultra moderns. His one time banality sinks into the shadow of restful repose through comparison. The Korsakoff program symphony was brilliantly played, and its orientalism swept through Bagdad like a typhoon.

It contained episodes, too, of rare melodic interest. Wednesday's concert was the finest ever given us by the Boston contingent.

Fiedler's baton is working visible improvement. Banzai the baton and the bean!

POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
FEB 4 - 1910

WEATHER DELAYS TRAINS; HEAVY SUNDAY TRAVEL

Large Number of Tourists Bound for Winter Resorts—Theatrical Companies Change Stands.

Yesterday's cold weather caused late trains and a hard day's work for employes at all the terminals. Travel was heavy, many of the trains hauling extra equipment for the accommodation of tourists starting in large numbers for the winter resorts and of the theatrical companies changing stands.

Blanche Ring and her company went east on the Knickerbocker Special yesterday forenoon. They occupied three Pullmans from Cleveland to New York. Mary Mannering and her company traveled on the Metropolitan from Detroit to New York.

"The London Belles" traveled on the Eastern Express at 11.40 a. m. on their way from Rochester to Schenectady. The "Way Down East" company came to Syracuse on the same train for a week's stay. "Ma Goose" and her flock went from Albany to Buffalo on the Fast Mail at 3.45 o'clock, being accommodated by an extra car.

"David Higgins" left during the day for Rochester and "Such a Little Queen" (Elsie Ferguson), who is to spend the first half of the week in Syracuse, arrived from Buffalo on the New Yorker at 1.11 p. m. "The Great Divide" went through on the Fast Mail, westbound, at 7.35 o'clock last night and the same train hauled the Detroit, Toledo and Ironton Railway private car with President Eugene Zimmerman on board.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Troy by a special train, leaving Syracuse at 9 o'clock yesterday morning.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 22 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

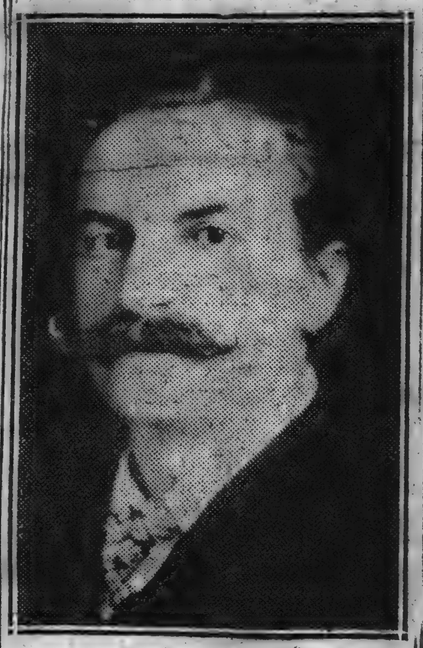
It was Mr. William J. Henderson, music critic of The New York Sun who said a few years ago that the secret of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert here in the Wieting Opera House on Saturday evening, February 5, lay not merely in its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but an "orchestra of virtuosi" and one of the first published comments on the orchestra by Max Fiedler, its present conductor, was in praise of the way the different choirs have been selected. The brass choir is composed almost entirely of Germans, who are the best players of brass instruments in the world. The wood-wind choir is of Frenchmen, who excel in this department of orchestral music. And the strings are Slavs, Germans, Austrians and Americans, the best products of the great teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna and Berlin.

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done a great work in interpreting the music of masters, out of its ranks have come some composers who to-day are regarded as men decidedly to be reckoned with. It has always been the policy of the management of the orchestra and of its conductor to encourage composition among the members of the orchestra. As a direct result of this has been the development of one of the finest creative talents of our times—Charles Martin Loeffler, who, in 1903, left the first desk of the violins, where he had sat for twenty years, to devote himself to composition and teaching. Another very remarkable talent which has been developed in the orchestra is Gustav Strube, now one of the first violins, whose works have won for him much admiration. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, and Clement Lenom, the second oboe, have also made their marks as composers.

Messrs. Strube, Marquarre and Lenom are now regular members of the orchestra and will be in Syracuse on Saturday evening, February 5, in the Wieting Opera House.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N.Y.

POPULAR SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA



WILLY HESS

For the first time in many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in this city at the Wieting Opera House, Saturday evening, February 5. Max Fiedler is director and Willy Hess is soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
FEB 4 - 1910

Mr. Brockway's Lecture.

Last evening in Assembly Hall, Howard Brockway, of New York, interested an audience of persons who expect to attend the Boston Symphony concert with a lecture upon the programme of that concert, during which he played upon the piano a large part of the score. Mr. Brockway showed a close acquaintance with the spirit as well as the technical construction of the pieces he discussed, and in particular, his rendering of the Beethoven overture which opens the programme and of the Arabian Nights' suite which ends it, provoked enthusiastic applause. They were played with delicacy as well as vivacity and boldness.

A word of approval should be said for this lecture as an example of a sort of education which is far too rare. The difficulties which so many find in the way of enjoying a symphony programme are chiefly the difficulties of understanding what the composer and the conductor are driving at, and to have a symphony programme preceded by such illuminating glimpses as Mr. Brockway supplies is to remove a large part of these difficulties in advance.

HERALD
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
JAN 24

Boston Symphony at Buffalo To-night.

Director Max Fielder and his Boston Symphony orchestra of more than 100 members passed through Syracuse this morning in a special Pullman train over the Central. They were bound for Buffalo, where the company gives the first concert of its present tour to-night. Miss A. Katheleen King, who is in charge of the arrangements for the concert to be given by the orchestra in this city on Saturday evening, met the train upon its arrival in this city and had a short talk with Director Fielder and his manager.

POST
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
FEB 3 - 1910

ENTERTAINMENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in the Wieting Opera House on Saturday evening, Febauary 5, opens at the box office of the Wieting Opera House this morning (Thursday). The orchestra will come here from Rochester, where it will give a concert to-morrow night, and is due to arrive in this city at 11.40 Saturday. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist, will arrive with the orchestra.

DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 28 19

Boston Symphony Concert.

In past years the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the series of the Detroit Orchestral association, has drawn the largest audiences of any of the concerts, which was natural in view of the reputation of the orchestra as the greatest in the world. Judging from the numerous inquiries that have been coming in the interest will be equally great for the Boston concert at the armory next Tuesday evening. The program will be, Overture to Egmont, Beethoven; Symphony in C, Schumann; Symphonic Suite, after Arabian Nights, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Symphonic Poem, Don Juan, Strauss. The sale of reserved seats will open at Grinnell's Saturday morning.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SATURDAY NIGHT
DETROIT, MI
JAN 29 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTAR.—Interest in the concert of the greatest of all orchestras, the Boston Symphony, is now paramount. Naturally no music lover will miss this concert, especially when such a notable and brilliant program is to be presented. The Egmont Overture, one of the standard favorites of Beethoven, and Schumann's beautiful C major symphony make up the first part of the program. Then will follow two of the most brilliant compositions known to modern music. The four pieces that constitute the Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade, after tales in the Arabian Nights, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, are filled with the most varied beauty, from tender pathos to resounding climaxes. Strauss' magnificent symphonic poem, Don Juan, will close the program. Reserved seats are now selling at Grinnell's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LEADER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
FEB 3 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY VISITS CLEVELAND

Plays Before Large and Fashionable Audience at Armory.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual visit to Cleveland last night drew a capacity house to the Grays' Armory. It brought the familiar lines of hundreds of carriages and automobiles and the familiar bad condition of the streets around the armory. Over two thousand people were forced to wade through slush and water before they reached the street cars waiting on Prospect avenue.

Max Fiedler, the successor of Dr. Muck, stood before the conductor's desk here for the second time last night as leader of that most perfect body of players, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Again his manner and method forced upon the audience the impression that he is a strict disciplinarian; that he is a man of energetic and direct attitude; a leader who drives his will into the orchestra with sledge hammer force. From the moment he lifts his baton he is tense with alertness, merciless in his vigor, even melodramatic in his accomplishment of absolute precision.

A new side of his directorial character—one that stood more or less in the background at his first appearance here—came to the front last night, the emotional, and, strangely enough, during the Brahms Symphony, when it was not expected at all. Brahms, the conservator of classical form in modern dress, was expected to receive a strictly conventional reading. Instead Mr. Fiedler made the symphony a graphic picture of emotional solemnity, with lucid and transparent clarity of intellectual formality as the underlying drawing. The elegiac nature of the slow movement was intensely and insistently emphasized in thought, contents and expression. Rhetorical pauses were less noticeable last night. But his tendency of taking a slow tempo very slow was more perceptible than last year. He seeks, so to speak, a large, precise and kind beauty rather than a grin, gray and powerful persistency in his Brahms.

To the audience Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" was as entertaining as the "Tales of the Thousand Nights and a Night," from which the composer took his inspiration for the work. The oriental atmosphere which persistently and impressionistically fills every bar of this modern symphonic suite, gave Mr. Fiedler an opportunity to demonstrate his ability as an exhibitor of tonal colors and the different sections of the orchestra a chance for solo work in ensemble. It showed what excellent players and what excellent instruments this orchestra possesses. The detail work of the conductor's reading equaled the excellence of the solo players' fine musicianship in every measure. Intensely illuminative in its vivid and interesting contents, orchestra and conductor gave the audience an architectural musical structure of sensitive, subtle and passionate firmness. The "Scheherazade" theme, which weaves its strain through many of the meshes of the musical lacework, in the hands of Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and, subsequently, sounded by many solo instruments, was drained to the last drop of persistent musical beauty. The work left the best impression with the audience. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" (Philip Hale's translation) was excellent in its virtuoso character. Last it's intense "Les Preludes" closed concert. Mr. Fiedler and his great orchestra impart an illuminating understanding of music.

PAUL E. TEICHERT.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JAN 2 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Mr. William J. Henderson, music critic of The New York Sun who said a few years ago that the secret of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert here in the Wieting Opera House on Saturday evening, February 5, lay not merely in its being a "virtuoso orchestra," but an "orchestra of virtuosi" and one of the first published comments on the orchestra by Max Fiedler, its present conductor, was in praise of the way the different choirs have been selected. The brass choir is composed almost entirely of Germans, who are the best players of brass instruments in the world. The wood-wind choir is of Frenchmen, who excel in this department of orchestral music. And the strings are Slavs, Germans, Austrians and Americans, the best products of the great teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna and Berlin.

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done a great work in interpreting the music of masters, out of its ranks have come some composers who to-day are regarded as men decidedly to be reckoned with. It has always been the policy of the management of the orchestra and of its conductor to encourage composition among the members of the orchestra. As a direct result of this has been the development of one of the finest creative talents of our times—Charles Martin Loeffler, who, in 1903, left the first desk of the violins, where he had sat for twenty years, to devote himself to composition and teaching. Another very remarkable talent which has been developed in the orchestra is Gustav Strube, now one of the first violins, whose works have won for him much admiration. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, and Clement Lenom, the second oboe, have also made their marks as composers.

Messrs. Strube, Marquarre and Lenom are now regular members of the orchestra and will be in Syracuse on Saturday evening, February 5, in the Wieting Opera House.

m ..... SYRACUSE, N. Y.
ress .....
JAN 31

Boston Symphony at Buffalo To-night.

Director Max Fielder and his Boston Symphony orchestra of more than 100 members passed through Syracuse this morning in a special Pullman train over the Central. They were bound for Buffalo, where the company gives the first concert of its present tour to-night. Miss A. Katheleen King, who is in charge of the arrangements for the concert to be given by the orchestra in this city on Saturday evening, met the train upon its arrival in this city and had a short talk with Director Fielder and his manager.

om POST
dress .....
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
FEB 2 1910

ENTERTAINMENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in the Wieting Opera House on Saturday evening, Febauary 5, opens at the box office of the Wieting Opera House this morning (Thursday). The orchestra will come here from Rochester, where it will give a concert to-morrow night, and is due to arrive in this city at 11.40 Saturday. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist, will arrive with the orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WILSON G. SMITH.

CLEVELAND, O.
FEB 3 - 1910

ABAS the meat trust! Banzai the bean, that succulent trade mark of Boston, Mass. If we would become high art producers we must eschew the meat habit and become vegetarians. I'll prove it.

What prevents England ranking as a musical nation? Roast beef. What contributes to the musical pre-eminence of Germany? Sauerkraut. What makes Italy the cradle of art and home of song and romance? Macaroni e spaghetti. And France? Well, anything to beat the meat trust—bonbons. Lastly, China, that altenheim toward which modern musical cacophony is trending? Rice.

It needs no further argument to prove that the bean—the Boston baked variety—is going to prove our artistic salvation. See what its vegetarian atmosphere has evolved. An orchestra the peer of any similar organization in the world. Audiences that absorb the master works of music as easily as a spoon carries soup (bean) to the mouth. That is why I cry a bas the meat trust! and banzai the bean!

Whether the prevailing meat strike had anything to do with Wednesday night's audience I know not. It was one of the largest the armory has housed this season, and appreciative enthusiasm was infectious.

Even the symphony—the greatest classic since Beethoven—was received with acclaim. Director Fiedler gave the monumental work a reading consistent with its classic nature. He infused just enough modern emotionalism into it to carry it beyond the usually philosophic mood of Brahms. It was intellectually controlled emotionalism.

As to its performance, it attained as near perfection as is possible. If it is ever done better I want to be there to hear it. While I am on the subject of near-perfection I want to call attention to the tonal balance in the orchestra. The different choirs melted into the tonal esemble as unobtrusively as does the snow disappear under the rays of a blazing sun. Liszt's "Preludes," too, was an artistic revelation.

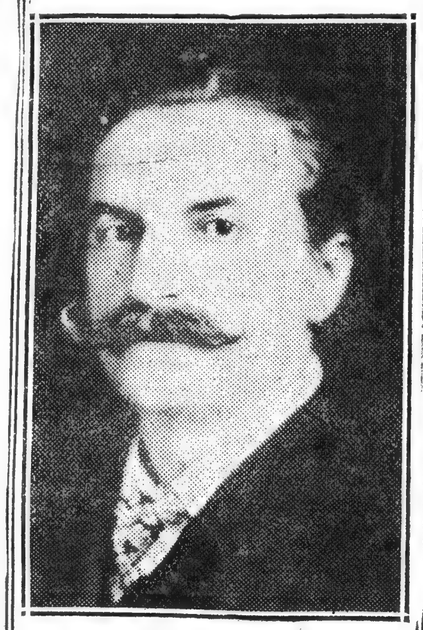
And coming after the impressionistic and bizarre "Arabian Nights" of Korsakoff it was as grateful as a summer breeze. After all, Liszt sounds human and normal after some of the ultra moderns. His one time banality sinks into the shadow of restful repose through comparison. The Korsakoff program symphony was brilliantly played, and its orientalism swept through Bagdad like a typhoon.

It contained episodes, too, of rare melodic interest. Wednesday's concert was the finest ever given us by the Boston contingent.

Fiedler's baton is working visible improvement. Banzai the baton and the bean!

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
om .....
ddress .....
JAN 2 1910

POPULAR SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA



WILLY HESS

For the first time in many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in this city at the Wieting Opera House, Saturday evening, February 5. Max Fiedler is director and Willy Hess is soloist.

spaper ..... DETROIT, MICH
JAN 28 19

Boston Symphony Concert.

In past years the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the series of the Detroit Orchestral association, has drawn the largest audiences of any of the concerts, which was natural in view of the reputation of the orchestra as the greatest in the world. Judging from the numerous inquiries that have been coming in the interest will be equally great for the Boston concert at the armory next Tuesday evening. The program will be, Overture to Egmont, Beethoven; Symphony in C, Schumann; Symphonic Suite, after Arabian Nights, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Symphonic Poem, Don Juan, Strauss. The sale of reserved seats will open at Grinnell's Saturday morning.

rom .....
ddress .....
ate ..... FEB 7
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WEATHER DELAYS TRAINS; HEAVY SUNDAY TRAVEL

Large Number of Tourists Bound for Winter Resorts—Theatrical Companies Change Stands.

Yesterday's cold weather caused late trains and a hard day's work for employes at all the terminals. Travel was heavy, many of the trains hauling extra equipment for the accommodation of tourists starting in large numbers for the winter resorts and of the theatrical companies changing stands.

Blanche Ring and her company went east on the Knickerbocker Special yesterday forenoon. They occupied three Pullmans from Cleveland to New York. Mary Mannering and her company traveled on the Metropolitan from Detroit to New York.

"The London Belles" traveled on the Eastern Express at 11.40 a. m. on their way from Rochester to Schenectady. The "Way Down East" company came to Syracuse on the same train for a week's stay. "Ma Goose" and her flock went from Albany to Buffalo on the Fast Mail at 3.45 o'clock, being accommodated by an extra car.

"David Higgins" left during the day for Rochester and "Such a Little Queen" (Elsie Ferguson), who is to spend the first half of the week in Syracuse, arrived from Buffalo on the New Yorker at 1.11 p. m. "The Great Divide" went through on the Fast Mail, westbound, at 7.35 o'clock last night and the same train hauled the Detroit, Toledo and Ironton Railway private car with President Eugene Zimmerman on board.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Troy by a special train, leaving Syracuse at 9 o'clock yesterday morning.

ress .....
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1910

Mr. Brockway's Lecture.

Last evening in Assembly Hall, Howard Brockway, of New York, interested an audience of persons who expect to attend the Boston Symphony concert with a lecture upon the programme of that concert, during which he played upon the piano a large part of the score. Mr. Brockway showed a close acquaintance with the spirit as well as the technical construction of the pieces he dissussed, and in particular, his rendering of the Beethoven overture which opens the programme and of the Arabian Nights' suite which ends it, provoked enthusiastic applause. They were played with delicacy as well as vivacity and boldness.

A word of approval should be said for this lecture as an example of a sort of education which is far too rare. The difficulties which so many find in the way of enjoying a symphony programme are chiefly the difficulties of understanding what the composer and the conductor are driving at, and to have a symphony programme preceded by such illuminating glimpses as Mr. Brockway supplies is to remove a large part of these difficulties in advance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SATURDAY NIGH
n ..... DETROIT, MI
ress .....
JAN 29 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTAR.—Interest in the concert of the greatest of all orchestras, the Boston Symphony, is now paramount. Naturally no music lover will miss this concert, especially when such a notable and brilliant program is to be presented. The Egmont Overture, one of the standard favorites of Beethoven, and Schumann's beautiful C major symphony make up the first part of the program. Then will follow two of the most brilliant compositions known to modern music. The four pieces that constitute the Symphonic Suite, Schenerazade, after tales in the Arabian Nights, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, are filled with the most varied beauty, from tender pathos to resounding climaxes. Strauss' magnificent symphonic poem, Don Juan, will close the program. Reserved seats are now selling at Grinnell's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From POST
Address
Date

Entertainments

An Evening of Music

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday night was in all respects a conspicuous event in the musical history of this city. Every available seat in our most spacious auditorium had been claimed long before, and at a low estimate 500 persons who wanted to hear the concert were disappointed. Seldom if ever has a programme of first-class music been given in Syracuse amid such enthusiastic signs of appreciation; and this appreciation was for the music itself, no personal or local feeling entering the situation.

The audience made repeated and almost frantic efforts to get Olga Samaroff to play again, and to get Mr. Fiedler and his men to repeat part of the delightful "Arabian Nights" music. It was in vain. The Boston orchestra sticks to its austere and admirable rule. It refuses to break the continuity of a carefully constructed programme by responding to encores. While the roar of applause was still sounding Mme. Samaroff's piano was being trundled toward the wings.

Comment upon the musical features of such a programme tests not the programme but the commentator. There is no greater musical organization than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the pieces it performed from the four composers, Beethoven, Wagner, Rubenstein and Rimsky-Korsakoff, made up an adequately rounded selection of the best there is in the classic as well as the romantic schools. It was a relief to a good many of the audience to be excused for the moment from being tested further as to their power to assimilate such refreshments as Strauss and Debussy provide. It was a positive and rare delight to many more to be permitted to hear Beethoven's famous overture to "Fidelio" and the familiar "Tannhaeuser" music. These concessions to the natural desire of persons not proficient in music to hear again works that they may have heard before might well be imitated in programme making in this city hereafter, as well as the thoughtfulness which was shown in providing copious explanatory notes for all the pieces on the programme, and the great advantage afforded by Mr. Brockway's preparatory lecture of last Thursday night. Equal provision has never before been made for the understanding and enjoyment of a musical entertainment in this city.

The exquisite color and romance of the Russian music and the perfect confidence and effectiveness of Mme. Samaroff in her rendering of the gigantic difficulties of the Rubenstein concerto, as well as her wholly satisfying appeal to the eye of the beholder had much to do with the success of the programme; but the chief feature, of course, was the leadership of Mr. Fiedler and virtuosity of Mr. Fiedler's players. The merest tyro could not fail to perceive the perfection of tone and execution with which their work was done, and the graceful recognition the conductor made in first calling upon the concert meister, Willy Hess, and then the whole orchestra to rise in response to the applause after the second number, was fully appreciated.

CABLE ADDRESS, "TRIBUNE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK TRIBUNE
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 16 1910

Unusual Program to Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" (after the Arabian Nights); Schumann's symphony in C major; Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—this is only part of the program to be given in the Light Guard armory Tuesday, Feb. 1, by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Max Fiedler.

Detroit is showing great interest in Russian music. The program of the Thomas orchestra introduced Borodin's "Sketch of the Steppes of Central Asia" and Liadow's "Tableau Musical," descriptive of the witch Baba-Yaga. Then the Detroit String quartet played a Borodin quartet. Now comes the Boston Symphony with a composition of the greatest of the new Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Its rendition should demonstrate the high point of achievement that the latest Russian school has reached.

In playing a number such as this, the Boston Symphony orchestra again shows the independence for which it is noted. It is so much sui generis that it refuses to choose as its soloists any who are not of the first rank in musical ability. Therefore it is much sought after, for to play with the Boston orchestra is to receive at once the mark of excellence that spells success on a concert tour. But the Boston orchestra cannot be engaged [illegible] to furnish him a trial [illegible] of the orchestra may [illegible] organization's [illegible] Fiedler's leader-

DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 16 19

FIEDLER AND BOSTON SYMPHONY, THE NEXT

Rachmaninoff, Schumann and Beethoven to be Represented in Concert February 1.

Tuesday evening, February 1, the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler, comes to the Light Guard armory, to give the fourth in the series of concerts provided this year by the Detroit Orchestral association. Several music critics have noted this season, that the orchestra never has been in finer condition, that it is playing with unusual brilliancy, elasticity and refinement of temper, and that the interpretations of its conductor, surpass even those that he offered last season.

In this city the orchestra will play a program selected by Mr. Fiedler and Frederick K. Stearns, president of the Detroit Orchestral association. It is not always easy to persuade the heads of big orchestras to carry extra music on tour for the benefit of a single city, but in this instance some notable concessions have been obtained, and it is probable, though not absolutely certain, that one of the Rachmaninoff compositions may be included in the program. Rachmaninoff's high standing has secured for him some unusual consideration since he came to America last autumn, for a winter's stay. Among other things he has been given the very rare honor of conducting the Boston orchestra. He ranks as the successor of Tschaikowsky among the Russian composers. The Boston Symphony orchestra will also play Schumann's G major symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the Rimsky Korsakoff suite.

To those who were impressed by the quality of the strings in the New York Symphony orchestra it may be satisfying to recall that the string choir of the Boston orchestra has been world famous for very many years, and that no trouble or expense has been spared in making it the very best.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 22 19

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give its only concert in Detroit this year in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, Feb. 1, is now in its twenty-ninth year, having given its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881. The concert in Detroit will be the two thousand seven hundred and eighty-fourth that it has given in that time. There are orchestras in Europe which are older, notably the Gewandhaus of Leipsic, the Philharmonic of London, and the Royal Court orchestra of Berlin, but with the exception of the Gewandhaus orchestra, these others are "occasional," gathering a few times each season to give concerts. The Boston Symphony nowadays gives from 105 to 112 concerts in the seven months that constitutes its season, and this is greater activity than is shown by any similar organization in the world. It is an unwritten law that the orchestra shall not play two concerts in one day, and it is very seldom that a concert and a rehearsal take place on the same day. Little things like this count mightily in the efficiency of an orchestra. The sale of seats for the Detroit concert will open at Grinnell's Saturday morning, Jan. 29.

From
Address
Date JAN 23. 1910

NOTHING LIKE THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Play With It "Makes" a Soloist; It is an Orchestra Composed of Virtuosi.

It is very seldom indeed that any one ventures to dispute the claims of the backers of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which appears here February 1, when they assert that it is the best organization of the sort in America if not in the world. It is a serious handicap for any pianist, 'cellist or violinist to fail to get an engagement with it, upon coming to America from Europe for the first time. The orchestra cannot be engaged by any soloist.

With the possible exception of the orchestra of the Paris conservatorie no organization in the world contains as many acknowledged masters of their art. The Paris conservatorie orchestra cannot be classed with the Boston Symphony, because its concerts are only occasional and it lacks opportunity for complete drill.

It is difficult to say which section of the Boston orchestra excels.

Its strings are wonderful in their brilliancy and in the ease with which they overcome technical difficulties of greatest magnitude. The wood-wind section is celebrated wherever the fame of the orchestra has penetrated, while the brass section with its horns and trombones is on a par with the others. In the strings are such famous violinists as Hess, Noack, Roth, Kuntz, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Barleben; among the 'cellists are Warnke, Keller, Belinski, Kautzenbach; among the violas, Ferir, Gietzen and Rennert; among the double basses, Keller, Huber and Agnesy. In the wood-wind section is Longy, unquestionably the greatest master of the oboe in the world, and only less famous than he are Andre Maquarre, the first flute; Grisez, the first clarinet, and Sadony, the first bassoon. In the horn sections are Max Hess and George Wendler, artists that are the envy of every other orchestra in this country, while in Kloepfel the orchestra possesses probably the finest trumpet in the world.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 30 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY EVENING

Orchestral Association Will Take Usual Good Care of Those Who Attend Concert.

Director Max Fiedler has selected for the final number that his Boston Symphony orchestra is to give at the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, Richard Strauss's poem, "Don Juan." Those who know Fiedler agree that though he is a master of Beethoven, he is at his best with Strauss, and critics generally have been enthusiastic over his interpretation of this particular composition.

This season the orchestra came into direct competition in its home city with a newly established permanent opera. Its management makes no secret of the fact that it feared the outcome. As a matter of fact, tickets for the symphony concerts were in greater demand than ever before.

Tuesday evening the Orchestra association will as usual make every effort to properly care for their patrons. The entrance at the west end of the armory, and the Brush street entrance, will be thrown open. The Brush street entrance will be for the exclusive use of those who arrive in carriages. Women in evening costume and light shoes who have endangered their health by standing indefinitely in the crowd before the main entrance, on wet nights may obtain immediate access to the hall by driving to the Brush street door. Footmen will be in attendance to assign carriage numbers and there will be proper police supervision at the close of the concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 31 19

That the Boston Symphony orchestra will be greeted by a capacity audience in the Light Guard armory, Tuesday evening, seems assured from the large sale of seats now going on at Grinnell's. This magnificent organization has always drawn the largest audience of any of the big orchestras brought to Detroit by the Detroit Orchestral association. Its full complement of men under Conductor Max Fiedler will play an attractive program Tuesday evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 1 - 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Orchestra of High Reputation Plays at Armory Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert tonight in the Light Guard armory under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. This is the only concert this sterling organization will give in Detroit ths season and the sale of seats thus far assures one of the biggest audiences of the year. Every arrangement has been made for the comfort of those attending. Carriages will go to the Brush street entrance and both doors on the Larned street side will be open.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 1- 1910

The most important of the concerts given under the direction of the Detroit Orchestral association will occur in the Light Guard armory this evening, when the program will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Willy Hess, the concert master, who has often been heard here in solo work, will be found at his usual desk. It is an interesting fact that in its history of more than 25 years the Boston orchestra has had only five concert masters. Bernhard Listeman, now in Chicago, held the post during the first four seasons. Franz Kneisel succeeded him and remained concert master till 1903. E. Fernandez-Abos held the position in 1903 and 1904. Mr. Hess succeeded Mr. Fernandez-Abos, and he was relieved, while in Europe two years on leave of absence, by Carl Wendling.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 1- 19
FEB 1-

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT.

Splendid Program Arranged for Concert in Light Guard Armory.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play the following splendid program in Light Guard armory, Tuesday evening: Overture to "Egmont" (Beethoven); symphony in C major (Schumann); symphonic suite (Rimsky-Korsakoff); symphonic poem, "Don Juan" (Strauss). The concert will commence promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

To obviate any delay in entering or leaving the building, the Brush-st. entrance will be used exclusively for carriages, and both Larned-st. entrances will be open. Such precautions are a necessity because of the fact that the Boston Symphony always draws a very large audience in Detroit.

From
Address DETROIT, MICH.
Date FEB 1-

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play tonight in the Light Guard armory under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. This is the only chance Detroit people will have this year to hear Max Fiedler and his organization, as this city is the extreme western point reached by the orchestra, which makes only one western trip a year. It will play this time in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Chicago is left out.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HERE TOMORROW

For First Time This Year There Will Be No Soloist on Program.

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the National Theater tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a complete and symmetrical program. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor is considered one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season. Mr. Rachmaninoff distinguished himself as a pianist and as a conductor and composer, and this symphonic poem is the last of his orchestral works. Under his direction it has been played in Boston, New York, and Chicago, and everywhere it has enjoyed the most extraordinary success.

The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the program to an end—the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the overture "Rienzi." The program in full is as follows:

Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Schubert, symphony in B minor, "Unfinished;" Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Wagner, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Act II; Wagner, overture, "Rienzi."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... BOSTON GLOBE
Address ... BOSTON, MASS.
Date ...

Entertainments

An Evening of Music.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday night was in all respects a conspicuous event in the musical history of this city. Every available seat in our most spacious auditorium had been claimed long before, and at a low estimate 500 persons who wanted to hear the concert were disappointed. Seldom if ever has a programme of first-class music been given in Syracuse amid such enthusiastic signs of appreciation; and this appreciation was for the music itself, no personal or local feeling entering the situation.

The audience made repeated and almost frantic efforts to get Olga Samaroff to play again, and to get Mr. Fiedler and his men to repeat part of the delightful "Arabian Nights" music. It was in vain. The Boston orchestra sticks to its austere and admirable rule. It refuses to break the continuity of a carefully constructed programme by responding to encores. While the roar of applause was still sounding Mme. Samaroff's piano was being trundled toward the wings.

Comment upon the musical features of such a programme tests not the programme but the commentator. There is no greater musical organization than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the pieces it performed from the four composers, Beethoven, Wagner, Rubenstein and Rimsky-Korsakoff, made up an adequately rounded selection of the best there is in the classic as well as the romantic schools. It was a relief to a good many of the audience to be excused for the moment from being tested further as to their power to assimilate such refreshments as Strauss and Debussy provide. It was a positive and rare delight to many more to be permitted to hear Beethoven's famous overture to "Fidelio" and the familiar "Tannhaeuser" music. These concessions to the natural desire of persons not proficient in music to hear again works that they may have heard before might well be imitated in programme making in this city hereafter, as well as the thoughtfulness which was shown in providing copious explanatory notes for all the pieces on the programme, and the great advantage afforded by Mr. Brockway's preparatory lecture of last Thursday night. Equal provision has never before been made for the understanding and enjoyment of a musical entertainment in this city.

The exquisite color and romance of the Russian music and the perfect confidence and effectiveness of Mme. Samaroff in her rendering of the gigantic difficulties of the Rubenstein concerto, as well as her wholly satisfying appeal to the eye of the beholder had much to do with the success of the programme; but the chief feature, of course, was the leadership of Mr. Fiedler and virtuosity of Mr. Fiedler's players. The merest tyro could not fail to perceive the perfection of tone and execution with which their work was done, and the graceful recognition the conductor made in first calling upon the concert meister, Willy Hess, and then the whole orchestra to rise in response to the applause after the second number, was fully appreciated.

Cable Address, "EIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YC
TRIBUNE
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
... DETROIT, MI...
JAN 16 1910

Unusual Program to Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" (after the Arabian Nights); Schumann's symphony in C major; Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—this is only part of the program to be given in the Light Guard armory Tuesday, Feb. 1, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Max Fiedler.

Detroit is showing great interest in Russian music. The program of the Thomas orchestra introduced Borodin's "Sketch of the Steppes of Central Asia" and Liadow's "Tableau Musical," descriptive of the witch Baba-Yaga. Then the Detroit String quartet played a Borodin quartet. Now comes the Boston Symphony with a composition of the greatest of the new Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Its rendition should demonstrate the high point of achievement that the latest Russian school has reached.

In playing a number such as this, the Boston Symphony orchestra again shows the independence for which it is noted. It is so much sui generis that it refuses to choose as its soloists any who are not of the first rank in musical ability. Therefore it is much sought after, for to play with the Boston orchestra is to receive at once the mark of excellence that spells success on a concert tour. But the Boston orchestra cannot be engaged [illegible] musicians to furnish him a tri[illegible]. Members of the orchestra may [illegible] under the organization's [illegible] under Fiedler's leader-

FREE PRESS
DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 16 19

FIEDLER AND BOSTON SYMPHONY, THE NEXT

Rachmaninoff, Schumann and Beethoven to be Represented in Concert February 1.

Tuesday evening, February 1, the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler, comes to the Light Guard armory, to give the fourth in the series of concerts provided this year by the Detroit Orchestral association. Several music critics have noted this season, that the orchestra never has been in finer condition, that it is playing with unusual brilliancy, elasticity and refinement of temper, and that the interpretations of its conductor, surpass even those that he offered last season.

In this city the orchestra will play a program selected by Mr. Fiedler and Frederick K. Stearns, president of the Detroit Orchestral association. It is not always easy to persuade the heads of big orchestras to carry extra music on tour for the benefit of a single city, but in this instance some notable concessions have been obtained, and it is probable, though not absolutely certain, that one of the Rachmaninoff compositions may be included in the program. Rachmaninoff's high standing has secured for him some unusual consideration since he came to America last autumn, for a winter's stay. Among other things he has been given the very rare honor of conducting the Boston orchestra. He ranks as the successor of Tschaikowsky among the Russian composers. The Boston Symphony orchestra will also play Schumann's G major symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the Rimsky Korsakoff suite.

To those who were impressed by the quality of the strings in the New York Symphony orchestra it may be satisfying to recall that the string choir of the Boston orchestra has been world famous for very many years, and that no trouble or expense has been spared in making it the very best.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
... DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 8 19

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give its only concert in Detroit this year in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, Feb. 1, is now in its twenty-ninth year, having given its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881. The concert in Detroit will be the two thousand seven hundred and eighty-fourth that it has given in that time. There are orchestras in Europe which are older, notably the Gewandhaus of Leipsic, the Philharmonic of London, and the Royal Court orchestra of Berlin, but with the exception of the Gewandhaus orchestra, these others are "occasional," gathering a few times each season to give concerts. The Boston Symphony nowadays gives from 105 to 112 concerts in the seven months that constitutes its season, and this is greater activity than is shown by any similar organization in the world. It is an unwritten law that the orchestra shall not play two concerts in one day, and it is very seldom that a concert and a rehearsal take place on the same day. Little things like this count mightily in the efficiency of an orchestra. The sale of seats for the Detroit concert will open at Grinnell's Saturday morning, Jan. 29.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... DETROIT, MICH.
Address ...

immediate families.

That the Boston Symphony orchestra will be greeted by a capacity audience in the Light Guard armory, Tuesday evening, seems assured from the large sale of seats now going on at Grinnell's. This magnificent organization has always drawn the largest audience of any of the big orchestras brought to Detroit by the Detroit Orchestral association. Its full complement of men under Conductor Max Fiedler will play an attractive program Tuesday evening.

From ... DETROIT, MICH.
Address ...
Date JAN 23 1910

NOTHING LIKE THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Play With It "Makes" a Soloist; It is an Orchestra Composed of Virtuosi.

It is very seldom indeed that any one ventures to dispute the claims of the backers of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which appears here February 1, when they assert that it is the best organization of the sort in America if not in the world. It is a serious handicap for any pianist, 'cellist or violinist to fail to get an engagement with it, upon coming to America from Europe for the first time. The orchestra cannot be engaged by any soloist.

With the possible exception of the orchestra of the Paris conservatorie no organization in the world contains as many acknowledged masters of their art. The Paris conservatorie orchestra cannot be classed with the Boston Symphony, because its concerts are only occasional and it lacks opportunity for complete drill.

It is difficult to say which section of the Boston orchestra excels.

Its strings are wonderful in their brilliancy and in the ease with which they overcome technical difficulties of greatest magnitude. The wood-wind section is celebrated wherever the fame of the orchestra has penetrated, while the brass section with its horns and trombones is on a par with the others. In the strings are such famous violinists as Hess, Noack, Roth, Kuntz, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Barleben; among the 'cellists are Warnke, Keller, Belinski, Kautzenbach; among the violas, Nerir, Gietzen and Rennert; among the double basses, Keller, Huber and Agnesy. In the wood-wind section is Longy, unquestionably the greatest master of the oboe in the world, and only less famous than he are Andre Maquarre, the first flute; Grisez, the first clarinet, and Sadony, the first bassoon. In the horn sections are Max Hess and George Wendler, artists that are the envy of every other orchestra in this country, while in Kloepfel the orchestra possesses probably the finest trumpet in the world.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
... DETROIT, MICH.
JAN 30 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY EVENING

Orchestral Association Will Take Usual Good Care of Those Who Attend Concert.

Director Max Fiedler has selected for the final number that his Boston Symphony orchestra is to give at the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, Richard Strauss's poem, "Don Juan." Those who know Fiedler agree that though he is a master of Beethoven, he is at his best with Strauss, and critics generally have been enthusiastic over his interpretation of this particular composition.

This season the orchestra came into direct competition in its home city with a newly established permanent opera. Its management makes no secret of the fact that it feared the outcome. As a matter of fact, tickets for the symphony concerts were in greater demand than ever before.

Tuesday evening the Orchestral association will as usual make every effort to properly care for their patrons. The entrance at the west end of the armory, and the Brush street entrance, will be thrown open. The Brush street entrance will be for the exclusive use of those who arrive in carriages. Women in evening costume and light shoes who have endangered their health by standing indefinitely in the crowd before the main entrance on wet nights may obtain immediate access to the hall by driving to the Brush street door. Footmen will be in attendance to assign carriage numbers and there will be proper police supervision at the close of the concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
... DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 1 - 1910

The most important of the concerts given under the direction of the Detroit Orchestral association will occur in the Light Guard armory this evening, when the program will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Willy Hess, the concert master, who has often been heard here in solo work, will be found at his usual desk. It is an interesting fact that in its history of more than 25 years the Boston orchestra has had only five concert masters. Bernhard Listeman, now in Chicago, held the post during the first four seasons. Franz Kneisel succeeded him and remained concert master till 1903. E. Fernandez-Abos held the position in 1903 and 1904. Mr. Hess succeeded Mr. Fernandez-Abos, and he was relieved, while in Europe two years on leave of absence, by Carl Wendling.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
... DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 1 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT.

Splendid Program Arranged for Concert in Light Guard Armory.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play the following splendid program in Light Guard armory, Tuesday evening: Overture to "Egmont" (Beethoven); symphony in C major (Schumann); symphonic suite (Rimsky-Korsakoff); symphonic poem, "Don Juan" (Strauss). The concert will commence promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

To obviate any delay in entering or leaving the building, the Brush-st. entrance will be used exclusively for carriages, and both Larned-st. entrances will be open. Such precautions are a necessity because of the fact that the Boston Symphony always draws a very large audience in Detroit.

From ...
Address ... DETROIT, MICH.
Date ...

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play tonight in the Light Guard armory under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. This is the only chance Detroit people will have this year to hear Max Fielder and his organization, as this city is the extreme western point reached by the orchestra, which makes only one western trip a year. It will play this time in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Chicago is left out.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HERE TOMORROW

For First Time This Year There Will Be No Soloist on Program.

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the National Theater tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a complete and symmetrical program. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor is considered one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season. Mr. Rachmaninoff distinguished himself as a pianist and as a conductor and composer, and this symphonic poem is the last of his orchestral works. Under his direction it has been played in Boston, New York, and Chicago, and everywhere it has enjoyed the most extraordinary success.

The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the program to an end—the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the overture "Rienzi." The program in full is as follows:

Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Schubert, symphony in B minor, "Unfinished;" Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Wagner, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Act II; Wagner, overture, "Rienzi."

... DETROIT, M...
FEB 1 - 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Orchestra of High Reputation Plays at Armory Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert tonight in the Light Guard armory under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. This is the only concert this sterling organization will give in Detroit ths season and the sale of seats thus far assures one of the biggest audiences of the year. Every arrangement has been made for the comfort of those attending. Carriages will go to the Brush street entrance and both doors on the Larned street side will be open.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS DETROITERS

The Boston Symphony orchestra has come and gone, but in the splendid program, splendidly given in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, the remarkable organization left even a greater impress than usual on musical Detroit. An audience that crowded every seat and corner, arrayed in its finest raiment, did honor to Max Fiedler and his men.

A more genuine capitulation to the classic muse of music has rarely been witnessed in Detroit than in the attitude of the audience. Perfect silence reigned during the numbers—an almost unknown thing at a concert—coughing, shuffling of feet and rustling of programs, to say nothing of the chatter of ushers and banging of doors in the rear, being the usual condition. The applause came as it should, after the last note of the composition had died away and not whenever and wherever some misguided enthusiast decided to vent superfluous energy. In fact it was a Detroit audience on its best behavior. Real music-lovers were there by the score, society in all its finery and a large contingent of the city's foreign citizens, German, French and Italian being heard on all sides. The attendance of the latter is no small indication of the fame of the Boston Symphony, for your true European is very loyal to the great orchestras of the old world and it is not easy for him to acknowledge the supremacy of the American organization.

At each hearing of the Boston Symphony it seems that the playing of the organization is so absolutely perfect that there remains nothing more to be attained, and yet, the next time, new beauty of tone is revealed, greater depth of dramatic effect, more appealing delicacy of expression and greater artistry must be accorded the players. The rank and file of the orchestra is made up of artists, each and every one a master of his individual instrument, the instrument itself the finest to be procured, the whole, trained to a perfection of ensemble almost incredible. Dr. Fiedler is a great conductor and he wields his baton over a group of great men, hence his graceful manner of pointing to the left and to the right of the players in acknowledging applause is but one demonstration of that greatness. At the close of the third number the applause was so insistent that the men rose in a body to bow their thanks.

The program was of a tremendous caliber. It included two of the older classics and two of the modern—the Beethoven "Egmont" overture and Schumann's symphony in C major for the former; Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" for the latter. The interpretation and the performance of all four were beyond criticism, and if greater art is possible, it is hardly likely the present generation of mortals will meet with it. Not only Boston but the whole of America should bow at the shrine of the Boston Symphony orchestra and be glad that Uncle Sam can claim it as one of the great institutions of the world.

The Detroit Orchestral association had seen to it that the material comfort of the audience was as well provided for as the armory permits. Every entrance was open for the coming and going of the large crowd, the carriages were handled with dispatch and both the seating and exit was accomplished with unusual smoothness.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW TRIBUNE
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 13

MAX FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra for Two Seasons More.

Detroiters will be interested in the fact that Max Fiedler has been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for two more seasons. This is Mr. Fiedler's second year in Boston, and during that time he has adapted himself, not only to the labors of the position, but also to the life of the city. He stands unusually high in the affections and esteem of his men. The coming of Fiedler and his organization to Detroit is one of the events of the season, and it is a pleasure to know that he will have the leadership of this famous organization at least two seasons more.

DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 19

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Exceeding Beauty

Max Fiedler and his Boston Symphony orchestra played for a big audience at the Light Guard armory last evening, a program that has not been equaled this season so far as pure musical interest is concerned. They played it with a beauty of tone, a depth and breadth of expression, a fire and a pathos which is peculiarly the possession of the Boston organization.

The program was divided equally between the classics and the works of the modern composers. It opened with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a work that contains some of the finest measures the master ever put into an orchestral score. This led up to the Schumann symphony No. 2. Schumann is not credited with many wanderings from the beaten paths of orthodoxy, but under the magic of the Fiedler baton, the strings and the woodwind, and the horns spun strange mysteries and painted unsuspected hues. Schumann is never spectacular in his beauty, which is perhaps the reason why it takes a violin choir of the quality possessed by the Boston orchestra to reveal all his coloring. The symphony is full of the constitutional sadness of its maker, even the lively scherzo is half mournful in its humor.

The second part of the program began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Here one is tossed headlong into the brassy skies and gaudy hues, the blare and mystery of the Arabian Nights. First one rocks with the ship upon which Sinbad sails into the unknown, then he listens to the cross-legged Kalender prince's tale of love and misfortune and hears the toots of his horn. He sees Bagdad in its glory, he beholds the ship of the wanderers as it crashes to pieces on the magnetic rock.

Max Fiedler stamped with his foot, his whole body seemed to quiver, and the orchestra plunged headlong into the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," which concluded the program. "Don Juan" is an unholy thing as Satin is unholy. The bacchanale from Tannhauser sounds in contrast like a church anthem. Yet it is so intense, so marvelous in its conception and portrayal of the vicissitudes of human love and passion that it compels almost unmeasured admiration and astonishment at the power of characterization revealed.

The orchestra and the conductor both appeared to be in love with the genius of the thing. Their interpretation was simply tremendous.

JOURNAL
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 1910

Musical Topics

Slavic temperament and the erotic fancies of a revolutionist gave color and piquancy to the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra magnificently played by that great organization in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening. There were Beethoven, Schumann, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Strauss (Richard II.) represented in the excellent melodic fare offered by Director Fiedler and the last two composers proved to be the ones to provide the most enjoyable and interesting music.

The concert will long remain in the memory as one of the greatest delights that Detroit has been fortunate enough to enjoy in many seasons, for it was not only given by an organization that is excelled by none even abroad, but the selections were most alluring. The foundation stone of the program structure was the Schumann symphony, No. 2, C major. To many, possibly perverse, minds, this was the least enjoyable, the least interesting and the least valuable of any of the works played. The first two movements seem without beauty or inspiration and the fare rather thin musical provender. Of the four movements the Adagion expressivio revealed the greatest beauty and the greatest freedom of melodic invention. But the unresponsive auditor could not help entertaining the suggestion that Schumann's illness, suffered during the composition of the symphony, was the cause of weakness rather than of melancholy. The "Egmont" overture was the Beethoven number, a great work that appeals strongly, but one which does not offer such a minute description of text as some commentators would have one believe. The novelty of the evening was the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") and divided into four incidents with titles vaguely suggesting incidents in the famous narrative. The composition is most curious in its rythms, its color, and its characteristic orchestral effects. It is difficult for a novice to determine sometimes whether the peculiarities are Russian or oriental; but the work becomes most appealing in its exotic beauty, a beauty that suggest mysticism and which is in its novelty and originality exceedingly piquant. The Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," made a remarkably effective climax to this splendid program and it was not the least valued and interesting of the numbers offered by any means. In spite of the unworthy source of his inspiration the composer has built up a wondrously beautiful and moving tone picture that takes possession of all one's senses. The great orchestra was given an ovation and an abundance of the appreciation went to Willy Hess, the concert master, who played finely the solo parts of the Rimsky-Korsakoff number. The crowd was better handled than at recent concerts and there was no difficulty in securing carriages.

NEW
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2-

Detroit Music Lovers Hear Grand Recital at Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, an organization to which all American musicians and music lovers point with pride as having no peer in this country and probably not in the world, gave its only concert of the season in Detroit last night. The concert was one of the Detroit Orchestral association series and naturally a big audience greeted Max Fiedler and his musicians, for to miss this concert is to be deprived of one of the treats of the season.

The program opened with the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven, with its lamentation, the voices of the angry people and at the close a tumult of rejoicing, all exemplified and clearly defined in this masterpiece.

The real novelty of the program was the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Thousand Nights and a Night," and the story of the music is to the effect that the Sultan Schahriar, persuaded by the falseness of women, had sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazda saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Through his curiosity the sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan.

The tales she strung together were depicted in a most realistic manner by the orchestra, the notes given with the program aiding materially in interpreting the music.

"Don Juan," a tone poem by Richard Strauss, full of color, was the closing number of the evening. The whole orchestral scheme is bizarre and unusual. This Don is in love with the whole feminine world, rather than the pursuit of the individual. At last he becomes pessimistic. The pursuit of beauty palls and at last he is satisfied to give up life itself. Before he does so, however, in desperation he indulges in a general carnival, the revels being depicted by bacchanalian music.

The individual selections were not only works of merit and given a flawless interpretation at the hands of the orchestra, but the program as a whole was a splendid arrangement of works of the masters. In the art of program making the director is pastmaster.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SATURDAY NIGHT
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 5 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SAID Mrs. Max Fiedler, at the close of the Schumann Symphony, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening: "I am so glad the audience liked it, and that so hearty an expression of enthusiasm was shown, for it encourages the orchestra, and the men always play so much better when the appreciation is so marked."

Mrs. Fiedler expressed a universal truth in this remark, for all performers and singers put more heart in their work in an atmosphere of appreciation. It hardly seemed possible that the orchestra could have played better than it did in the Schumann Symphony. Schumann, as compared to some of the more brilliant symphony writers, is a little austere for the average musical listener. The spontaneous outburst of applause that followed each movement, and which was prolonged after the last until Mr. Fiedler had to acknowledge it several times, demonstrated that the taste for orchestral music of a higher order is growing among the patrons of the Detroit Orchestral Association. So much visible good is indeed apparent. The familiar measures of the great Egmont overture of Beethoven served admirably to prepare the attention for the wonderful beauties of the Schumann Symphony, which was never before played in Detroit.

The second part of the program was made up of music of a much lighter quality. The four pieces constituting the Scheherazade Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff were not only delightful to listen to, but served to display the virtuosity of the various choirs of the orchestra as well as individual players. The violin solos that run through several movements were played with most exquisite finish by Willy Hess, the concertmeister. Each one seemed more beautiful as the composition progressed, culminating in the difficult harmonics at the close of the last movement, which Mr. Hess played with absolute purity of pitch and sweetness of tone. At the close of this composition, after the conductor and concertmeister had several times acknowledged the prolonged applause, Mr. Fiedler finally motioned to the entire orchestra to rise and accept the appreciation. Strauss' brilliant and thrilling Don Juan closed the program.

Mr. Fiedler expressed himself as greatly pleased with his Detroit reception, and said he should look forward with pleasure to playing before so responsive and appreciative an audience next season. Detroit can certainly return the compliment. A number of the members of the orchestra were expressing their satisfaction before the concert, that they were to play again in Detroit, as they had in past seasons found in this city one of the pleasantest audiences outside of Boston. Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who has been Col. Higginson's right-hand man ever since the orchestra was organized, who has never before accompanied the organization on its western tours, honored the occasion with his presence on this trip, and was so pleased with the reception the orchestra was accorded, and his impressions of Detroit were so pleasant, that he expressed his determination to come again on next season's visit.

All things considered, in point of attendance, and in the artistic success of the program, the concert was one of the most successful ever given by the Detroit Orchestral Association.

FREE PRESS
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 6 19

WEST DEMANDS THE NEW MUSIC

Detroit Progressive in Choice of Program—Four Stars Here in Next Seven Days.

Before the Boston Symphony orchestra began the recent western tour, in which it included Detroit, the Boston Transcript published this comment: "The public of orchestral concerts in the middle west seems more eager to hear novel and ultra modern music than is the similar public in the east. Next week the symphony orchestra will pay its annual visit to two or three cities in the middle west, and in due course the local managers of the projected concerts sent to Mr. Fiedler their suggestions about programs. Apparently it was not the classics or the semi-classics that their public desire, but the music of their own time, even to Mr. d'Indy's symphony, for which Detroit in particular asked. As a matter of fact, the stronghold in America of hidebound and purblind conservatism is the New York that professes to be our music capital."

N. B.—Detroit did not land that d'Indy symphony.

[120]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS DETROITERS

The Boston Symphony orchestra has come and gone, but in the splendid program, splendidly given, in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening, this remarkable organization left even a greater impress than usual on musical Detroit. An audience that crowded every seat and corner, arrayed in its finest raiment, did honor to Max Fiedler and his men.

A more genuine capitulation to the classic muse of music has rarely been witnessed in Detroit than in the attitude of the audience. Perfect silence reigned during the numbers—an almost unknown thing at a concert—coughing, shuffling of feet and rustling of programs, to say nothing of the chatter of ushers and banging of doors in the rear, being the usual condition. The applause came as it should, after the last note of the composition had died away and not whenever and wherever some misguided enthusiast decided to vent superfluous energy. In fact it was a Detroit audience on its best behavior. Real music-lovers were there by the score, society in all its finery and a large contingent of the city's foreign citizens, German, French and Italian being heard on all sides. The attendance of the latter is no small indication of the fame of the Boston Symphony, for your true European is very loyal to the great orchestras of the old world and it is not easy for him to acknowledge the supremacy of the American organization.

At each hearing of the Boston Symphony it seems that the playing of the organization is so absolutely perfect that there remains nothing more to be attained, and yet, the next time, new beauty of tone is revealed, greater depth of dramatic effect, more appealing delicacy of expression and greater artistry must be accorded the players. The rank and file of the orchestra is made up of artists, each and every one a master of his individual instrument, the instrument itself the finest to be procured, the whole, trained to a perfection of ensemble almost incredible. Dr. Fiedler is a great conductor and he wields his baton over a group of great men, hence his graceful manner of pointing to the left and to the right of the players in acknowledging applause is but one demonstration of that greatness. At the close of the third number the applause was so insistent that the men rose in a body to bow their thanks.

The program was of a tremendous caliber. It included two of the older classics and two of the modern—the Beethoven "Egmont" overture and Schumann's symphony in C major for the former; Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" for the latter. The interpretation and the performance of all four were beyond criticism, and if greater art is possible, it is hardly likely the present generation of mortals will meet with it. Not only Boston but the whole of America should bow at the shrine of the Boston Symphony orchestra and be glad that Uncle Sam can claim it as one of the great institutions of the world.

The Detroit Orchestral association had seen to it that the material comfort of the audience was as well provided for as the armory permits. Every entrance was open for the coming and going of the large crowd, the carriages were handled with dispatch and both the seating and exit was accomplished with unusual smoothness.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 19

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Exceeding Beauty

Max Fiedler and his Boston Symphony orchestra played for a big audience at the Light Guard armory last evening, a program that has not been equaled this season so far as pure musical interest is concerned. They played it with a beauty of tone, a depth and breadth of expression, a fire and a pathos which is peculiarly the possession of the Boston organization.

The program was divided equally between the classics and the works of the modern composers. It opened with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a work that contains some of the finest measures the master ever put into an orchestral score. This led up to the Schumann symphony No. 2. Schumann is not credited with many wanderings from the beaten paths of orthodoxy, but under the magic of the Fiedler baton, the strings, and the woodwind, and the horns spun strange mysteries and painted unsuspected hues. Schumann is never spectacular in his beauty, which is perhaps the reason why it takes a violin choir of the quality possessed by the Boston orchestra to reveal all his coloring. The symphony is full of the constitutional sadness of its maker, even the lively scherzo is half mournful in its humor.

The second part of the program began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Here one is tossed headlong into the brassy skies and gaudy hues, the blare and mystery of the Arabian Nights. First one rocks with the ship upon which Sinbad sails into the unknown, then he listens to the cross-legged Kalender prince's tale of love and misfortune and hears the toots of his horn. He sees Bagdad in its glory, he beholds the ship of the wanderers as it crashes to pieces on the magnetic rock.

Max Fiedler stamped with his foot, his whole body seemed to quiver, and the orchestra plunged headlong into the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," which concluded the program. "Don Juan" is an unholy thing as Satin is unholy. The bacchanale from Tannhauser sounds in contrast like a church anthem. Yet it is so intense, so marvelous in its conception and portrayal of the vicissitudes of human love and passion that it compels almost unmeasured admiration and astonishment at the power of characterization revealed.

The orchestra and the conductor both appeared to be in love with the genius of the thing. Their interpretation was simply tremendous.

JOURNAL
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2- 1910

Musical Topics

Slavic temperament and the erotic fancies of a revolutionist gave color and piquancy to the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, magnificently played by that great organization in the Light Guard armory Tuesday evening. There were Beethoven, Schumann, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Strauss (Richard II.) represented in the excellent melodic fare offered by Director Fiedler and the last two composers proved to be the ones to provide the most enjoyable and interesting music.

The concert will long remain in the memory as one of the greatest delights that Detroit has been fortunate enough to enjoy in many seasons, for it was not only given by an organization that is excelled by none even abroad, but the selections were most alluring. The foundation stone of the program structure was the Schumann symphony, No. 2, C major. To many, possibly perverse, minds, this was the least enjoyable, the least interesting and the least valuable of any of the works played. The first two movements seem without beauty or inspiration and the fare rather thin musical provender. Of the four movements the Adagion expressivio revealed the greatest beauty and the greatest freedom of melodic invention. But the unresponsive auditor could not help entertaining the suggestion that Schumann's illness, suffered during the composition of the symphony, was the cause of weakness rather than of melancholy. The "Egmont" overture was the Beethoven number, a great work that appeals strongly, but one which does not offer such a minute description of text as some commentators would have one believe. The novelty of the evening was the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") and divided into four incidents with titles vaguely suggesting incidents in the famous narrative. The composition is most curious in its rythms, its color, and its characteristic orchestral effects. It is difficult for a novice to determine sometimes whether the peculiarities are Russian or oriental; but the work becomes most appealing in its exotic beauty, a beauty that suggest mysticism and which is in its novelty and originality exceedingly piquant. The Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," made a remarkably effective climax to this splendid program and it was not the least valued and interesting of the numbers offered by any means. In spite of the unworthy source of his inspiration the composer has built up a wondrously beautiful and moving tone picture that takes possession of all one's senses. The great orchestra was given an ovation and an abundance of the appreciation went to Willy Hess, the concert master, who played finely the solo parts of the Rimsky-Korsakoff number. The crowd was better handled than at recent concerts and there was no difficulty in securing carriages.

om
dress
te
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 2-

Detroit Music Lovers Hear Grand Recital at Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, an organization to which all American musicians and music lovers point with pride as having no peer in this country and probably not in the world, gave its only concert of the season in Detroit last night. The concert was one of the Detroit Orchestral association series and naturally a big audience greeted Max Fiedler and his musicians, for to miss this concert is to be deprived of one of the treats of the season.

The program opened with the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven, with its lamentation, the voices of the angry people and at the close a tumult of rejoicing, all exemplified and clearly defined in this masterpiece.

The real novelty of the program was the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Thousand Nights and a Night," and the story of the music is to the effect that the Sultan Schahriar, persuaded by the falseness of women, had sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazda saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Through his curiosity the sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan.

The tales she strung together were depicted in a most realistic manner by the orchestra, the notes given with the program aiding materially in interpreting the music.

"Don Juan," a tone poem by Richard Strauss, full of color, was the closing number of the evening. The whole orchestral scheme is bizarre and unusual. This Don is in love with the whole feminine world, rather than the pursuit of the individual. At last he becomes pessimistic. The pursuit of beauty palls and at last he is satisfied to give up life itself. Before he does so, however, in desperation he indulges in a general carnival, the revels being depicted by bacchanalian music.

The individual selections were not only works of merit and given a flawless interpretation at the hands of the orchestra, but the program as a whole was a splendid arrangement of works of the masters. In the art of program making the director is pastmaster.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS TRIBUNE
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 13

MAX FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra for Two Seasons More.

Detroiters will be interested in the fact that Max Fiedler has been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for two more seasons. This is Mr. Fiedler's second year in Boston, and during that time he has adapted himself, not only to the labors of the position, but also to the life of the city. He stands unusually high in the affections and esteem of his men. The coming of Fiedler and his organization to Detroit is one of the events of the season, and it is a pleasure to know that he will have the leadership of this famous organization at least two seasons more.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress
te
NIGHT
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 5 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SAID Mrs. Max Fiedler, at the close of the Schumann Symphony, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening: "I am so glad the audience liked it, and that so hearty an expression of enthusiasm was shown, for it encourages the orchestra, and the men always play so much better when the appreciation is so marked."

Mrs. Fiedler expressed a universal truth in this remark, for all performers and singers put more heart in their work in an atmosphere of appreciation. It hardly seemed possible that the orchestra could have played better than it did in the Schumann Symphony. Schumann, as compared to some of the more brilliant symphony writers, is a little austere for the average musical listener. The spontaneous outburst of applause that followed each movement, and which was prolonged after the last, until Mr. Fiedler had to acknowledge it several times, demonstrated that the taste for orchestral music of a higher order is growing among the patrons of the Detroit Orchestral Association. So much visible good is indeed apparent. The familiar measures of the great Egmont overture of Beethoven served admirably to prepare the attention for the wonderful beauties of the Schumann Symphony, which was never before played in Detroit.

The second part of the program was made up of music of a much lighter quality. The four pieces constituting the Scheherazade Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff were not only delightful to listen to, but served to display the virtuosity of the various choirs of the orchestra as well as individual players. The violin solos that run through several movements were played with most exquisite finish by Willy Hess, the concertmeister. Each one seemed more beautiful as the composition progressed, culminating in the difficult harmonics at the close of the last movement, which Mr. Hess played with absolute purity of pitch and sweetness of tone. At the close of this composition, after the conductor and concertmeister had several times acknowledged the prolonged applause, Mr. Fiedler finally motioned to the entire orchestra to rise and accept the appreciation. Strauss' brilliant and thrilling Don Juan closed the program.

Mr. Fiedler expressed himself as greatly pleased with his Detroit reception, and said he should look forward with pleasure to playing before so responsive and appreciative an audience next season. Detroit can certainly return the compliment. A number of the members of the orchestra were expressing their satisfaction before the concert, that they were to play again in Detroit, as they had in past seasons found in this city one of the pleasantest audiences outside of Boston. Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who has been Col. Higginson's right-hand man ever since the orchestra was organized, who has never before accompanied the organization on its western tours, honored the occasion with his presence on this trip, and was so pleased with the reception the orchestra was accorded, and his impressions of Detroit were so pleasant, that he expressed his determination to come again on next season's visit.

All things considered, in point of attendance, and in the artistic success of the program, the concert was one of the most successful ever given by the Detroit Orchestral Association.

MICH
FEB 6 19

WEST DEMANDS THE NEW MUSIC

Detroit Progressive in Choice of Program—Four Stars Here in Next Seven Days.

Before the Boston Symphony orchestra began the recent western tour, in which it included Detroit, the Boston Transcript published this comment: "The public of orchestral concerts in the middle west seems more eager to hear novel and ultra modern music than is the similar public in the east. Next week the symphony orchestra will pay its annual visit to two or three cities in the middle west, and in due course the local managers of the projected concerts sent to Mr. Fiedler their suggestions about programs. Apparently it was not the classics or the semi-classics that their public desire, but the music of their own time, even to Mr. d'Indy's symphony, for which Detroit in particular asked. As a matter of fact, the stronghold in America of hidebound and purblind conservatism is the New York that professes to be our music capital."

N. B.—Detroit did not land that d'Indy symphony.

[120]

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
FEB 20 1910

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater to-morrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's Birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. The March concert will be given on Tuesday, as usual.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more complete and symmetrical programme than has been the case in the past. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor has been one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season.

The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," the loveliest of all works of its kind, and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the programme to an end, the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the overture "Rienzi." The programme in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture, "Euryanthe."
Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
Rachmaninoff—Symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead."
Wagner—"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," act 2.
Wagner—Overture, "Rienzi."

The Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, both in its Philadelphia concerts and its out-of-town concerts, is closing up the tenth season in a blaze of orchestral glory, as it were. The director, Carl Pohlig, is already planning great things for the coming season of 1910-11, and as he has a five years' contract with the orchestra, the orchestra, under his baton, will enter upon a new era at one of the most important periods in the history of orchestral music in America.

At the coming concert in Washington, at the National Theater, on the afternoon of March 8, a particularly enticing programme has been arranged. Svendsen's "Carnaval in Paris" overture will lead the programme with its lively music, cosmopolitan in every sense, while the symphonic features will be Caesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor, one of the greatest works of the French master. Then, as a special attraction, Mr. Pohlig's own suite of sketches, entitled, "Impressions of America," which has aroused so much discussion in Philadelphia and throughout the country, will be heard. The concert will close with Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

EVE. STAR
Washington, D. C.
FEB 21 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater tomorrow (Monday) afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. The March concert will be given Tuesday, as usual.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more complete and symmetrical program than has been the case in the past. Interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," suggested by the famous picture of the German artist Boecklin. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the program to an end—the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the overture "Rienzi."

POST
Washington, D. C.
FEB 21 1910

MUSICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the National tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more symmetrical program than usual. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor has been one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season. Mr. Rachmaninoff distinguished himself as a pianist and as a composer, and this symphonic poem, the last of his orchestral works, will be Schubert's [illegible] symphony, another

STAR
Washington, D. C.
FEB 22 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's recital at the National Theater yesterday afternoon Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," was given for the first time in Washington. It met with sincere appreciation. But little short of that in its difficulties, and yet exquisitely produced, were Wagner's "Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from the second act of Siegfried, and Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. The opening number of the splendid program was the overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber, and the closing number Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 23 19

Oratorio To Rehearse Symphony.

Max Fielder, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, assisted by the Baltimore Oratorio Society, will present Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" at the Lyric on Tuesday night, will meet the members of the chorus of the local organization this evening in the east hall of the Peabody Institute for a special rehearsal.

The only orchestra rehearsal will be held at the Lyric at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. It is announced that no visitors will be allowed.

The quartet for the occasion is composed of eminent soloists, including Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass. In addition to the symphony the orchestra will present Schumann's "Genevova" overture, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the organization, will play Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 20 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Tuesday evening, February 22, instead of the usual Wednesday, may be considered, generally speaking, as the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, including the fourth and choral movement. In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past several weeks has been rehearsing the tremendously difficult choruses under the direction of its own conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache, and as the solo singers the best quartet for the purpose that is to be had in America has been engaged, consisting of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Nor is this all, for Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play as soloist the Mendelssohn Concerto.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 20

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Oratorio Society To Assist Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Lyric Tuesday instead of Wednesday, is regarded as one of the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental "Ninth Symphony," including the fourth and choral movements.

In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past few weeks has been rehearsing the choruses under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache. The soloists will be Mme. Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play, as soloist, the Mendelssohn concerto.

EVENING BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 19

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard for the fourth time this season at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, instead of on Monday evening, as usual. The program includes, as a solo feature, Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet. The orchestral interest centres in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," recently played in Boston, under the direction of the composer, with great success. The program begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and ends with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 19

THE attention of the clientele of the Boston Symphony concerts is called to the fact that the fourth concert in Philadelphia will be given on Wednesday evening next, instead of Monday, as usual. There will be two soloists—Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and Alvin Schroeder, the 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and of the Kneisel Quartette. These two will play a work rarely heard—Brahms' double concerto for violin and 'cello. The orchestra interest will centre in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was recently played in Boston under the direction of the composer with really sensational success. The programme begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and ends with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 19

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the hope of putting an end to the various reports regarding the conductorship of the organization, announces that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors, it is emphatically stated, have been approached, nor has the engagement of any other been even considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 20 1910

The event of the week will be the return of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist for his only violin recital of the year in this city and at the same time his last appearance, for the season, in the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon next commencing at 2.30.

Elman's wide popularity with the public has been attested by the great audience which heard him here earlier this season with the famous Boston Orchestra, when he drew an audience which occupied the seats and filled every inch of room in the Amphitheatre. Even in the short space of time since he was heard last, Elman has made strides in his development and the hard work attached to the numerous appearances since then, seem to have added to his playing. The programme which he has selected is one that appeals particularly to lovers of the violin and is as follows:

I.
Concerto—D major	Paganini
II.
Chaconne	Bach
III.
Sonata—F major	Handel
IV.
a. Melodie	Gluck-Wilhelmj
b. Menuett	Haydn
c. Standchen	Schubert-Elman
d. Gavotte	Mozart-Auer
V.
a. Meditation "Thais"	Massenet
b. Jota	Sarasate

The Brussels correspondent of The London Times writes:

"This week has been important from the musical point of view. On the day following the performance by M. Ysaye of the concertos he played recently in London the Theatre de la Monnaie revived Gluck's 'Iphigene en Tauride.' Afternoon performances of Gluck's works are being given every Thursday during this Winter at the Opera. 'Ophee,' 'Alceste,' 'Armide,' and 'Iphigenie en Tauride' have already been performed while 'Iphigenie en Aulide' will be given soon. The present performers of 'Iphigenie en Tauride' had to stand comparison with the memory of an interpretation ten years ago, when Mme. Rose Caron was one of the company. Mme. Pacary (Iphigenie) and M. Lestelly (Oreste) must be mentioned especially but the performance throughout was good.

"At the 'Concerts Populaires' the 'Orfeo' of Claudio Monteverdi was performed for the first time. The version used was that published by the Schola Cantorum in Paris and compiled by M. Vincent d'Indy. The latter has succeeded in filling up the figured bass parts effectively, and has found effective substitutes for a number of instruments mentioned in the score published at Venice in 1607. Cuts have been made in the long divertissement pastoral of Act II., and Act V., where after the death of Eurydice Apollo intervenes, has been omitted. This afternoon's performance also included a prologue in which Music dedicates the work to the Maecenas of the period, a first act containing the meeting of Orpheus with shepherds and the announcement of the death of Eurydice by a messenger, and beautiful lamentations of Orpheus; a second act at the entrance to Hades, made up almost entirely of a dialogue between Orpheus and Charon, and a third act beginning with a chorus of spirits and containing the lamentations of Orpheus before the dying Eurydice.

"The dramatic intensity of the work came as a surprise, and the freshness and picturesqueness of the pastoral motifs, in which the clavecin, the lute, the regal and the harp combined delightfully, were much appreciated. While the chorus and the orchestra performed their task well, greater decision on the part of the soloists would have been desirable."

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 20 1910

An unusually interesting program has been arranged by Max Fiedler for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Wednesday evening, February 23. In this connection it is interesting to note again that Mr. Fiedler has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony for a period of two years and the renewal of this engagement has been greeted with universal approval by the patrons of the orchestra.

The two unusual works on the program will be Brahms' double concerto for violin and violoncello and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The Brahms concerto will be played by Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, who for so many years was the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and for even more years the admired 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet. The work is seldom played and its revival in Boston some weeks ago by these two artists created a great deal of interest.

It is probable that no visiting artist in several years made a more favorable impression in Philadelphia than Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who made his debut here in November with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later appeared as pianist and composer with the Philadelphia Orchestra. With the exception of his new concerto for the pianoforte, his symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," is the latest of his larger works.

The other numbers on the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Richard Strauss' Scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The program in full is as follows:—

Schubert..Symphony in B Minor, "Unfinished"
Brahms, Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello
Rachmaninoff, Symphonic Poem, "The Isle of the Dead"
Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

* * *

A musical event of the week will be the return here of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist for his only violin recital of the year in this city and at the same time his last appearance, for the season, in the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon next, commencing at 2.30.

Elman's wide popularity with the public has been attested by the great audience which heard him here earlier this season with the famous Boston Orchestra, when he drew an audience which occupied the seats and filled every inch of room in the amphitheater. Even in the short space of time since he was heard last, Elman has made strides in his development and the hard work attached to the numerous appearances since then, seem to have added to his playing. The program which he has selected is one that appeals particularly to lovers of the violin and is as follows:

I.
Concerto, D Major	Paganini
II.
Chaconne	Bach
III.
Sonata, F Major	Handel
IV.
a. Melodie	Gluck-Wilhelmj
b. Menuett	Haydn
c. Standchen	Schubert-Elman
d. Gavotte	Mozart-Auer
V.
a. Meditation, "Thais"	Massenet
b. Jota	Sarasate

* * *

FREIE PRESSE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 20 19

Boston Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Programm, welches Herr Fiedler für das am nächsten Freitag in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte Boston Symphonie-Konzert aufgestellt hat, ist in vieler Beziehung das wichtigste je von Herrn Fiedler durchgeführte. Es tritt in dem Konzerte kein Solist auf, eine Thatsache, die Herrn Fiedler Gelegenheit verschafft, eine größere individuelle Bethätigung zu zeigen als gewöhnlich, und die ihm größeren Spielraum gewährt. Das Programm wird der Darbietung der Schumann'schen „Genovefa"-Ouverture eröffnet, der die 2. Brahms'sche Symphonie in D-Dur folgt. Der zweite Theil des Programms nimmt seinen Anfang mit der Aufführung der gewaltigen Strauß'schen Tondichtung „Also sprach Zarathustra". Herr Fiedler hat Brooklyn gezeigt, in welch' gründlicher Weise er mit Strauß' Zielen und Idealen sympa-thisirt. Die Aufführung des „Zarathustra" in Boston von Seiten des Orchesters wird als die bedeutendste Darbietung angesehen, welche von demselben jemals zu verzeichnen war. Den Beschluß des Konzertes bietet die Berlioz'sche Ouverture „Der Römische Karnival".

[121]

n HERALD

ress Washington, D.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater to-morrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's Birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. The March concert will be given on Tuesday, as usual.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more complete and symmetrical programme than has been the case in the past. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor has been one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season.

The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," the loveliest of all works of its kind, and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the programme to an end, the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the overture "Rienzi." The programme in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture, "Euryanthe."
Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
Rachmaninoff—Symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead."
Wagner—"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," act 2.
Wagner—Overture, "Rienzi."

The Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, both in its Philadelphia concerts and its out-of-town concerts, is closing up the tenth season in a blaze of orchestral glory, as it were. The director, Carl Pohlig, is already planning great things for the coming season of 1910-11, and as he has a five years' contract with the orchestra, the orchestra, under his baton, will enter upon a new era at one of the most important periods in the history of orchestral music in America.

At the coming concert in Washington, at the National Theater, on the afternoon of March 8, a particularly enticing programme has been arranged. Svendsen's "Carnaval in Paris" overture will lead the programme with its lively music, cosmopolitan in every sense, while the symphonic features will be Caesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor, one of the greatest works of the French master. Then, as a special attraction, Mr. Pohlig's own suite of sketches, entitled, "Impressions of America," which has aroused so much discussion in Philadelphia and throughout the country, will be heard. The concert will close with Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

om EVE. STAR

ddress Washington,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater tomorrow (Monday) afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. The March concert will be given Tuesday, as usual.

For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more complete and symmetrical program than has been the case in the past. Interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," suggested by the famous picture of the German artist Boecklin. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the program to an end—the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the overture "Rienzi."

m POST

ress Washington, D.

MUSICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the National tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Owing to Washington's birthday falling on Tuesday, the day on which the Boston Symphony concerts are usually given, the theater will be used for a matinee of its regular dramatic attraction, and the orchestra has had to make this change. For the first time this year there will be no soloist, and this fact has enabled Mr. Fiedler to give a much more symmetrical program than usual. The chief interest will center on the first performance in Washington of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The presence in America of this distinguished Russian pianist and conductor has been one of the most notable incidents in the current musical season. Mr. Rachmaninoff distinguished himself as a pianist and as a conductor and composer, and this symphonic poem is the last of his orchestral works. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished," and the opening number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." Two Wagnerian works bring the program to an end—the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the overture "Rienzi."

EVE. STAR

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's recital at the National Theater yesterday afternoon Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," was given for the first time in Washington. It met with sincere appreciation. But little short of that in its difficulties, and yet exquisitely produced, were Wagner's "Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from the second act of Siegfried, and Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. The opening number of the splendid program was the overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber, and the closing number Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

m SUN

ress Baltimore, Md.

FEB 23 19

te

Oratorio To Rehearse Symphony.

Max Fielder, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, assisted by the Baltimore Oratorio Society, will present Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" at the Lyric on Tuesday night, will meet the members of the chorus of the local organization this evening in the east hall of the Peabody Institute for a special rehearsal.

The only orchestra rehearsal will be held at the Lyric at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. It is announced that no visitors will be allowed.

The quartet for the occasion is composed of eminent soloists, including Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass. In addition to the symphony the orchestra will present Schumann's "Genevova" overture, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the organization, will play Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra.

AMERICAN

ss Baltimore, Md.

FEB 20 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Tuesday evening, February 22, instead of the usual Wednesday, may be considered, generally speaking, as the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, including the fourth and choral movement. In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past several weeks has been rehearsing the tremendously difficult choruses under the direction of its own conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache, and as the solo singers the best quartet for the purpose that is to be had in America has been engaged, consisting of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Nor is this all, for Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play as soloist the Mendelssohn Concerto.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 20

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Oratorio Society To Assist Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Lyric Tuesday instead of Wednesday, is regarded as one of the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental "Ninth Symphony," including the fourth and choral movements.

In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past few weeks has been rehearsing the choruses under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache. The soloists will be Mme. Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play, as soloist, the Mendelssohn concerto.

n EVENING BULLETIN

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 19

e

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard for the fourth time this season at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, instead of on Monday evening, as usual. The program includes, as a solo feature, Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet. The orchestral interest centres in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," recently played in Boston, under the direction of the composer, with great success. The program begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and ends with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TELEGRAPH

lress Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 19

te

THE attention of the clientele of the Boston Symphony concerts is called to the fact that the fourth concert in Philadelphia will be given on Wednesday evening next, instead of Monday, as usual. There will be two soloists—Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and Alvin Schroeder, the 'cellist, formerly of the orchestra and of the Kneisel Quartette. These two will play a work rarely heard—Brahms' double concerto for violin and 'cello. The orchestra interest will centre in the performance of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which was recently played in Boston under the direction of the composer with really sensational success. The programme begins with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and ends with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

om EVENING BULLETIN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the hope of putting an end to the various reports regarding the conductorship of the organization, announces that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fiedler, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. No other conductors, it is emphatically stated, have been approached, nor has the engagement of any other been even considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The event of the week will be the return of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist for his only violin recital of the year in this city and at the same time his last appearance, for the season, in the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon next commencing at 2.30.

Elman's wide popularity with the public has been attested by the great audience which heard him here earlier this season with the famous Boston Orchestra, when he drew an audience which occupied the seats and filled every inch of room in the Amphitheatre. Even in the short space of time since he was heard last, Elman has made strides in his development and the hard work attached to the numerous appearances since then, seem to have added to his playing. The programme which he has selected is one that appeals particularly to lovers of the violin and is as follows:

I.
Concerto—D major.....Paganini
II.
Chaconne.....Bach
III.
Sonate—F major.....Handel
IV.
a. Melodie.....Gluck-Wilhelmj
b. Menuett.....Schubert-Elman
c. Standchen.....Mozart-Auer
d. Gavotte.....
V.
a. Meditation "Thais".....Massenet
b. Jota.....Sarasate

The Brussels correspondent of The London Times writes:

"This week has been important from the musical point of view. On the day following the performance by M. Ysaye of the concertos he played recently in London the Theatre de la Monnaie revived Gluck's 'Iphigene en Tauride.' Afternoon performances of Gluck's works are being given every Thursday during this Winter at the Opera. 'Ophee,' 'Alceste,' 'Armide,' and 'Iphigenie en Tauride' have already been performed while 'Iphigenie en Aulide' will be given soon. The present performers of 'Iphigenie en Tauride' had to stand comparison with the memory of an interpretation ten years ago, when Mme. Rose Caron was one of the company. Mme. Pacary (Iphigenie) and M. Lestelly (Oreste) must be mentioned especially but the performance throughout was good.

"At the 'Concerts Populaires' the 'Orfeo' of Claudio Monteverdi was performed for the first time. The version used was that published by the Schola Cantorum in Paris and compiled by M. Vincent d'Indy. The latter has succeeded in filling up the figured bass parts effectively, and has found effective substitutes for a number of instruments mentioned in the score published at Venice in 1607. Cuts have been made in the long divertissement pastoral of Act II., and Act V., where after the death of Eurydice Apollo intervenes, has been omitted. This afternoon's performance also included a prologue in which Music dedicates the work to the Maecenas of the period, a first act containing the meeting of Orpheus with shepherds and the announcement of the death of Eurydice by a messenger, and beautiful lamentations of Orpheus; a second act at the entrance to Hades, made up almost entirely of a dialogue between Orpheus and Charon, and a third act beginning with a chorus of spirits and containing the lamentations of Orpheus before the dying Eurydice.

"The dramatic intensity of the work came as a surprise, and the freshness and picturesqueness of the pastoral motifs, in which the clavecin, the lute, the regal and the harp combined delightfully, were much appreciated. While the chorus and the orchestra performed their task well, greater decision on the part of the soloists would have been desirable."

rom PRESS

ddress Philadelphia, Pa

ate FEB 20 1910

An unusually interesting program has been arranged by Max Fiedler for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Wednesday evening, February 23. In this connection it is interesting to note again that Mr. Fiedler has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony for a period of two years and the renewal of this engagement has been greeted with universal approval by the patrons of the orchestra.

The two unusual works on the program will be Brahms' double concerto for violin and violoncello and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The Brahms concerto will be played by Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, who for so many years was the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and for even more years the admired 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet. The work is seldom played and its revival in Boston some weeks ago by these two artists created a great deal of interest.

It is probable that no visiting artist in several years made a more favorable impression in Philadelphia than Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who made his debut here in November with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later appeared as pianist and composer with the Philadelphia Orchestra. With the exception of his new concerto for the pianoforte, his symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," is the latest of his larger works.

The other numbers on the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Richard Strauss' Scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Marry Pranks." The program in full is as follows:—

Schubert..Symphony in B Minor, "Unfinished"
Brahms, Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello
Rachmaninoff, Symphonic Poem, "The Isle of the Dead"
Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

* * *

A musical event of the week will be the return here of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist for his only violin recital of the year in this city and at the same time his last appearance, for the season, in the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon next, commencing at 2.30.

Elman's wide popularity with the public has been attested by the great audience which heard him here earlier this season with the famous Boston Orchestra, when he drew an audience which occupied the seats and filled every inch of room in the amphitheater. Even in the short space of time since he was heard last, Elman has made strides in his development and the hard work attached to the numerous appearances since then, seem to have added to his playing. The program which he has selected is one that appeals particularly to lovers of the violin and is as follows:

I.
Concerto, D Major.....Paganini
II.
Chaconne.....Bach
III.
Sonata, F Major.....Handel
IV.
a. Melodie.....Gluck-Wilhelmj
b. Menuett.....Haydn
c. Standchen.....Schubert-Elman
d. Gavotte.....Mozart-Auer
V.
a. Meditation, "Thais".....Massenet
b. Jota.....Sarasate

* * *

ess

Boston Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Programm, welches Herr Fiedler für das am nächsten Freitag in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte Boston Symphonie-Konzert aufgestellt hat, ist in vieler Beziehung das wichtigste je von Herrn Fiedler durchgeführte. Es tritt in dem Konzerte kein Solist auf, eine Thatsache, die Herrn Fiedler Gelegenheit verschafft, eine größere individuelle Bethätigung zu zeigen als gewöhnlich, und die ihm größeren Spielraum gewährt. Das Programm wird der Darbietung der Schumann'schen „Genovefa" = Ouverture eröffnet, der die 2. Brahms'sche Symphonie in D-Dur folgt. Der zweite Theil des Programms nimmt seinen Anfang mit der Aufführung der gewaltigen Strauß'schen Tondichtung „Also sprach Zarathustra". Herr Fiedler hat Brooklyn gezeigt, in welch' gründlicher Weise er mit Strauß' Zielen und Idealen sympathisirt. Die Aufführung des „Zarathustra" in Boston von Seiten des Orchesters wird als die bedeutendste Darbietung angesehen, welche von demselben jemals zu verzeichnen war. Den Beschluß des Konzertes bietet die Berlioz'sche Ouverture „Der Römische Karnival".

[121]

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York Ci

Date FEB 20

Das vierte Konzertpaar des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet in Carnegie Hall am nächsten Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag statt. Kapellmeister Herr Max Fiedler, welcher bekanntlich erst kürzlich für weitere zwei Jahre in seiner Eigenschaft als Dirigent des berühmten Orchesters gewonnen wurde, hat für beide Konzerte ein äußerst interessantes Programm zusammengestellt.

Am Donnerstag Abend wird Brahms' Doppelkonzert für Violine und Cello, das früher ein Paradestück der Herren Kneisel und Schroeder bildete, als die beiden Künstler noch dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester angehörten, seit damals aber nicht mehr gespielt wurde, von Professor Willy Heß, dem Konzertmeister des Orchesters, und Herrn Schroeder gegeben werden. Das Orchester wird Schubert's „Unvollendete Symphonie", Rachmaninoff's Tonpoem „Die Todteninsel" und das Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern" zu Gehör bringen. Am Samstag Nachmittag wird Goldmark's „Ländliche Hochzeit"-Symphonie gespielt, ferner Strauß' „Also sprach Zarathustra", welches Werk von den Bostonern seit der zweiten Dirigententhätigkeit Gericke's nicht mehr gespielt wurde, ferner „Der Liebestod" aus „Tristan und Isolde".

*

om SUN,

dress New York City.

e FEB 22 1910

MRS. TAFT AT THEATRE.

Dinner and Musicale at the White House —Between 300 and 400 Guests.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—Mrs. Taft, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Laughlin of Pittsburg; Mrs. John E. Reyburn, wife of the Mayor of Philadelphia; Mrs. McCagg of Chicago, and Mrs. Rae, widow of Rear Admiral Charles W. Rae, occupied the Presidential box at the National Theatre this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

President and Mrs. Taft entertained a small company at dinner at the White House this evening and between 300 and 400 other guests were asked for a musicale at 10 o'clock. The programme was given by the Hess-Schroeder quartet from the ston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Ernest Hutcheson, pianist of the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore.

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 27, 1910

CONCERTS

Mr. Fiedler has put on his 17th Symphony programme Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B flat major, No. 1; a tone-poem by Sibelius entitled "En Saga," which will be heard for the first time in this country (like the tone-poems by this composer which Mr. Fiedler presented last year, "En Saga" is short and in the nature of a sketch); Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy, "From Italy" (aus Italiens), which was played in its entirety by Mr. Gericke in his last season here; Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812," which has not been heard at a Symphony concert in a number of years.

Bruckner's seventh symphony will be the principal work on the programme of the sixth Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Miss Janet Duff, who will sing the aria, "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and three songs with pianoforte, Schubert's "The Wanderers," Brahms' "Sapphic Ode" and Korbay's "Birthday Song." The other numbers will be Arthur Foote's suite in E major for string orchestra, which had such a success at a Symphony concert in Boston last season, and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride."

HERALD

New York City.

FEB 22 1910

SECOND MUSICALE AT WHITE HOUSE

President and Mrs. Taft Have Evening of Chamber Music—Society Hears Boston Orchestra.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Monday.

Society had a musical day to-day. Rain fell both afternoon and evening, but it did not prevent a large audience from gathering in the National Theatre in the afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra play, nor did it keep at home those who had been invited to the White House for the evening to listen to the Hess-Schroeder quartet at the second of the President's and Mrs. Taft's series of musicales.

At the White House the programme was:—

1. Grieg. Two movements from quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello, in G minor, opus 27.
2. Arthur Foote. Tema con Variazioni, for two violins, viola and violoncello, in A minor, opus 32.
3. Debussy. Two movements from quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello, in G minor, opus 10.
4. Schumann. Quintet for pianoforte, two violins, viola and violoncello, in E flat major, opus 44.

As the social programme was light, owing to Lent, the boxes and orchestra of the National Theatre were filled when Mr. Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their programme.

Mrs. Taft, who seldom misses a concert of importance, occupied a box. She was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Thomas K. Laughlin, of Pittsburg; Mrs. E. B. McCagg, another house guest; Mrs. Charles W. Rae and Mrs. John E. Reyburn, wife of the Mayor of Philadelphia.

With Mrs. Levi Z. Leiter in a box were Mrs. George Von L. Meyer, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Henry Spencer, Mrs. Mulligan, wife of Captain Richard T. Mulligan, U. S. N., and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Leiter.

Mrs. Charles A. Williams also had a party in a box and so had Mrs. James McMillan. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mrs. Buckner Robinson were in another box.

Others in the audience were the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Mrs. H. W. Kennard, wife of the Second Secretary of the British Embassy; Baroness Preuschen, wife of the Naval Attaché of the Austro-Hungarian Embassy; Lieutenant Colonel B. R. James, Military Attaché of the British Embassy; Mrs. Herbert Parsons, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. John P. Story, Jr.; Mrs. Edson Bradley and Miss Beatrice Sterling, of New York; Mrs. William Manning Irwin, wife of Commander Irwin, U. S. N., and Miss Annie Irwin, Mrs. Francis B. Crowninshield, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mr. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mrs. Lyman Tiffany, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Endora Clover and Mrs. Clarence Wilson.

JOURNAL—TUESDAY,
MARCH 1, 1910.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS BACK HOME TODAY

Scored Big Success on Southern Trip—An Attractive Program This Week.

The Symphony Orchestra returns this morning from its fourth Southern trip, having given its regular monthly concerts in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn, and winding up its season in Hartford last evening.

This trip was particularly notable in two respects. In Baltimore the orchestra gave Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the choral movement. The chorus employed was that of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, and the quartet of singers comprised Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham.

On Wednesday evening the orchestra gave its regular concert in Philadelphia. It was expected, on account of the strike and the rioting in Philadelphia, that the concert would suffer, but, as a matter of fact, the audience was rather larger than usual.

The program for next Friday and Saturday in Boston calls for no soloist. It comprises Wagner's "Faust" overture, Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Sibelius' tone-poem, "En Saga," which will be heard in Boston for the first time; "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

HERALD, TUESDAY,
MARCH 1, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony Orchestra returns this morning from its fourth Southern trip, having given its regular monthly concerts in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn, and winding up its season in Hartford last evening. This trip, which, like all the others the orchestra has made this year, was very successful from all points of view, was notable in two respects. In Baltimore last Tuesday night it gave Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Baltimore Oratorio Society; and on Wednesday evening the orchestra gave its regular concert in Philadelphia. It was expected, on account of the strike, that the concert would suffer, but the audience was rather larger than usual. The program for next Friday and Saturday includes Wagner's "A Faust" overture, Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Sibelius' tone-poem "En Saga" (first time here), "On the Shore of Sorrento" from Richard Strauss' "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's "1812."

ADVERTISER,
MARCH 1, 1910

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS TO BOSTON TODAY

The Symphony Orchestra returns this morning from its fourth Southern trip, having given its regular monthly concerts in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn and winding up its season in Hartford last evening. This trip, which, like all the others the orchestra has made this year, was very successful from all points of view, was particularly notable in two respects. In Baltimore last Tuesday night it gave Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the choral movement. The chorus employed was that of the Baltimore Oratorio society and the quartette of singers comprised Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The Lyric theatre, where the concert was given, was packed to the doors, and there was great enthusiasm.

On Wednesday evening the orchestra gave its regular concert in Philadelphia. It was expected on account of the strike and the rioting in Philadelphia that the concert would suffer, but as a matter of fact the audience was rather larger than usual.

The programme for next Friday and Saturday calls for no soloist. It comprises Wagner's "A Faust" overture; Schumann's "Spring" symphony; Sibelius' tone-poem, "En Saga," which will be heard in Boston for the first time; "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

BOSTON GLOBE—
MARCH 1. 1910.

BOSTON'S OWN ORCHESTRA.

Symphony Men Return From Fourth Trip—Philadelphia Strike Didn't Decrease Patronage.

The Symphony orchestra returns this morning from its fourth southern trip, having given its regular monthly concerts in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn, and winding up its season in Hartford last evening.

In Baltimore last Tuesday night it gave Beethoven's ninth symphony with the choral movement. The chorus employed was that of the Baltimore oratorio [illegible] and the quartet of singers comprised Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The Lyric theatre, where the concert was given, was packed to the doors, and there was great enthusiasm.

Wednesday evening the orchestra gave its regular concert in Philadelphia. It was expected, on account of the strike and the rioting in Philadelphia, that the concert would suffer; but the audience was rather larger than usual, which at least shows that conditions were not so serious there as reports may have led one to believe.

The program this week calls for no soloist. It comprises Wagner's "A Faust" overture; Schumann's "Spring" symphony; Sibelius' tone-poem "En Saga," which will be heard in Boston for the first time; "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

JOURNAL—SATURDAY
MARCH 5, 1910.

SIBELIUS' POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

Finnish Work Calculated to Excite Tears No Less Than Applause.

"En Saga," a tone poem by Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, had its first performance in Boston at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday. Sibelius, a man of indisputable talent, resembles his fellow-Scandinavian, Sinding, whose "Rondo Infinito" was played at the Symphony concerts last November, in that he prefers to paint his tonal pictures in dark colors. Yet there is no mistaking the robust, invincible character of the figures seen through the melancholy mists. The Finns may be down, but they cannot be kept down. That is the impression left by this characteristically Finnish composition. It is the story of a noble struggle against long winters and unsympathetic Russians, and it is calculated to excite tears no less than applause. Yesterday the well-tempered enthusiasm was intended as much for Conductor Fiedler and his master-players as for Composer Sibelius and his fellow-sufferers at home.

Spring was welcomed with a performance of the vernal Schumann symphony in B flat major, the third and fourth movements of which gave particular pleasure. Richard Strauss was represented by some of his 21st birthday pieces—the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonic fantasia, "From Italy"—which showed the Strauss of the early transitional period, bristling with originality, yet still paying tribute to the melodious masters of old. Wagner's "A 'Faust' Overture" and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture completed the program.

Ferruccio Busoni, the celebrated pianist, who has not visited Boston for half a dozen years, will be next week's soloist. His offering will be Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, in the performance of which he is said to be now without an equal. Brahms' fourth symphony and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture will be the other numbers.

GLOBE—SATURDAY,
MARCH 5, 1910.

FINLAND'S WOES IN A TONE POEM

Sibelius' "A Saga" Given at Symphony Rehearsal.

Rendition of the Piece Is First Presentation in Boston.

At the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr Fiedler and the orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture; Schumann's B-flat major symphony No. 1, the tone poem, "A Saga," by Sibelius, for the first time in Boston; "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Strauss' Symphonic Fantasia, "From Italy"; the "1812" overture by Tschaikowsky, with Mr Marshall as organist.

The new Sibelius tone poem was most able of all to arouse and hold the hearer's interest. This was not merely because it was a novelty, for the work itself is the product of aggressive individuality, grim concentration, towering seriousness and an admirable acquaintance with orchestral resource.

Sibelius is least of all a cosmopolitan. He broods upon the fate of his native country of Finland, of the suffering and cruelties which his countrymen have endured, and upon their unquenchable love of liberty, which persistent adversity has intensified.

He paints in dark, harrowing and grewsome colors and blends of tints without apology or palliation. His use of dissonance is striking and notable. It becomes a personal voice. To ears measuring all combinations of sound according to their tuneful sweetness, the prolonged chords in the wood wind, harsh and refusing to be resolved, were distressing. Heard as the voice of suffering, they were poignantly expressive.

In his second symphony, recently played, Sibelius is as unswerving in his allegiance to his locale, and in the aggressive independence of his methods, but he appears often to let them lead him into unqualified ugliness void of illusion either of stress or of rebellion.

A Rugged Theme.

"A Saga" is virile with the ruggedness of jutting rocks and northern seas. To the expression of such a theme Sibelius has used the gray, desolate colors of his low wood winds, the low voices in both strings and reeds in the lament of long-sustained and mournful phrases. He has set the orchestra over against itself in a seething mass of contending tones, which beat upon each other with the fury of armies until they crash in a final onset.

Blind, groping, pitiful silence follows, the more intense for the wailing of a few feeble voices as if in helpless protest. Hope revives in the purposeful reiteration by the noble-voiced clarinet of the theme previously heard upon the disconsolate violas. It still bespeaks the horror of past wrongs, but it glows now with courage for the future. It recounts pages in the history of Finland which are beyond the province of stilted and obvious words. It was played with power and understanding.

[122]

TRANSCRIPT

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MUSIC OF HEROIC LEGEND FROM FINLAND

Sibelius's Saga for Its First Performance in Boston and Its Traits of Savage Grandeur, Brevity and Earnestness—Schumann's "Spring" Symphony Again After a Long Silence and Mr. Fiedler's Exceptionally Happy Manner of Dealing with It—Wagner's "Faust" Overture to Complete a Week of Oddly Coincidental Faust Music

If anyone wishes to compose an essay on sincerity in music, Sibelius is a text. Earlier this season his second Symphony was played here, and whether or not the children of Anglo-Saxons understood this fiery Scandinavian, there was, at least, no doubt of his earnestness. Yesterday afternoon Symphony Hall heard for the first time his tone poem, "A Saga." It is short. It is frequently violent. Both brevity and savage earnestness consort with such a narrative of heroic legend as the music seeks to reproduce. The devices of instrumentation are bold, though hardly, in the main, innovations. Their use seems the natural language of the mood. The violins begin in a vaguely rich shimmer of pianissimo; a viola soliloquizes; bold figures stalk in the deeper registers of the double basses and brass, against the background of strings in subdued chanting; a storm of plucked strings sweeps the violoncellos against clamorous horns; or, for a conclusion, comes the long passage for muted strings while a clarinet muses over the softest roll of drumsticks on cymbals, something at once as crisp, as eloquent and as vital as wooing in sharp Northern weather—heroic wooing on a wild moor in frosty air. These are the syllables of the tongue which Sibelius speaks. They are little more. His eloquence is, as has been intimated, a matter of sincerity. The music has color, as we understand color of Sibelius. That is to say, its browns, drabs and grays are in infinite gradations as those of a Northern moor. The scene is not one of desolation. The scene is one of grandeur that is gloomy only to the timid. Again, this saga is not the music of rhyme; it is not even the music of metre; what it is superlatively is the music of rhythmical is conciseness, and it leaves, accordingly, a more unified impression of its qualities than the Symphony. But it leaves, in common with the Symphony, a haunting mood that persists when the Strauss and Tschaikowsky which followed have sounded and passed; something which abides as that poignant chanting phrase of the violins which opens and closes the first movement of the Symphony. In that work and in this we seem, with the composer, to have had a vision or dreamed a dream. We seem to have seen something.

It was good to hear the horn call of Schumann's first symphony sounding "over the heights" once more, and it is doubtful if the real beauty of the music has ever been summoned from the orchestra more completely than Mr. Fiedler called it out yesterday afternoon. It is justly named a "spring" symphony. Its most loyal admirers are bound to admit that the frost is not yet all out of its ground and that here and there in the road is a stretch of heavy going. Mr. Gericke used to cross these places on the sleek polish of a sled; Dr. Muck, by the impetuosity of his progress; Mr. Weingartner, who once essayed it here as a visiting conductor with a visiting orchestra, spurred across cavalierly. Mr. Fiedler's way is the most satisfactory of them all. He crosses honestly, on broad tires. It has been noted of him before this how he "cleans up" obscure instrumentation. His discrimination and his command of the fine shades of orchestral voices have rarely been more adroitly put to work than in Schumann's music yesterday afternoon. To particularize: his accentuation in the brilliant opening of the Allegro Molto Vicace etched the music on the auditors' consciousness as definitely as line drawing; again, he beat out the rhythm of the Scherzo with a hand that felt the right tempo into fractions of the instant. It was incisive; it was spirited without being over-eager; it was impetuous and yet had a flavor of deliberation. Mr. Fiedler's hand has done many bigger things, it has seldom, however, been employed more adroitly than while it fashioned yesterday afternoon the climax and cadence of Schumann's first symphony, feeling out its slightest nuance, interpreting its poetry, and breathing the warm, mild air of the season into its fresh and joyous pages.

For the rest came the third movement of Strauss's Symphonic Fantasia "From Italy," an excerpt which finds the symphonist in as melodious a vein as he knows; Wagner's contribution to the musical literature of "Faust," and Tschaikowsky's patriotic overture, "1812." We shall have heard here, by the week's end, three of the extant musical versions of the legend, no slight coincidence as musical events go. Earlier in the week at the Boston Opera came Boito's tribute; and this evening in the same place, while the Symphony Orchestra is repeating Wagner's Overture, comes Gounod's opera. All three unite to the same impression. Boito summarizes; Gounod sentimentalizes; Wagner philosophizes. Each presents an aspect; none is complete. Wagner does not profess to be complete; Boito does not succeed in being complete; Gounod does n't care whether he is complete or not. This being the situation, preference is entirely a matter of taste. To conclude the concert Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture marshalled its battalions. The church bells sounded tocsin; but the church bells were not a success. Neither, for that matter, were the blows of the drumstick sullenly booming the simulated cannon shots. The sounds chiefly suggested Russian multitudes falling flat on their faces when the great guns went off. Is it a Russian or an Oriental custom? "1812" is naturally far above the average "occasional" music. Still, it was not in a public square, with church bells, cannon and "a full brass band ad lib," that Tschaikowsky sought the serious things of his art, and the overture plainly shows it. In other respects we are back in the days of "peace jubilees," Gilmore's Band and "The Star Spangled Banner," audience joining.

L. E.

POST, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1910

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was a striking novelty upon the programme of the 17th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Sibelius' tone-poem, "A Saga," heard then for the first time in this city.

The piece is remarkably colored. It is programmeless, and a programme upon the fly leaf of a score would be a reflection upon the greatness of the music. Like everything that leaps from the pen of Sibelius, this work has the weight of years, the reveries of centuries, the surcharged consciousness of a down-trodden people behind it. Perhaps its greatest characteristic is the might of inspiration, the spirit which ignores today with an absorption that defeats today and puts us back, as nothing else that I know of in music, into primeval ages.

As absolute music, this tone-poem is not as pretentious as, say, Sibelius' two symphonies. But when it comes to awaking within us the memories that centuries have not been able to eradicate in the bones of mankind, the composer has nowhere surpassed his strange and extraordinary phantasy; and of all his individual feats in handling the orchestra, he has outdone himself here in the singular coloring of his ideas—coloring which is so effective, so unforgettable, because it is the result of direct necessity. That is to say, a great man gets upon his feet and speaks, without sham, without elegance, without equivocating. And when that is done it can only be done in one inevitable way.

"A Saga"? Every melody—and the rhapsodie is constructed upon the economical basis of about four phrases—is itself a saga. The rolling bass drum and the peculiar arpeggiated figures of the divided strings put one at once in a strange land of gloom and big deeds, and there is the note of the supernatural. Nature undefiled has always, even for civilized man, her touch of the supernatural. There is the long swinging chant of an army, the assembling of hosts, wild dances, profound melancholy, uncanny forebodings of oncoming fate. Finally, the orchestra rises with magnificent and indomitable energy, rises against every opposition, so to speak, to a shattering climax, when suddenly—silence, hopelessness, the inevitable, and in the midst of orchestral tone that does indeed suggest endless wastes and the blackness of despair the violas dwell upon the unconquerable rhythm of a march that went before.

HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY PLAYS SIBELIUS' "SAGA"

Mournful Tone Poem Feature of the Program Given by Orchestra at Its 17th Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Although there was no soloist, the second balcony was completely filled, and the audience otherwise was unusually large for a purely orchestral concert. The program was as follows:

"Faust" overture.....Wagner
Symphony in B flat No 1.....Schumann
"A Saga," tone poem op. 9.....Sibelius
"On the Shore of Sorrento".....Strauss
Overture "1812".....Tschaikowsky

"A Saga," by Sibelius, was played here for the first time. It is one of his earlier works, according to the opus number, and it was published in 1903. Theodore Thomas was the first to produce it in this country, and he brought it out in Chicago six years ago next month.

It is said that Jean Sibelius is periodically overcome by strong and rebellious liquors. We are not informed as to the length of the intervals between the days and nights of alcoholic exaltation. No doubt his weakness has been exaggerated by report, for in the intervals of depression, which must ensue according to the warnings of those combatting the Demon Rum by tract and lecture, this same Sibelius has been profitably busy and his imagination has had full and unembarrassed play.

There may yet be a Sibelius legend; that this composer of Finland wrote his best works under the influence of liquor; just as there is a Fielding legend, a Hoffmann legend, a Poe legend; but poet, novelist, musician never wrote anything that the world cared for when he was alcoholically drunk, and no constant and two-handed drinker could turn out the quantity or quality of work that made the reputation of the men just named. If Sibelius really is a victim of appetite, the saying of Abraham Lincoln concerning Gen. Grant may be applied to his case, and a barrel of Sibelius' favorite tipple should be sent at once to certain modern composers—a puncheon or two to Max Reger, whose notorious indulgence in beer may be detected in the thickness and garrulity of his scoring.

Sibelius has given no program in explanation of his "Saga"; he has not hinted at any literary material though some of his compositions have been inspired by the "Kalevala," the national Epic of Finland. He has said that the thematic material of "A Saga" is wholly of his own invention. Mrs. Newmarch thinks the music suggests the recital of some old tale. This discovery is not particularly ingenious. She infers from the title, that this tale is Scandinavian rather than Finish. Why? Dr. Niemann insists that the tone-poem relates to Finland, and that the fate of a people is musically described. Is it necessary to believe this? Was Finland so thoroughly oppressed by Russia when Sibelius composed this music? Was the composer not then receiving from the Russian government a stipend, of which he was deprived only recently?

It is more probable that the composer was inspired to write "A Saga" by some old recital of heroic and pathetic deeds or by the idea of writing music in Saga vein. The tone-poem is interesting in certain well defined ways, both technically and aesthetically. There is an original use of instruments in combination and in special treatment to give the appropriate atmosphere, to establish moods, and not merely for bizarre effects. There are highly original harmonic progressions. The themes, though the composer's own, have folk character. This one may to some bring thoughts of the Finnish landscape. That one, by its monotonous rhythm, by its sing-song, may bring the reciter of old tales before the eye. Other hearers may be reminded of "ancestral voices prophesying war." This is true, that the music is unusual, now virile, now sad with the profound and manly sadness of a northern and melancholy race; that it is highly individual and nobly imagnitive; that the ending is one of singular beauty. The music yesterday made a deep impression on the audience.

It was a happy idea of Mr. Fiedler to put in juxtaposition with this chill lament from the North the sensuous music of Strauss, music that reflects the sea just stirring under an Italian sun.

There are pages of Wagner's overture that now seem old fashioned and mediocre, and there have been more effective performances here than that of yesterday. Schumann's Symphony was appropriate to the day without, and the second and third movements were well played. Mr. Fiedler, who of late has been inclined to rush the pace of fast movements, took the first allegro at such speed that the detail suffered at time, and the finale was more animated than graceful. So, too, in Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, which was written for performance in the open air, there were instances of injurious speed, as the announcement of the allegro's first theme and the treatment of the third or "Cossack" motive. There has been one memorable performance of this overture in Boston, the one led by Mascagni in Symphony Hall in November, 1902.

The program of the concerts of next week will include Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5 (Ferruccio Busoni, pianist); Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde."

GLOBE—MARCH 6, 1910.

Next Symphony Concert.

Ferruccio Busoni will next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening be the soloist with the Symphony orchestra. Busoni is today one of the world's very great pianists. All the promise seen in his younger days when he was a resident of Boston and all the promise that he showed when he was last in this country six or seven years ago he has more than fulfilled.

When he made his first appearance this year in New York with the Philharmonic society, playing the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto which he will play here, he aroused extraordinary enthusiasm in the audience and [illegible] press comments were unusually warm in his favor.

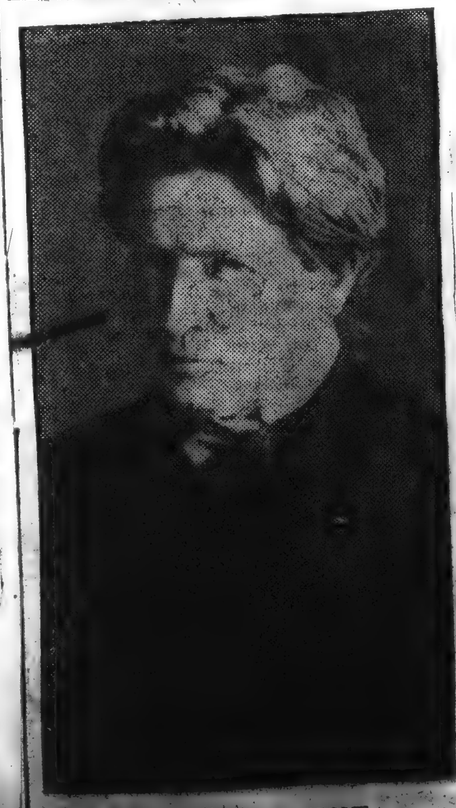
Busoni today holds very high rank in the musical world, not only as a pianist but as a conductor, in which capacity he has for several years past been the chief prophet of young composers in Berlin, and as a composer.

The symphony will be Brahm's fourth in E minor, and the other number on the program will be Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 6, 1910

Busoni's Career

There is exceptional interest in Ferrucio Busoni's appearance next week with the Symphony Orchestra, when he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and in the recital which one of the most noted pianists of the day will give in Jordan Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 16th. Busoni is now in his 45th year. As a technician he has no superior today. He has long since conquered the literature of the piano, and, a composer of note himself, has made arrangements of Bach's works for the instrument which are monumental and beyond the capabilities of the average concert pianist. As a young man he was a passionate student, so much so that as a teacher at the New England Conservatory some years ago he was often found at his practice when pupils waited at the studio. His pianistic feats have in some instances passed into legend, but his musicianship and his artistry have grown with his other accomplishments. When Mr. Busoni gave his first New York recital this season he was acclaimed as Daniel come to judgment, and there was no dissenting voice. Mr. Busoni will repeat his New York programme on the 16th.



FERRUCCIO BUSONI,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[123]

ADVE[illegible]
MARCH 5, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT PURELY ORCHESTRAL

MODERATELY MODERN MUSIC THIS WEEK

New Feature of the Programme Is Sibelius' "En Saga"—Strauss' "At Sorrento."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—Faust Overture.
Schumann—Symphony in B flat No. 1.
Sibelius—"En Saga" (new).
Strauss—"At Sorrento" from "In Italy," Symphonic Poem.
Tschaikowsky—"1812" Overture.

The orchestra has come back from its foreign conquests, and while it was teaching New York a lesson in perfection of ensemble and technique, a flying column of New Yorkers invaded Boston and gave us a lesson in virility and enthusiasm. We feel confident that the interpretation of Schumann on this occasion was, in some respects, beyond what Mahler could have given us, but in spite of the clangor of "1812" we wondered what might have been if the Philharmonic, with its superb brasses, had attempted it. In music we disagree with Mrs. Malaprop's view that "comparisons are odorous," but find them beneficial and educational.

The programme was made up of the "left centre" of music. It was modern, but of what has now become a conservative modernism, which does not sin either in prolixity, or in fierce dissonances, in formlessness, or in obscure meanings.

We have had a strong dose of Goethe reduced to music recently. There has been Goethe sugared, a la Gounod, Goethe danced and pageantized, a la Boito, and now we have Goethe sans Marguerite, a la Wagner.

We may as well confess that we have never got under the shell of the "Faust" Overture. It always seems to us a grumbling, fretful and very fragmentary Faust that is here portrayed. The reading was a very clear one and the brasses were remarkably sure in attack and phrasing, but the work itself seemed no more attractive to us than heretofore.

After all, the poetic thought of a composition outweighs its orchestral tone-coloring! How amateurish the scoring of Schumann sounds when heard beside that of Richard Strauss! Yet Schumann's symphony of Love, and Spring, and happiness, will be played and prized when "Salome" and "Elektra" will be upon the shelf. Yet we wish that the opening notes, d, b-flat, c and d, might be changed to b-flat, g, a and b-flat, as Schumann originally thought them. He only altered them because of the limitations of the natural horns and trumpets of his day.

Mr. Fiedler loves Schumann's works, and this affection was evident in the reading. The brightness of the first movement, the pensive character of the second, the great crescendos of the finale, were each given with their appropriate spirit. As regards the Scherzo, it is the brightest of all the Scherzos that Schumann wrote, but Schumann was never daintily playful, in this movement like Mendelssohn, or grotesque or jesting in the style of Beethoven. Yet we must remember that he founded the shape that is here used—the Scherzo with two Trios—a decided improvement upon the Scherzo with repeated Trio, as used by Beethoven in his fourth and seventh symphonies—the former often miscalled a Minuet.

There were a few points of tempo where we might cavil. The Introduction had some over-slow measures, as had also the Coda of the Scherzo. The Finale had its chief theme taken too quick. But the great crescendi of the Finale and the breadth of the Larghetto were commendably taken up.

It seems incredible that England once held the kid-gloved Adagio of the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn much greater than this noble theme, which is about as bad as preferring the sentimentality of Marie Corelli to the sentiment of Thackeray. We should, by the way, have liked the trombone transition from this movement to the Scherzo given a little more prominence.

The orchestration has so little to do with the success of this symphony that one can enjoy it almost as well in a four-hand piano arrangement as in its full score, a pretty good test of the intrinsic beauty of its ideas; a test that could scarcely be borne by Strauss or Berlioz.

The "Saga" by Sibelius was impressive enough at times, although it seemed rather long for what it had to say, and there was much reiteration, but the picturesque monotony had a power of its own. It had no definite story to tell, any more than Canning's Needy Knife-grinder, or Mahler's symphonies, or Chopin's Ballades. Like the last-named it is in the contrasted and recital vein of a story, but it leaves each auditor free to fit his own thoughts to the music. This being the case we think that "Jamboree—The Morning After—Katzenjammer—Das Graue Elend"—might fit the work fairly well.

It is in the folk-music vein, although the themes may be original. Sibelius, Grieg, Sinding, etc., caught up the moods of the North so well that they could reproduce the spirit of the people's melodies of their native land, without copying the themes themselves.

There was some of the Northern vigor (akin to gaiety) in the dance of rhythms of the early part of this work, but there was a preponderance of Norse gloom in which tuba, trombones and bass-drum played their part, the deep orchestral growls reminding of Tschaikowsky's scoring in some cases. There were portentous moments and instants of dark foreboding, but one became used to the effects some time before the end of the work was reached.

The strings were used in every possible way, and no one needs to be told that our string orchestra brought these effects out finely. There were spiccato touches against pizzicato, there were passages "sull Ponticello" which gave forth tiny squeakings, there were muted passages that ran off into nothing—and then came back again.

It is a proof of the inherent weakness of programme-music (instrumental music that tells a definite story) that if the story itself is not revealed the auditor remains dissatisfied. It was all very well for Berlioz to declare that he wished some of his tonal pictures to be given without any clue as to their meaning, but such a test (if it were possible) would have weakened his effects greatly.

Richard Strauss, who has sometimes been audaciously freakish in his definitions of music and of his own in particular, has said that every composer has a picture in his mind when he is writing, but we hold that the picture needs to be revealed before the music can make its full effect. The proof of these statements was given by the "Saga" of this concert, which was not quite as powerful as the more fully explained programme-music of Sinding or his "Absolute Music," which tells no story at all. For all this shortcoming the composition was well worth hearing and playing, and it was excellently read and played.

The Strauss of "In Italy" was a very different man from the Strauss of "Heldenleben." If he had not yet attained the phenomenal orchestral power of his later works, neither had he solved the idea of writing in three keys at once, or of choosing intrinsically, meaningless figures for his hero, or his vagabonds. We doubt if the later Strauss would have taken such a melodic theme as "Funicolo-Funicola" for any of his later poems, as he did in one movement of this symphony.

But even so, this work ought to be called "Impressions of a German in Italy," for that fair land is here viewed through Teutonic spectacles. An Italian would have pictured his beloved Sorrento with romance and song-melodies, rather than with developed themes. Nevertheless, as above hinted, the work showed a more beautiful Strauss than is revealed in the later, overwhelming works from the same pen. Strauss evidently mastered good form before he began to strive for absolute musical freedom—which cannot be said of some of his imitators.

Tschaikowsky's "1812" is a species of Muscovite Fourth of July. It is a great picture of a public out-of-door festival, with church-bells and cannons, and Vodka too. The combat between the Russian theme and the French "Marseillaise" was most perfectly set forth, for it is just in such detail work that our orchestra is unapproachable. The overture will wear well, for there is no doubt about Tschaikowsky's sincerity, while we often doubt the artistic honesty of some of our hair-raising modern masters.

The climax, at the very end, was worked up with tremendous power, so that the audience became as enthusiastic as if they had been loyal subjects of the Czar. It is pleasant to record that the Schumann symphony also won a most hearty recall for our eminent conductor.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.,
MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

MAX FIEDLER conducted Schumann's Spring symphony, the principal number on the Symphony program of Saturday evening, uncommonly to the satisfaction of his audience, which at the close of the middle division of the work applauded until he called upon his players to stand. The applause must have pleased the men of the orchestra more than did the applause for the last important symphony presented in Boston by Mr. Fiedler, Bruckner's seventh, the leading work of the fifteenth concert; because the enthusiasm of the audience for a modern work like Bruckner's often means that requests for its repetition will soon be on the way to the conductor, and the men do not care to grapple with the difficulties of Brucknerian interpretation too often; they are glad to have the tastes of the audience grow simple, glad to have Schumann come into favor.

Schumann's Spring symphony and Wagner's "Faust" overture were the two oldest of the five numbers on Mr. Fiedler's program. Not much symphonic music of earlier date than these has appealed strongly thus far to the present conductor of the Boston orchestra. Beethoven's ninth symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic symphony are certainly to be counted among the earlier works that have appealed to him; but outside of these, few things that date before 1840 have brought out Mr. Fiedler's best powers. On the other hand, there has been little symphonic music from the time of the Schumann Spring symphony onwards which has not received new illumination through his conducting.

There are certain permanent criticisms that become attached to composers and stick to them, decade after decade. A criticism on Schumann that has the authority of time is that he was unskilful in orchestration. Doubtless he can be proved so by the theorists and by those to whom musical composition is a thing of musical calculation, but he did not sound so as his symphony was played Saturday evening. The string symphony at times has the character of piano music, there is no denying it; but as for the actual combinations of instruments, granted that many of them do not square with the Mendelssohnian formulas, what is there in them that is not defensible in these days of orchestral freedom? In this music Mr. Fiedler showed a talent that he has kept too much hidden in the past, a talent for bringing out racy rhythms. He showed this to the especial delight of his audience in the closing division of the symphony, where for a time he kept two piquantly and diversely rhythmed phrases conversing in the liveliest banter and repartee.

Mr. Fiedler has rarely presented a program, long or short, in every number of which he was impartially interested; but he was equally interested in all five numbers of his seventeenth program: the two pieces that disclose the genius of Wagner and of Strauss in the bud, the new piece that shows Sibelius to be a musical brother of Rachmaninoff, the overture in which the good-hearted Tschaikowsky did not allow the Marseillaise to be too badly beaten by the Czar's hymn, and all.

The saga seems almost worthy of sharing the fortune of D'Indy's symphony and Rachmaninoff's tone poem, and having a second performance in one of the seven concerts that remain between now and April 30, when the season closes. This piece of the Finnish Sibelius does not fathom great emotional depths. It is less somber than much of the northern music. It is interesting music because of the originality of its tone coloring, even if it is not so because of any originality of structure or of underlying thought.

Program of the concert: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Schumann, symphony in B flat major, No. 1, op. 38; Sibelius, "A Saga," tone poem for orchestra, op. 9 (first time in Boston); Strauss, "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement of "In Italy," a symphonic fantasia, op. 16; Tschaikowsky, overture, "1812," op. 49.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 7, 1910

The Symphony Concert

Schumann's Symphony on Saturday night had had the additional inspiration of an additional day of perfect weather. The bows were more fluent and the winds were as gracious as those which had stirred outside of Symphony Hall during the day. The "Spring" Symphony went even more springily. Mr. Fiedler was not less confident with his rhythms, and he was even more elastic than he had been on Friday afternoon. He was conducting as a man might conduct in the complete mastery and the thorough enjoyment of his task. It is not two much to say that he was adding something to Schumann. He was adding a clarity of expression and a cleanness of phrasing which this symphony has often conspicuously lacked at other hands. The advance and retreat of the separate voices; the interrelation of parts, melody and accompaniment; the beginning of climax, and the long pause, were seen in their true values. One "followed" the work almost without effort. The warm applause which followed its performance Mr. Fiedler, as his way is, generously shared with his men. The music had given them frequent occasion for the display of their united and separate virtuosity, but the praise, in this instance, rightly was the leader's. He had taken pains, he had delighted in his task, and the work plainly showed it.

HERALD,
THURSDAY, MARCH 10.

BUSONI TO BE SOLOIST.

Noted Pianist Will Play at Symphony Concerts This Week.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be a musician of world-wide fame, Ferruccio Busoni, who is well known here in Boston, for he lived, taught and played here from the fall of 1891 till that of 1893, and he revisited this country in 1904. He is today one of the chief figures in the world of music.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

As a pianist he ranks second to none. He has now, according to universal testimony, added spiritual qualities to his enormous technique, and thus freed himself from the only reproach brought against him by connoisseurs in the past. But Busoni is more than a pianist. He is a distinguished conductor. His series of orchestral concerts in Berlin in recent years were notable, not only for his skill, but because he established himself, as "a prophet of the young men," by producing works by young and unknown composers who otherwise would have had small chance of a hearing. As a composer he is rapidly coming to the front. For many years his transcriptions for the piano of organ and orchestral music have been known to all pianists and four or five of his own orchestral compositions have been played here at Sympony concerts. Within the last few years he has written important works of large proportions, and his opera will be soon produced. At the Symphony concerts he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

[124]

HERALD, MONDAY,
MARCH 7, 1910.

FIEDLER PRAISES WORK OF STRAUSS

Composer Understands Meaning of All Parts of "Elektra" if No One Else Does, Says Boston Symphony Conductor.

WILL PRESENT A LIGHT COMIC OPERA NEXT SEASON

Max Fiedler shrugged his shoulders when the matter was suggested to him.

"Strauss? And 'Elektra'?" he asked. "I do not think they are easily describable."

Then the interviewer went straight to the centre of the question which musical people are asking.

"Taking 'Elektra' as an example of the Strauss of today, do you believe that it or any of the work which falls within the same class as 'Elektra' will endure?"

"Yes, certainly; this music will endure. We are too close to Strauss to be able to make an estimate of his final place in music, but there is no doubt whatever that much of his work is for all time. There is, of course, a great deal of excitement about anything which Strauss produces, because at present it is a fad to admire him. That is not what I refer to when I speak of his permanence. It is the ultimate judgment of musicians which will decide his comparative merit."

"But is it not true that in 'Elektra' Strauss has gone beyond reasonable limits? Has he not endeavored to express so much that at times he has overstepped the mark and given us only a meaningless din?"

"Possibly," he replied, "but you may be sure that to Strauss it has a meaning, all of it; indeed, it has so many meanings that they become confused. In 'Elektra' there are innumerable motifs representing thoughts, persons, actions, and even inanimate objects. These the composer introduces at every opportunity, and some of the most appalling cacophonies in the opera are due to the simultaneous occurrence of conflicting motifs.

Wonderful in Analysis.

"It sounds very dreadful when we hear it, this discord, but when one analyzes it and finds its purpose, he will admit that it is wonderful. Strauss is in many things entirely original. No man ever before dreamt of the uses to which Strauss puts his orchestra. And he is constantly adding to his novelties of orchestration. At first his operas draw crowded houses, both in Germany and here in America. This is partly due to the Strauss fad, as I said, but it is also largely due to the better appreciation of what he is telling us in his music."

"But when you speak of music describing inanimate things you do not mean that Strauss has succeeded in this attempt, do you?"

"Not exactly that," Mr. Fiedler answered, "but something very much like it. For instance, you cannot write the description of a precious stone in notes. But cut that stone, let the light play on its many facets, hang it with hundreds of similar stones around the neck of a woman —don't you see that you can describe the glitter of the brilliants and their tinkle as they strike together? That is precisely what the music tells you when Klytemnestra in her jeweled robes descends the stairs.

"Strauss is the greatest describer of visible things. That is not such consummate art as is needed in the expression of the invisible; but it is marvellously clever. He has a chord or a motif to represent everything and every action. For instance, he has in 'Elektra' a motif which represents wading in blood. That is an example of Strauss in his entirely original vein.

"Elektra" a Gloom and Horror.

"What impression did 'Elektra' make upon me?" he continued in response to a question. "Well, it left a memory of gloom and horror, relieved only by the beautiful duet between Elektra and Orestes. But it also impressed me deeply with the extraordinary expressiveness of the music and also of that which is not music in the orthodox sense. It is assuredly the most intensely descriptive of all his operas. But it is not the most beautiful. 'Salome' has more beauty and will attract many who would be repelled by the unalloyed horrors of 'Elektra.' I do not mean that 'Salome' is not sufficiently horrible at times, but the music is sweeter and the dissonance less startling.

"And that reminds me of an incident which occurred before 'Salome' was ready for the public. Strauss and I were together in Berlin, and he played me his musical outline of what was to be 'Salome.' He had only the vocal score and the general idea of the instrumental scheme. When he had finished I asked him how long it would take to orchestrate the music, and he replied that it could not be done in less than a year. It was done in a little less than a year, but the incident serves to show how important a part of his work lies in the preparation of the orchestral score. He proceeds rapidly with the outline; the orchestration is a labor of months."

"It has been said," it was suggested, "that one result of the extremes to which Strauss has gone will be a revelation to the older school of music. From the tumult of his composition the public will swing back to the old melodies and harmonies."

Strauss Keeps in Touch with Public.

"That is doubtful," he said. "You see, the public ear has learned to like the rich orchestration, the wonderful wealth of tones which began with Wagner; and I do not believe that people will ever be content with what our fathers loved. Some conductors have endeavored to introduce greater richness into Mendelssohn and Beethoven by doubling the number of instruments, but the attempt has never been a great success. Public taste has changed, and Strauss, with all his excess of sound, is more in keeping with the popular demand than some of the greater masters.

"Yes, he is a genius. He is the greatest of living composers, and his variety seems to be unlimited. By the way, you know that he is now at work on a comic opera—genuine light opera without a trace of gloom in its whole make-up. The title is not yet selected; but two acts are practically complete, and the whole thing will be ready for the public next season. Strauss can be as light and cheery as any one when he determines to be so. Perhaps he relieves his own mind by an occasional excursion into the field of light opera."

"There has been a great deal of talk about the influence of Wagner upon Strauss. It has been stated, indeed, that the Elektra-Orestes duet is distinctly reminiscent of the great duet in 'Tristan and Isolde.'"

"I never noticed that so far as the two duets are concerned," he replied. "But certainly Strauss owes more to Wagner than to any one else. Wagner was the great founder of the school to which Strauss belongs. He broke away from all the conventions and raised opera and music drama to heights never before attained.

Strauss Follows Wagner.

"Strauss is his only follower of genius. Therefore it would be difficult to overestimate the influence which Wagner has had upon his follower's work. But you must not understand me to say that Strauss is not original in many things. He has won his place among the masters and belongs now to the Strauss school. He has produced orchestrations such as Wagner never thought of producing. Wagner, of course, was an infinitely greater genius, and Strauss will never reach the heights on which Wagner moved. You can classify the two composers easily enough in the two categories I spoke of a while ago. Strauss describes to you what you see. Wagner expresses that which is invisible. Strauss sees what is outside; Wagner what is within. Therefore it is not possible to make a just comparison."

"Do you think," Mr. Fiedler was asked, "that 20 or 30 years from now Strauss will be better understood? Will his music have as Wagner's had a slowly acquired popularity?"

"No, for the reason that Wagner went before him. When Wagner broke away from old restraints and limitations it took the public a long time to become accustomed to the radical change. But the transition from Wagner to Strauss is not so sudden and thorough. Even in the case of interpretation of his music there will not be the same difficulty which conductors had with Wagner.

Demands on Orchestra.

"Strauss makes tremendous and astonishing demands upon his orchestra, but it will not be long before the intricacies of his scores will be mastered. Of course, I am speaking now of the present-day Strauss — the Strauss of 'Elektra,' 'Salome' and 'Zarathustra.' There is another Strauss, he who had not departed from his early masters, but it is the composer at his point of greatest originality and power that we should consider. Where he was merely a follower he could not be a master."

"How do you account for the great changes which have marked the development of his music?"

"One cannot account for the working of genius," said Mr. Fiedler. "But it is interesting to trace the changes as they appeared. The first stage was what might be called the Mendelssohn-Schumann period when the composer was a devoted admirer and student of those masters. To that belongs his piano quartet and many of his most pleasing compositions.

"And then followed his violin sonata in which the real Strauss began to appear. At that time he began to break away from all established precedents. In the beginning of this period of emancipation he was devoted to Liszt and Wagner, but before long he proposed to throw them also overboard. He gave up the last pretense to classical form and began his tone poems, in which at last we have the real Strauss at his greatest originality and his best ability.

"There was a time when he could compose a symphony, and as you know did so. But that time is past. Probably he could not compose a symphony today fit to be compared with his earlier efforts. Like the public he has grown away from old ideals and cannot get back to them if he tries.

Brahms Is Discarded.

"If you should ask Richard Strauss today which of the masters he holds in esteem he would tell you that Wagner, Bach, Mozart and Liszt hold first rank. Brahms, his former model, he has discarded altogether. Beethoven he likes in a mild way."

"Now to revert for a moment to 'Elektra,'" the reporter ventured. "You know that the music seems constantly to be on the edge of a beautiful melody. There is a chord or two, maybe a bar rich with promise, and then suddenly the whole thing is dashed to pieces in an awful crash of discord. It has been said that Strauss has gone so far on his discordant way that he has forgotten how to write melody."

"Don't believe it," he answered. "Wait till you hear the next opera. I am sure that you will find it full of sweetness. And then, remember that duet in "Elektra." Any one who could compose that has not forgotten melody. Strauss knew what he wanted to express, and he thought that he could do so best by means of the rough ruggedness of his discord. And you must admit that he succeeded."

"What of Strauss the man?"

Mr. Fiedler smiled pleasantly.

"What would you expect?" he asked. "A heavy sort of companion without any sunshine in his disposition? You would be mistaken. Richard Strauss is a genial friend, full of anecdote and good stories. He could be a stern man, but the twinkle in his eyes will not let you forget that he is full of good spirits."

"When do you leave for Europe, Mr. Fiedler?"

"As soon as the season is over," he replied. "But it is only a holiday trip. I am coming back next year, and the year after any way. Perhaps next year we shall hear the comic opera."

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 12, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss's "Domestica" at the Symphony Concerts and Mme. Sembrich as Soloist After a Long Absence—The Cecilia Society in Brahms's "Song of Destiny"—Mr. Busoni's Long Awaited and Characteristic Recital—The Hess - Schroeder Quartet for a Final Concert

Mme. Sembrich, for the first time in a decade, will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra for its rehearsal and concert of next week. The two arias which she has chosen for this concert are "Dehvieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," in which the part of Susanna has been associated with her name for innumerable performances of the opera by the Metropolitan Company; and the aria "Singt dem Göttlichen Prophetin" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu." When the Symphony Orchestra was young Mrs. Henschel, who was often a soloist, sang this aria several times, but it has not now been heard in a number of years. A group of songs with the pianoforte conclude Mme. Sembrich's share of the programme; Brahms's "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmung," Strauss's "Ständchen" and Mr. Fiedler's "Cradle Song." The principal orchestral work on the programme will be Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which had its first performance here during the first year of Dr. Muck's conductorship. Mr. Fiedler's apt and confident dealing with the other works of Strauss commend him as a conductor of that composer's highly inflected style. Mr. Gustav Strube contributes the novelty to the programme, a composition which he calls a "Comedy Overture, 'Puck,'" which will be played in manuscript. It was written last year and bears a dedication to Mr. Fiedler. The remaining number is the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

BOSTON GLOBE
MARCH 12, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Rehearsal Has Busoni as the Soloist.

Pianist Plays "Emperor" Concerto —Orchestra Interprets Brahms.

Ferruccio Busoni, the pianist, not heard in Boston since 1904, was soloist at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. He played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

Mr Busoni is remembered from the two years of his residence in this city, for piano playing which clothed high technical efficiency with an impressive beauty, an elegance and an artistic sincerity in interpretation. He again disclosed these qualities yesterday, ripened to fuller maturity and augmented by a more imposing breadth of style.

A sanity, a catholicity, a sense of symmetry of the whole structure and of an experience encompassing broadly the phases of music, characterize Mr Busoni's playing and the impressions he gives. He is not a mere virtuoso. He is a great artist.

He has read first the printed page of his music and is mindful of its absolute demands of material tones, dynamics and the craftmanship of pianism. But he has read farther.

To this skeleton of the technic of his instrument an ardent and fertile imagination and a guiding artistic sense have added flesh and blood and have molded the flowing, rounded lines of sculptured but vital beauty.

The secret may be in the repose with which he plays. There is a continence, a reticence, even in the largest moments, but there is also unimpeachable authority in his speed.

In bravura Mr Busoni is incisive, rigorous, intensely virile—as in the passage in octaves—but never sufficiently forgetful of the poise which envelopes him to be said to play with abandon.

Perhaps the most pleasurable memory of the afternoon is of his dexterous and pliant fashioning of soft tones. Mr Busoni is an expert in arabesque. Notwithstanding the marked tonal limitations of his piano, he could weave a skein of silken tone in its upper register into a melody of exquisite fibre and proportion. It had plasticity of tempo, which did not stalk unrelententedly onward like some inexorable churchman. It was amenable to the mood. It had lightness, elegance and grace. Thus was wrought many a bit of embellishment, cadenza or striking rhythmic effect.

Caprice preference or other sign of the player's individuality did not enter in. The identity of the performer was submerged in that of his author. It was Beethoven who spoke, serene, masterful, compelling. Mr Busoni was repeatedly recalled to the platform.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 4 in E minor. It is the voice of the man of learning, who is great for his simplicity, the universality, the human appeal of his utterance. Brahms, the last of the classicists, the inquirer after purity and nobility of form and strength, and profundity in the expression of music, at times in his earlier symphonies made the lack of glow and grayish heaviness of their scoring but a sign of their abstruse and ponderous structure.

In the fourth symphony he is writing with larger sympathy for a larger public. The allegro begins at once with a genial persuasive theme, not unlike Mendelssohn. In the free fantasia he converses with a quiet contemplation of beauty, as a methodical and serious mind would reason out a logical process of thought.

The Andante is a song of beautiful melody. The opening theme of the horn with a quaint and delicately exotic flavor in the harmony and the theme of the oboe against plucked strings were charming for their lyric grace and euphony, both in structure and as reproduced by conductor and players.

The third movement is bright with a sunlight which warms and caresses. It had a spontaneity and quickened appeal yesterday afternoon. Mr Fiedler made the movement suggestive of the romantic rather than the austere Brahms.

A performance of Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" which was sensitive to the vernal freshness and charm of its melodic beauties closed the program.

POST, SATURDAY,
MARCH 12, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY OLIN DOWNES

Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 18th rehearsal of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Brahms' fourth symphony, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and Schubert's "Overture to Rosamunde."

Mr. Fiedler gave a superb reading of a work of surpassing beauty. In his first symphony Brahms is a romanticist and an ultra-modern. There is hardly a more stirring and dramatic work in symphonic literature. But in absolute art there is a higher quality, a more durable essence, than the greatest emotional stress. The individual who can say his last word with such a composition as the symphony in E minor is indeed greater than he who taketh a city.

This beauty is at once gentle, plastic, cool and austere in its purity and perfection. And the man who stands nearest to Brahms in his later utterances is none other than Vincent D'Indy, in the great B flat symphony. There is nothing but the highest praise for Mr. Fiedler's interpretation, his the nature of the work, the clearness with which every detail showed without obscuring the design, the wonderful color, at times gloriously transparent and again rich with autumn gold, of the orchestra. No wonder that conductor and symphony were encored.

Mr. Busoni will play again at the symphony concert this evening and he will give a recital in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon. There will be other opportunity of discussing his remarkably developed art. The joyous overture of Schubert is simply delicious, and so it was played. Next week Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," will be played for the first time anywhere, Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" will be second on the attractive list, and Mme. Sembrich will be soloist.

[125]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 12,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. BUSONI RETURNS WITH NEW LAMPS FOR OLD

An Extraordinarily Tame Performance of Beethoven's Emperor Concerto—Busoni the Avowed Virtuoso of Six Years Ago and the Busoni Who Has Renounced These Vanities, with the Results—What He Brought to the Symphonic Concerto and What He Did Not Bring—Brahms's Last Symphony and Its Test of the Orchestra's Finest Temper

Ferruccio Busoni, the pianist, reappeared yesterday afternoon as the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. It is six years since he last seated himself to a pianoforte on the platform of Symphony Hall. These six years had been reported to have wrought a transformation in the player. On that evening of March six years ago he played Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor with what seemed then a half-contemptuous ease. He was frankly the virtuoso. The flashing runs, the clamors of full chords, the fleet brilliancy came with a grace of style which made the mere execution of the work interesting for its own sake. Saint-Saëns of the C minor pianoforte concerto is not being very metaphysical: he is being superbly pianistic, and so, on that occasion, was Mr. Busoni. Yesterday afternoon, to emphasize his newer art, Mr. Busoni returned to us with the Olympian moods of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. It was the concerto with which he opened his present American tour; he has played it often in the past two months, and there is every reason to suppose that it is the work by which he chooses to identify his present artistry.

Now the concerto in E-flat is tolerably familiar here. In the past four years it has been played by Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Bauer and Mme. aus der Ohe. Mr. Paderewski, though he forced the instrument until it smoked, was splendidly imperial; Mr. Bauer was less the potentate, but he was at least the crown prince, while Mme. aus der Ohe wore the ermine with a majesty which was more like Beethoven's own than either of them. She was, if you like, the empress, a large Teutonic empress. There was doubt, yesterday afternoon, when Mr. Busoni finished, if he was even of the blood royal.

The performance was flatly tame. A skilled gymnast has a right to admiration; but we do not admire him in an academic gown. We also suspect that under his academic gown he still wears his spangles. Indeed, there were several flashes of the spangles—in the clarity of the arpeggii, in the single melody that sang in the treble over a subdued orchestra; in the glitter of passage work of the finale, and especially in that intense contrast of black and white in which the player delights to work boldly.

If a pianist has the voice of the spirit in him, the Adagio of the "Emperor" concerto will make it heard. Of all the unforgetable things that Mr. Paderewski has done, his poetry with the ending of this movement is the least to be forgotten. Here, indeed, the solo instrument finds its place as a subordinate instrument in the symphonic whole. Its faint beatings, "batteries," of the two hands in the treble, register the deep breathing of its measureless calm. Mr. Paderewski, for these measures, was rapt as a seer. Even Mr. Bauer, certainly a pianist of secondary rank, floated the measures on an oarage of wings as of some great bird that roams the twilight, while Mme. Aus der Ohe caused it to rise with one beat of pinions. Mr. Busoni never left the ground.

And yet the singular part is that the few measures of interlude leading into the finale were not played so well by any of them. Mr. Busoni conceived them and gave them forth as an half unconscious speech in undertone, a thought aloud. Of course, it was obvious that the soloist had not rehearsed with the orchestra, but that omission did not affect the quality of Mr. Busoni's playing. He watched the conductor, to be sure, with an obedience odd to see in a soloist, but Mr. Fiedler, in the course of much adroit accompanying, has rarely keyed his band at a truer pitch to the pianoforte than yesterday afternoon. The concerto is a symphony with a solo part. Mr. Fiedler made it steadily a symphony, and not once did he obscure the soloist. Indeed, if the whole truth is to be told, it was the orchestra that furnished the Beethovenesque flavor. And Mr. Busoni, resolutely putting away the vanities of the virtuoso, was, as a finely-skilled impersonator, asked to preach. Mr. Busoni can impersonate Liszt and Saint-Saëns as few men living: when he speaks with Beethoven's tongues of men and of angels St. Paul has the last word of him.

Brahms of the fourth, and last symphony is Brahms in all his austerity. From the exuberance of Schumann last week to the restraint and the mastering sense of form of this work was an orchestra reappearing almost in a disguise. Such music as that of the first and last movements of this symphony reveals the final equipment of the orchestra. These movements contain as little as possible the music of ornament and display; they contain everywhere and always what we are pleased to call "pure music." Elsewhere Brahms of the symphonies may cut away every non-essential voice, every superfluous note, and fling the design of his work out in broad simple and bold outline. Here the structure is compact. The weaving is close. The texture is fine and the pattern gleams and glistens large in the rich fabric. In the orderly development of its themes one does not feel an effort. It is the joy of the mind in acute thinking, the pleasure of creating, and the mastery of method. Often, the melody rose full-throated, thickened with the sombre voices of violoncellos and refined with the choiring of the wood wind. Mr. Fiedler caused it to flow amply with some of the repose and the irresistible onward sweep of a quiet river, broad in current between low banks. Such was the sere and yellow Andante, and such, in a different tempo, the stately grace of the Allegro giocoso. If we are minded to smile before the beginning of the finale, at the thought of Brahms's "passionate," the finale is not slow to teach that passion can be dignified by one word. Brahms's passion is intellectual. This, finally, is the music of impassioned thought.

L. P.

ADVERTISER MARCH 12, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT FEAST OF PLEASURE

PROGRAMME CLASSICAL; BEAUTIFUL THROUGHOUT

Busoni Piano Soloist for Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto—Brahms and Schubert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Fourth Symphony, E minor.
Beethoven. "Emperor" Concerto, for Piano and Orchestra.
Ferruccio Busoni, Pianist.
Schubert. "Rosamunde" Overture.

Classical, beautiful and enjoyable was this concert of yesterday afternoon, from first to last. Every one of the three numbers was in a clear and sane form. It was an excursion back into the domain of Purity in Music, and the puzzle-haunted and dissonance-pounded critic bathed in it and laved in it with inexpressible delight.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony is not so directly popular as his second, not so broadly laid out as his first. There is a degree of skill rather than emotion in its last movement, made up of numerous variations of a very short and simple theme. In composition one can sometimes reverse the old proverb and say—"A great deal of learning is a dangerous thing." For when the symphonist is thoroughly skilful with every device of counterpoint, and sets out to vary a theme, he is apt to fall into the temptation of "Just one more!" as a drunkard. It is generally so with Brahms and the variation-form and it was so even with Beethoven, in some of his latest works.

The very beginning of the symphony, also, shows more ingenuity than intrinsic beauty. The theme which Brahms has chosen, so that he can show his skill in developing two notes (an Iambic foot) is not in itself beautiful or melodic. It is what we might expect of Reger. But once the development begins one forgets the crabbedness of its ugly skips in the many fine thoughts that grow out of it. Besides, we find the remaining themes of the first movement beautiful and the disjointed character of the chief theme at least gives an excellent contrast.

The work received an excellent reading. The sharp contrasts were well defined; the pizzicato effects, which play so prominent a part in the development of the figure, were finely done.

In the Andante the horn gave the initial phrase with much beauty and the effect of the peculiar mixture of major and minor in one scale was exquisitely tender and appealing. The Scherzo was taken with the emphasis and fire that belong to it. All through these three first movements there was a surety of development that was an intellectual feast. The non-musician must needs remember that there are other things besides "tune" in Music. The noblest Music combines Intellect with Emotion and makes an appeal to the brain as well as to the heart.

In development we hold Brahms the equal of Beethoven, but he did not possess the emotional power of that composer. Had he been a little less phlegmatic he would have been the equal of that musical giant.

In the Finale this calm phlegm (call it "serenity" if you wish) militates against the movement. It is skill, and skill, and yet more skill, and only the chorale theme upon the soft brasses relieves the display of contrapuntal ability.

But, take the symphony as it is, and it is far beyond most of the post-Beethoven works in this school, and it was read and played so clearly that none of its subtle devices went to waste. The audience manifested great enthusiasm at its close and the conductor was obliged to bow his thanks.

The Beethoven concerto was, however, the nub of the concert. Here all the conditions were right for a memorable performance. A great orchestra, a devout Beethoven worshipper leading it, a noble work, and a pianist of the right equipoise of intellect and emotional power. The result was that a loftiness of perfection was attained that was glorious. Such an Alpine height can never be attained by the morbid leaders of the present strainings of Music.

The so-called "Emperor" is not an equal work. We do not find its Finale nearly as powerful as its opening movement, and the same may be said of Beethoven's violin concerto. The piano concerto in G burns with a more steady flame. But when this concerto in E-flat is great it is very great. And Mr. Busoni rose to the full measure of its greatness. He never converted the grandeur into rant; in the midst of all the broadest and most powerful passages the phrasing was always clear, the language always intelligible.

Hauptmann has called this work a symphony with solos intertwined with it. The definition is a true one. The auditor does not think of the pianist during the performance. He melts into the ensemble. He must abnegate himself and all personal display. Even the glitter of a solo cadenza is denied him and there is instead a brilliant set of passages in which the orchestra shares.

And this was the glory of Busoni's playing. There was no sensationalism, no pounding, no thrusting oneself into the foreground. It was true Beethoven-playing from first to last. The delicacy of the Adagio was caught up both by pianist and orchestra in a manner that won the admiration of the connoisseur. The grandeur of the Allegro was ineffable.

Perhaps the entrance of the Rondo was more sharply crisp than was necessary, but it made its effect. Mr. Busoni made the chief theme here more strikingly staccato than we have heard it before. The Coda was perfection. The duet of piano with kettledrum was a miracle of good shading and the quick crescendo following was virility itself.

The audience appreciated the great worth of the interpretation and Mr. Busoni had a veritable triumph at the close, recall following recall. What phenomenal growth his has been. Yet even, when he lived in Boston, and taught in the New England conservatory, there were indications of this coming greatness, and we recall a performance of Beethoven's B-flat Sonata (Op. 106), that proved him a giant then, although few appreciated it, during the first stages of the Paderewski fever which began at that time.

Dvorak, some years ago, wrote in an American magazine that he considered Schubert at his best in his instrumental works. A stranger opinion was never voiced. Just as Boethoven thought orchestrally and his string quartettes and his sonatas are often orchestral, just as Schumann thought Piano and his symphonies even are chiefly piano thoughts, so Schubert always thought vocally, and his symphonies, his overtures, his string quartettes, are singable and consist of beautiful vocal melodies placed in contrast. The first and second themes of this overture, the melody of the introduction, the lack of any development, are all indicative of his thinking of songs while writing for orchestra. But what lovely melodies he writes! If only a modern composer would try to create such themes and then wed them to the vivid modern tone-coloring and the latterday harmonic effects he would immediately have the world at his feet.

Mr. Fiedler gave the Introduction with noble breadth, and also brought out the fiery character of the second closing theme. If auditors will watch for the second theme, which is given on the woodwind, they will find that Schubert composed a first cousin to "Way down upon the Suwannee River" a good while before Stephen C. Foster thought of it.

The Coda is the least worthy part of this overture and even the powerful reading which was accorded it did not make it convincing. But there are spots upon the sun, Homer sometimes nods, and the overture was greater than its ending; while the whole concert was a most worthy musical event.

BOSTON HERALD, MARCH 12, 1910.

BUSONI WITH SYMPHONY.

Pianist Heard at 18th Public Rehearsal After Six Years' Absence.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4.....Brahms
Piano Concerto in E flat, No. 5.....Beethoven
Overture to "Rosmunde".....Schubert

This concert was noteworthy chiefly by reason of the reappearance of Mr. Busoni after an absence of six years. When he first came to Boston, in 1891, his ability was recognized in Europe, and when he visited here in 1904 he was ranked among the very first of pianists then living. His reputation has grown even in late years, and it is said that while his mechanism was flawless long ago, he has gained in emotional quality, in eloquent expression.

It seemed to me yesterday that his characteristics are about the same as they were when he last played here with the orchestra and in recital. His technical proficiency is indisputable and he makes no parade of it—for he is a sincere musician of the highest thoughts and aims. To speak of him as merely a most accomplished virtuoso in the less savory meaning of the word would be impertinent and unjust. Nevertheless, Mr. Symons was not perhaps unfair when he described him as a great executant, for hearing him, he could not feel "the contact of soul and instrument," he could not feel that a human being was expressing himself in sound. He admitted that Mr. Busoni could do on the piano whatever he could conceive; but the question, after all, was what could he conceive?

Yesterday there was, as ever, the absolute mastery, the calm self-assurance that at once put the expectant audience at ease, the modest use of the uncommon proficiency, the delightful clarity in swift or in complex passages, the intelligently musical phrasing, the rhythmic sense, the variety in touch that should have aided in expression. It is not easy to think of anyone "playing" the notes of this concerto any better. Yet on the whole there was something lacking, something that left undone, or not present, disappointed the hearer who had read of Mr. Busoni's growth as an interpreter, as an artist that in performance recites the music of the composer. The dignity of the performance was marked, yet the dignity of the composer was greater. In the first movement there was a suspicion of incongruous restlessness, a nervous and alien spirit on the part of the pianist and on the part of the orchestra. There was hardly the broad, commanding, irresistible statement of a master-work.

In the adagio there was the appropriate simplicity, there was the suggestion of contemplation, but one wished for a little more warmth, a little more color. It all seemed remote, too far from this world.

Admirable, however, was Mr. Busoni's anticipation of the chief theme of the rondo, and here was the one memorable touch of poetry in the performance. Admirable, too, was his reading of the rondo, a reading that was impressive and stirring.

The performance was no doubt an excellent one in many ways, so excellent that it should have been great in every way. No one wishes to hear this concerto played in "Ercles' vein"; no one wishes to hear its noble sentiments sentimentalized. The performance of Mr. Busoni was possibly great, but it was not a great interpretation.

The pianist was applauded fervently and recalled several times. The performance of the Symphony by Brahms awakened moderate rapture. The first movement was taken at an unusually slow pace and the structure of the work was shown as though it were on the dissecting table. The following andante was anything but "moderate" in its flow, for it assumed a dirge-like character, but an average was struck, for the third movement was taken at a speed that taxed the ability of hearers and players.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Strube, comedy overture "Puck," MS. (first performance); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica; "Deh Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Singt dem Goettlichen Propheten" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu" (Mme. Sembrich); overture to "The Magic Flute"; four songs sung with piano by Mme. Sembrich; Brahms' "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmung," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied" and Strauss' "Staendchen."

[126]

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1910

BUSONI MASTERLY AT THE SYMOHONY

Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto Brings Forth Many Recalls.

ITALIAN PIANIST SCORES AS SOLOIST

Mme. Sembrich Will Be Heard at Next Week's Concerts for First Time in Years.

Ferruiccio Busoni, greatest of the Italian pianists, was the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday. The program will be repeated tonight. Busoni was last here six years ago. He was an extraordinary pianist then. In fact, he was a remarkable musician in the '90's, when he made his American debut in this city and settled down here to teach—and met grim experiences. Now he returns like unto the proverbial conq'ring hero.

His Symphony selection this time is Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, last heard here in 1906, when Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist. It is a work that demands well-rounded artistry; and this is exactly what Mr. Busoni shows. The audience is left to give quite as much consideration to Beethoven as to Busoni. The interpreter does not try to make himself more prominent than the composer. Yet Mr. Busoni's power as a pianist is manifestly equal to the most delicate or most difficult tasks. His technique is masterly, but he uses it simply as a means toward an end—toward the perfect expression of the composer's intent. After the performance Mr. Busoni was recalled several times.

Brahms' fourth symphony and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture completed the program. Mme Sembrich will be heard at next week's concerts for the first time in ten years.

JOURNAL—S MARCH 19, 1910

SEMBRICH GIVEN HEARTY WELCOME

Divides Honors With Strube at an Attractive Symphony Rehearsal.

MISTRESS OF BEL CANTO IN BOSTON

Comedy Overture, "Puck," by Strube, Played for First Time in Sympathetic Style.

Mme. Marcella Sembrich, the incomparable lyric soprano, and Gustav Strube, composer and violinist, divided the honors at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday. It will be the same tonight, at the regular concert. The mistress of bel canto, the like of whom has not been heard on this side of the ocean for many, many years, sang with orchestra the aria, "Deh vieni," from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "Lo, the heaven-descended Prophet," from Graun's Lenten cantata, "The Death of Jesus." Later on she sang several songs with piano, among them Conductor Fiedler's own charming "Wiegenlied."

Mr. Strube was represented by a comedy overture, "Puck," played for the first time—a tricksome little piece, bright with talent and imagination, masterfully written and most sympathetically performed.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," not heard for four years, and the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" completed one of the most attractive programs of the season. Mme. Sembrich and Mr. Strube were the special objects of the general enthusiasm.

HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1910.

SYMPHONY GIVES STRUBE'S "PUCK"

Comedy Overture Written by First Violin Performed for the First Time at 19th Public Rehearsal of Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Sembrich was the soloist.

Mr. Strube's new comedy overture "Puck" was performed for the first time. The overture has no program. The Puck is not necessarily Shakespear's Hobgoblin, who fights maidens of the villagery, misleads night wanderers, and offends the dignity of the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale. Mr. Strube wished to portray in tones a sylvan frolic. His themes are fresh and full of character. They are skilfully developed. The harmonic treatment is ultra-modern, but charming and effective, not merely bizarre. The instrumentation is masterly throughout. The episodes in the exposition are effectively contrasted, and the prevailing mood is one of rustic gayety relieved by a passage of true and delicate sentiment. The overture was warmly received by the audience and Mr. Strube was obliged to bow his acknowledgment from his seat among the first violins. The performance of this overture was the chief feature of the concert.

For it cannot be said truthfully that Mr. Fiedler's reading of Strauss' Symphonia Domestica which followed was highly poetic or objectively effective; nor was the performance technically worthy of the orchestra's high reputation. The reading was episodic. There was no real continuity of thought. The choice of tempo was not always fortunate. The beautiful "Love Scene" was hurried and the calm happiness of the wedded was turned into nervous eroticism. The brass was forced till there was no pure quality of tone, and the performance was often ragged. The other orchestral selection was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," which was performed in orthodox fashion.

Mme. Sembrich, who is now engaged in the painful task of bidding her American admirers a long, last, lingering, sad farewell, sang Susanna's aria, "Deh Vieni," with the preceding recitative from "The Magic Flute"; a portion of the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Death of Jesus," and these songs with piano accompaniment: Brahms' "Nightingale," Schumann's "Dedication," Mr. Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade." Mme. Sembrich was applauded heartily by those who remembered her past glory. They that heard her for the first time must have wondered at her reputation. She sang Mozart's aria carefully and with a discretion that forbade any emotional expression. Nor was she able to sustain tones without a quavering and a sagging from the true pitch.

She sang only the first section of Graun's florid air, and she labored in bravura. She was more her former self in Schumann's "Dedication" and in Mr. Fiedler's pretty little song. More noteworthy than her singing were the accompaniments of Mr. Frank La Forge. The audience, remembering gratefully the singer of past years, applauded her at the end, so that she added to the program these songs: Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht," Michael Arne's "The Lass with the Delicate Air" and the inevitable Polish song with her own accompaniment.

The program of the concerts April 1 and 2 will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Tschaikowsky, "Franceska da Rimimi"; Sibelius, Elegy and Musette of the suite arranged from the incidental music to "King Christian II" and Valse Triste (first time in Boston); Dvorak, "Carneval" overture.

The announcement is made that Mme. Sembrich will sing at the next Pension Fund concert of the orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S "DOMESTICA" AND MME. SEMBRICH

A Surprisingly Disappointing Performance of the Tone-Poem — A Sluggish Orchestra, and Mr. Fiedler's Unfortunate Pace—His Exaggeration of Details—The Interest of Mr. Strube's New Overture—The Rising Worth of His Work—Mme. Sembrich's Concert Within a Concert—The Vocal Twilight of Her Present

Adverse circumstance beset Mr. Fiedler in his performance of Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The audience had plainly come to hear Mme. Sembrich who had the second half of the concert almost to herself and was impatient of all that went before; while those who take their music seriously were haunted by recollections of the four impassioned performances of Strauss's tone-poem that the orchestra and Dr. Muck accomplished in the winter of 1906, when it was still a novel piece here. The conductor was frank in his dislike of the later music of Strauss; for him pleasure ceased with "Death and Transfiguration"; but once he had undertaken the "Domestica" he rose to the power, the richness, the splendor of much of the music. Even across the silencing years the glowing sonorities, the magnificence of instrumental coloring, the puissance of impassioned orchestral song with which Dr. Muck made the slow movement unfold all its intensity of emotion and expression still sound. Even now, and by no means in pale echo, the frenzy of the final fugue under his hand still rings. It was an orchestral delirium, if you will, but it was a glorious Bacchic intoxication. Time and again, elsewhere in the "Domestica," he made incidental babble seem as fine and poignant eloquence; and he turned strokes of irritating whim into ironic humor or characterizing dilineation. Strauss may or may not have intended the tone-poem as an orchestral glorification of the intimate affections, life, emotions and aspirations of a mated pair and their child; but Dr. Muck, almost in spite of himself, lifted it to such beauty and poetry. He was, he is, a great conductor and his performances of the "Domestica" are memorable in the years of the Symphony Orchestra. And they were what they were, because the men were as his responsive and kindled instruments. Into them he flung the passion and the frenzy, the eloquence and the power that he found in the music. The heat of the performance burned away its technical exactions, its mechanical difficulty. The music lived in the common excitement of conductor, band, and orchestra. Whereas—and here Mr. Fiedler was undoubtedly hampered—the orchestra yesterday was insecure and spiritless. It slipped as it seldom slips even in the most perilous of ultra-modern music. It was spiritless, when six weeks ago in "Zarathustra," it was all illuminating fire. The performance, as performances of the "Domestica" should go was tepid and labored, and the audience naturally was as tepid and unresponsive. There has been time for further rehearsal; there ought to be fire tonight.

Hitherto in "Zarathustra," in "Don "Juan," in "Til Eulenspiegel," in "Ein Heldenleben," Mr. Fiedler has seemed to excel in the music of Strauss generally all his predecessors here. He disclosed its formal traits, its masterful soundness of structure, but he did not expound them. He let the deliberate ugliness, the willed freakishness of some of the music serve clearly its delineative purpose, but he did not dwell upon them as though they were the chief virtue and not a conspicuous weakness of Strauss. He gave the music its sweep of stride; he clothed it with its richness of eloquent instrumental coloring; he summoned its magnificence of power, its intensity of beauty. By his choice of pace, by his vitality of rhythm, by his tonal adjustments and emphasis, by his glow of instrumental coloring, he has revealed how closely Strauss has wedded his design and his expression of it, and with what mingled force of intellect, emotion and execution he has made his tone-poems impart both. The true Strauss, the living Strauss, the Strauss that is of our own time, thoughts and passions, has thrilled and commanded in Mr. Fiedler's performances, and the public of the concerts has awaited them eagerly.

The more the wonder, then, that the "Domestica" should so have baffled Mr. Fiedler. Hitherto, with Strauss, he has been all for the long advancing lines of the tone-poems, for their mass rising upon mass; no conductor has seemed more to apprehend them as ordered and self-creating tonal architecture. Yesterday, to the contrary, he was all for isolating detail meticulously. He did, indeed, often contrive these details with exceeding beauty and finesse as in the first and mysterious entrance of the melody of the child; as in the lullaby that soothes it to sleep; as in the gentle transition to the passion, beginning in tenderness of the slow movement. Again he was merely meticulous, as in the trivial strikings of the clock and some of the give-and-take of the chatter of the scherzo. More than once, too, he exaggerated superfluously, as one who cultivates individual research for the neglected, and thus he stayed the whirl of the fugue to fling up the merest chips of Strauss's inexhaustible fancy. So ran these emphatic details, but by the emphasis upon them, the tone-poem ceased to run—flood of tone that it is—and merely moved in petty

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, MARCH 13, 1910

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted by Mme. Marcella Sembrich, and the programme will be as follows:

Comedy Overture, "Puck".....Gustav Strube
(MSS., first time.)
Sinfonia Domestica.....Strauss
Aria, "Deh vieni" ("The Marriage of Figaro").....Mozart
Aria, "Singt dem gottlichen Propheten" ("Der tod Jesu").....Graun
Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Songs with piano:
"Die Nachtigall".....Brahms
"Widmung".....Schumann
"Wiegenlied".....Fiedler
"Standchen".....Strauss
Soloist, Mme. Sembrich.

SUNDAY GLOBE—MARCH 13, 1910.

Mme Sembrich Soloist at the Next Symphony

The 19th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring as soloist Mme Marcella Sembrich, who will sing for the first time with the orchestra in over 10 years and will then make her last appearance of the season in Boston.

Mme Sembrich was soloist with the orchestra in December, 1899, but a number of things have happened to prevent her appearance at a Symphony concert since that time. She will sing "Deh vieni," from the last act of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," a tune that is indelibly connected with her name, for since she became a member of the Metropolitan opera company in 1899 she has been the only "Susanna" at the performances of this opera. Her second aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Passion Oratorio, "Der tod Jesu."

Older patrons of the Symphony concerts will remember this well, inasmuch as it was a favorite selection of Mrs Henschel in the days when she was often soloist at the concerts. Graun was a notable figure in German music the first half of the 18th century, and this oratorio is practically the only thing of his which remains. It is performed annually in Berlin by reason of a bequest, but so far as the American public is concerned this aria is all that is left of it.

The songs which Mme Sembrich will sing include a "Cradle Song" by Max Fiedler, Brahms' "The Nightingale, Schumann's "Widmung" and Strauss' "Serenade." The principal orchestral work will be Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, which Dr Muck placed on two different programs three years ago. The novelty on the program will be an overture by Gustav Strube of the orchestra. It is a comedy overture and is entitled "Puck." It was written last year and is dedicated to Mr Fiedler. The other number will be the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute."

[127]

BOSTON POST

Strauss, Sembrich and Strube Share Honors

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the 19th rehearsal of the season by the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," dedicated to Mr. Fiedler, was performed for the first time; Strauss' "Domestic Symphony" followed; Mme. Sembrich sang Mozart's "Deh Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," Graun's "Singt dem Gottlichen Propheten" from "The Death of Jesus," and these songs with piano accompaniment: "The Nightingale," Brahms; "Dedication," Schumann; Cradle Song, Fiedler; Serenade, Strauss. Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute" completed the programme.

Mr. Strube's overture has a felicitous introduction. The piece as a whole is clearly and pleasantly written. The instrumentation at certain climaxes is rather heavy for this composer, and the nature of the composition, while on the other hand the scoring is often reminding of Mendelssohn, and certain phrases recall composers for whom Mr. Strube has probably only abhorrence. Was Mr. Strube or Mr. Fiedler responsible for occasional thickness?

The overture has many happy thoughts, but there are episodes which did not at first hearing appear worthy of much reiteration, and with all its agreeable character, the composition does not seem so essentially the speech of the composer as other offerings from his pen. The music was well received, and Mr. Strube bowed his acknowledgments from the orchestra.

There are those who retain honestly acquired prejudices to their own detriment when they are confronted by such an innovator as Strauss. Strauss wrote a symphony in one movement, in accordance with the modern habit. He dubbed his symphony "Domestic." He even went so far as to insert captions in the score, referring to aunts and uncles, and so forth. It would be amusing, probably, if Strauss should yield some time to the strain of humor that is strong in him, and tell the public what he was really thinking about when he wrote this grandiose score. Was his intention merely "Advice to Young Mothers," or "The Home Beautiful."

It happens that an immense orchestra and often very complicated counterpoint are resorted to, to express simple, tender and humorous things. That is the composer's concern, not ours. We are to listen with unbiased ears. No one who so listens will attempt to deny that this music is as sane as any written today and that by far the greater part of it is sheerly beautiful, even when judged by the standards of the preceding generation.

Mme. Sembrich sang the music by Graun and Schumann in particular with some effort, but she has not lost her sterling musicianship, and for the rest of her performance she again displayed here rare sense of values. There were instances when she did not conquer, but covered up a difficulty, yet her phrasing and her Italian were charming in the airs by Mozart, and the songs by Fiedler and Strauss were very artistically rendered. Mr. Fiedler's song is delightful in its simplicity and sincerity, and unaffected melodic character. The performance of the "Symphony Domestica" was very sympathetic, but too spasmodic, and at times the quality of orchestral tone was not what might have been desired. Mr. Fiedler, however, is to be warmly thanked for again bringing the work before the Symphony audiences, and for interpreting it with such earnestness and good will.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 21, 1910

News of Music

At the next pair of Symphony concerts on Friday, April 1, and Saturday, April 2, Mr. Fiedler purposes to revive Tschaikowsky's Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," and to play two new pieces by Sibelius—a "Valse Triste" and the Elegy and the Musette from the incidental music to a Scandinavian play; at the concerts of April 8 and 9 Mr. Kreisler will assist the orchestra, playing for the first time here Tschaikowsky's concerto; at the concerts of April 15 and 16 Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be performed in its entirety, with the Apollo Club to sing the choral part in the final movement, lastly, at the concerts of April 29 and 30 Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be repeated, with the choir of the Cecilia assisting, as it did last year.

It was settled on Saturday that Mme. Sembrich will sing at the second of the two annual concerts for the profit of the Pension Fund of the orchestra on the evening of Sunday, April 17. She herself proffered her assistance, and so eagerly that she will make the journey from South Bend, in Indiana, where she sings on the preceding day. Her "numbers" will be pieces from the Italian operas, like the long scena in the first act of "Traviata," in which the public has long admired her. The orchestral part of the programme in turn will consist mainly of excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. Thus the whole will make a glorified operatic concert.

The migrations of the harps in the Symphony Orchestra seem finished, and now after various experiments with new placings of them, Mr. Fiedler has definitely set them on the edge of the stage alongside of the first violins. It is hard to say whether the change appreciably increases the vividness of their tone in or against the instrumental mass, but it does give Mr. Fiedler what he desired, an unbroken semi-circle of the string choir; the first violins; then the violoncellos the leaders of which have been brought down to the former place of the harps; next the violas; and finally the second violins. Hardly within memory has there been even so slight a change in the seating of the players.

---

from HERALD

address Washington,

date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 22, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the admired concert master of the orchestra, who will appear in this capacity for the first time in several years. The programme will be announced later.

TIMES

ss Washington, D.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN LAST CONCERT

The fifth and last of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 22, at 4:30 o'clock.

The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, who will appear here in this capacity for the first time in several years.

ADVERTISER. MARCH 19, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT ESPECIALLY BRILLIANT

MME. SEMBRICH, FAVORITE SINGER, THE SOLOIST

Strauss' "Baby Symphony," a Song by Mr. Fiedler and an Overture by Mr. Strube.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Gustav Strube. Comedy Overture. "Puck."
Strauss. Sinfonia Domestica.
Mozart. "Deh Vieni."
Graun. "Singt dem Goettlichen Propheten."
Mme. Marcella Sembrich.
Mozart. "Magic Flute" overture.
Songs with piano, by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler and Strauss.
Mme. Sembrich.

It would be difficult to imagine a more varied programme. The most modern and the most classical were here in juxtaposition. Under any circumstances the "Piece de Resistance" was Strauss' "Baby Symphony." More and more, with each repetition, the careful auditor finds great things in this work. The glory of the night scene, for example, is something that grows upon one until it seems as great as almost anything in the accepted masterworks. But one is still dissatisfied that great music should be used to such trivial ends. It was going far when Strauss celebrated himself as a hero, in one of his orchestral works, but it was beyond bounds when he sang of the glories of his domestic affairs to the public. It would not be extending his field much further if he should give us a symphonic poem about his poodle or his laundress. We object to having Music brought into the domain of soothing syrup and stubbed toes. Great as the composition is, in some parts, it was, is and will ever remain an impertinence in Art and an evidence of Mr. Strauss' skill in advertising his wares.

There is another piece of domestic music that is in vivid contrast with this. Wagner also celebrated his wife and son in music. But let the student read up the circumstances under which Wagner brought forth his birthday tribute to his wife and then contrast them with the blatant, self-assertive launching of Strauss's family at the heads of the public and he can form but one opinion. When one hears this largely planned and heavily scored work and notes that it is domestic music, one cannot but wonder what public music would be like.

And, in spite of the great and graphic portions of the composition, there is a degree of patchiness in it. While we recognize more and more clearly some of its great points, the work, as a whole, does not grow upon us, as "Tod und Verklaerung" does.

The composition was superbly played and Mr. Fiedler's reading brings out all the subtle points very clearly. He was recalled at the end, and surely his devotion to the Strauss music deserved this recognition and more.

Mme. Sembrich was probably the chief attraction on this heterogeneous programme. With the long line of waiters for gallery seats (which began to form at 9 a.m.) she was probably the first and foremost charm of the afternoon. It is always a painful moment when one has to begin to be apologetic for one who has been a leader in any art. We cannot advocate Dr. Osler's scheme of employing chloroform at any certain age in the life of vocalists. But we still wish that great artists would not disturb the memories of their own zenith Mme. Sembrich is still a great singer, but she has been greater. She is a splendid lesson to students who need to study the conservation of the voice, how to skate over thin ice when nature denies the resources of the period of maximum powers.

Mme. Sembrich's conception of the interpretation of a song is of the most masterful description, but there are moments when she must husband her resources and count out her vocal gold sparingly. She takes too much refuge in "mezza voce." Nevertheless in the "Lieder" she was still the great musician-singer. She showed this in "Widmung" (Schumann) and in "Fruehlingsnacht," which was sung as an encore, and yet more effectively in Mr. Fiedler's delightful "Cradle Song." The last-named was one of the daintiest gems of the vocal part of the programme.

There were no lapses of intonation to condone in Mme. Sembrich's work. But the absolute ease with which she used to take even the most exacting coloratura work was not present. The audience was more than satisfied, however, for at the end of the concert, tempted by the placing of the piano-songs last, the encore fiend began his Saturnalia and when we left the hall two encores had been given with several more in prospect. One ought not to allow the excellent accompaniments of Frank La Forge to go unrecorded.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture was given a very successful reading. We were especially pleased that Mr. Fiedler did not rush the opening fugue (or fugato) in such a manner that its melodic thoughts could not be followed. Too many conductors give this charming part of the work in such a manner that no auditor can follow its counterpoint. This fugue is, by the way, a transformation of Mozart's favorite fugue, the one in E-flat, No 7 of the second book of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord." It is in the same key, has the same modulations and the same length, as that fugal exposition, but it is treated in a wholly different manner, and it is no more a plagiarism than would occur if one clergyman were to preach from the text that had been taken by another.

The overture was dainty in itself and it made a very fitting buffer between Madame Sembrich's two groups of songs, the first with orchestra, the second with piano.

Mr. Strube's Overture furnished the novelty of the programme (if we except Mr. Fiedler's song) and was a worthy work in the classical form. When Mr. Strube discards the ultra-modern vein he shows that he is a thorough master of form and of figure development. He has melody also, although he sometimes deliberately discards this gift—the more the pity. The light subject of this work ("Puck, a Comedy Overture") forbade his entering into modern complexities and vagueness, with the result that the work became very graceful and pleasant to listen to.

The overture was a strict "sonata-allegro" with clear and well-contrasted themes and it was thoroughly characteristic from beginning to end. It had a little of the "Till Eulenspiegel" style of humor. Its opening horn figure was well-played and this and the subsequent figures were well developed. The music was genial and even rustic at times. The climax at the end was well wrought up. Altogether this overture is one of the best of Mr. Strube's works. It is interesting, melodic, and short. Small wonder then that the composer received the most hearty tribute from the public at its close. He was obliged to rise from his seat in the orchestra and bow his acknowledgments three several times. To the present writer the overture was the most attractive orchestral part of the entire concert.

EVE. STAR

ess Washington, D.

Mrs. Taft attended the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon and had in her box her sister, Mrs. Laughlin; Mrs. McCagg, Mrs. Rae and Mrs. John Reyburn, wife of the mayor of Philadelphia.

In Mrs. Leiter's box she had Mrs. Meyer, Mrs. Mulligan, Mrs. Joseph Leiter and Miss Dorothy Williams. Mrs. Charles A. Williams entertained in her box Mrs. Lowden, Mrs. Graeme Stewart, Mrs. John Hays Hammond and Miss Mary Williams. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had a party in their box, as did Mrs. Charles Richardson and Mrs. James McMillan. Mrs. William F. Dennis entertained Mrs. Dickinson, Mrs. Green C. Goodloe and Mrs. T. DeWitt Talmage. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Miss Carlisle and Mrs. Buckner Randolph were in other boxes.

EVE. STAR

ess Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 22, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will appear here in this capacity for the first time in several years.

---

their work, to follow them from piece to piece. And there in our orchestra sits Mr. Strube, as he sat yesterday, diligent with his violin, but giving his leisure to the writing of music that is quite as good as theirs, and that deserves as wide note. Is he content that the Symphony Orchestra shall play his pieces; that they shall interest and stir his hearers; that the critical and the practised shall praise them, and that then they shall fall away into obscurity? Is there no way by which they may pass to other orchestras; that other publics may know and admire them? Is Mr. Strube so content with the reward of his own particular audience, so eager to pass to the next thing, so absorbed in himself, that he seems to sit patiently under an unjustly narrow note?

Mr. Strube seems as imaginative, felicitous and impinging with instrumental timbres as a composer of the hour should be; he can invent tingling or suffusing harmonies that bear his own stamp; and he has the courage of his invention in all these things. His melodies are as interesting and individual, as suggestive of beauty, as quick with emotion as those of many a contemporary composer. They engross or they stir as abstract music; they are concrete of thought or mood. Above all, he can write highly expressive music in the characterizing and emotional sense of the hour and at the same time shape it to the form, however academic, that he has chosen, making it supple to his ends. Now these are rare abilities as composers go nowadays, and there was fresh proof of them in the new overture. The form was classic—the sonata form, in fact; yet at every turn seemingly, Mr. Strube could make it expressive of mood and picture, and develop simultaneously his melodic ideas and the promptings of his fancy. He was as felicitous as ever with his play of instrumental timbres; his harmonies fell piquantly upon epicurean ears. And throughout, he was weaving his picture in tones of his forest glade in the misty night, of fairy folk tripping in it; of Puck himself to lead and watch them; now impishly gay; now with sober eyes and hand upon contemplative chin. Year after year in his early music, Mr. Strube seemed to lack the communicating spark that might kindle hearers to it. He was a little sluggish, sirupy, tame. Now the spark is bright in his imagination and in his execution. His music has its tang, and no one outside Boston, seems much to heed.

The Poles, in the arts, have their privileges after all. At the end of the orchestral part of the concert on Friday, Mme. Sembrich gave a concert of her own quite in the fashion in which Mr. Paderewski—and no one else hitherto—has been permitted to override precedent and rule at Symphony Hall. She began with Susanna's air "Deh vieni!" from the final act of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro"; she proceeded with such parts of an air from Graun's "Der Tod Gesu"; an orchestral intermezzo ensued, the overture to "The Magic Flute"; and finally the singer sang at least seven songs. Four were upon the programme—Brahm's "Ded Nachtigall," Schumann's "Wedmung," Mr. Fiedler's own "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade"—while the rest were her familiar "extra pieces," ever to the Polish mazurka to her own accompaniments. The pieces, except Graun's air, were adroitly chosen for the tones in Mme. Sembrich's voice that she still commands and that cost her least effort. Yet even so her labor, to phrase exquisitely, to from "Figaro's Wedding — and she did phrase it exquisitely—deprived the music of some of its warmth. It was Mozart in mezza voce that dimned the brightness of the music; it was of a musing and not a half-mocking Susanne. Grau's air is relentless in its intervals; or that some of it might have been yesterday; and such intervals are not easy for Mme. Sembrich nowadays, and she can only laboriously sustain the tones with which he surmounts them. In the songs went, as they have often, the qualities that have distinguished Mme. Sembrich among the singers of her time—the sense of their doings and their integrity as a whole, the flow of the melody and exquisitely lapped and shaded phrases, the adroitness of detail, the imaginative discrimination, the delicate continuance of emotion. Her qualities of mind and spirit—and they are as essential as qualities of voice to a singer in the finest sense—still serve her. They have never seemed riper; she has never plied them more adroitly. Often, however, the voice and the breath behind it obey not or obey hesitatingly, partially. The purpose is clear; but the means of expression falter, under the pitiless years, under the pitiful mistake that it would still try to command or to wheedle them. The twilight of her voice has surely come upon Mme. Sembrich, and there imght have been—there was only a few years ago—such a golden sunset.

H. T. P.

As Mr. Fiedler had slowed the scherzo, so now he quickened all this passion of intense song. The puissance of the music dwindled; the magnificence of it faded; the richness of the superposed sonorities of the glowing instrumental colors dimmed. The "sleep-chasings" went in characterless blur. There was no responsive emotion— but the mood of disappointed and righteous irritation. It was Strauss emasculated. The final fugue, even, did not save the day. In that orchestral frenzy who cares how Strauss heats himself and his orchestra? Those who would unravel its details may pore over the pages of the score. The delirious excitement, the Bacchic note of it all is the goal of the performance, and Mr. Fiedler would not let it whirl; he would lay the finger of exposition on each detail; he flung out bits spiritedly enough, but the music never outraced itself and whipped its hearers with it. A tame "Domestica," a pedantic "Domestica," a bourgeois "Domestica"—and Strauss a thousand miles away.

Mr. Strube's later music, to which the orchestra yesterday added his new overture, "Puck," ought to bring him wider and further note. His concerto for violin and violoncello, his imagination and eloquent symphony of last year—a little masterpiece in the play of instrumental timbres and in economy of means in the expression of alert fancies, and his new piece are quite as distinguished music as many a composer writes in Germany today—the Boehers, the Frieds, the Schillings, the Schumanns and the rest. Their compositions go the round of the orchestras and then oversea to other bands. The connoisseurs, and even the mere listeners are presumed to know something of the men and

MONITOR.

MARCH 21, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THERE have been two memorable concerts this month in the Boston Symphony series, that of March 5, when Mr. Fiedler gave a program wholly orchestral, and that of last Saturday evening, when he had the solo assistance of Mme. Sembrich. It happened that the conductor's zeal for giving the Schumann Spring symphony a successful presentation at the seventeenth concert did not diminish his interest in the smaller works he associated with it on his program; and it likewise happened that his zeal for the Strauss Domestic symphony, the chief number of the nineteenth program, took nothing from his interest in Gustav Strube's new overture, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture or the orchestral accompaniments to Mme. Sembrich's arias.

A fascinating idea to entertain with regard to the performances of the Domestic symphony which Dr. Muck gave in the spring of 1907 in Symphony hall and the performance which Mr. Fiedler gave on Saturday evening is that Dr. Muck emphasized the external and descriptive characteristics of the work while Mr. Fiedler emphasized its purely musical characteristics. Without doubt Dr. Muck in his reading of this piece, as in his reading of other examples of modern program music, was willing to have it as pictorial as possible; was willing to make it depict realistically the household scenes which the pink-covered book of program notes gave in summary. Without doubt Mr. Fiedler in his turn read the piece with a view of getting at its musical contents, and for finding what possibilities it held out to him for that broad phrasing which he cultivates in his interpretations of modern symphonies. But after the difference in the reading of the two conductors is noted the fact remains that the Domestic symphony sounded essentially the same on Saturday evening as it sounded at the Symphony concerts of three years ago. Program or no program, the work has a large, intricate and symmetrical design. A symphony in one movement, it has nominally the four symphonic divisions of opening allegro, scherzo, adagio and final allegro; but in every one of the four divisions there is music in the character of one or more of the other three, and thus the piece is practically the same in form as a Strauss symphonic poem. In this piece, as in the Zarathustra tone poem, Strauss writes his music in the intellectual, the sentimental or the humorous vein according to the exigencies of the movement; and yet he is as careful as composers who cast their symphonies in the old mold are to keep all three moods in measured relation and balance.

Mr. Strube's new overture, "Puck," played from manuscript, was in the spirit of comedy and was full of sparkling orchestral effect. Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Strube's associates in the orchestra bent their energies to giving the little work the presentation it deserved, and at the close of its performance Mr. Strube had to leave his place among the first violins and go to the front of the platform to acknowledge applause.

The large audience that Mme. Sembrich as soloist helped to call out heard probably the best soprano singing that any audience has heard in a Boston concert this season. They certainly heard better soprano singing than the audience heard that attended Mme. Sembrich's song recital in Symphony hall last November.

No small part of the good effect in the first instance was the choice of pieces and their arrangement on the singer's program—a Mozart operatic aria contrasted with an old oratorio aria of Graun. It was something new in the musical experience of the season to hear an aria in either of the two manners sung in concert vocal style; and to hear arias in both manners satisfactorily performed, one after the other, by the same singer, was a surprise.

Mme. Sembrich would deserve extraordinary praise if in these days, when it is common to hear performers bring out all the meaning there is in their songs and airs, and sometimes a little more, she had merely sung her music without especial effort at interpretation; but in her work with Mozart and Graun she triumphed both as singer and interpreter. Even more enchanting than either her vocal style or her interpretation was the contrasted tone coloring with which she sang the bel canto of one composer and the vigorous roulades of the other.

The program: Strube, comedy overture, "Puck"; conducted by the composer. Strauss, "Symphonia Domestica," op. 53. Arias, Mozart, "Deh Vieni," "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Graun, "Singt dem gottlichen Propheten," "Der Tod Jesu"; Mozart, overture to the opera "The Magic Flute." Songs: Brahms, "Die Nachtigall"; Schumann, "Widmung"; Fiedler, "Wiegenlied"; Strauss, "Standchen."

Mme. Sembrich's pieces given at the close of the concert in response to applause included two German songs, Schumann's "Fruhlingsnacht" and "Der Nussbaum"; the florid Italian air of Arditi, "Se Saran Rose"; and in English, "The Lass with the Delicate Air"; and mayhap in Polish, "The Maiden's Wish." Frank La Forge was Mme. Sembrich's accompanist in all the songs with piano except in the little song of Chopin, the last on the encore list. In this the singer played her own accompaniment.

ROMEIKE NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

In the audience at the Symphony concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday night were the following: Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Johns H. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mrs. Harold Ostby, former Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Isabel R. Brown, Miss Hope Brown, Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Loomison, Mr. Charles H. Child, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Rons, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John Greene, Prof. and Mrs. William Macdonald, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Claflin, Prof. Julian Herrashoff, Mr. Albert M. Steinert, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin S. Jewett, Mrs. Charles E. Havens, Mrs. William McDonald, Jr., Mrs. Ernst Fischer, Mr. Lawrence Calder, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mrs. J. J. Flannigan, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Miss Alice Bourse, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Park, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs. John F. Street, Pawtucket; Mr. and Mrs. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. and Mrs. James N. Bourne, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Mrs. George C. Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss Maud Atwood, Mr. George Parker Winship, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mrs. Charles E. Lincoln, Miss Hope Lincoln, Mr. Edward S. Clarke.

Card [illegible]

From HERALD

Address Washington,

Date FEB 22 19

Mrs. Taft, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Laughlin, of Pittsburg; Mrs. John E. Reyburn, wife of the mayor of Philadelphia; Mrs. McCagg, of Chicago, and Mrs. Rae, widow of Rear Admiral Charles W. Rae, occupied the Presidential box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A distinguished audience filled the house on this occasion. Among them were Mrs. Dickinson, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Wickersham, wife of the Attorney General; Countess von Bernstorff, wife of the German Ambassador; the Danish Minister and Countess von Moltke, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt and Miss Hoyt, Mrs. James McMillan, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, the military attache of the German Embassy and Mme. von Livonius, Mrs. Isaac T. Mann, Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Miss Williams, Mrs. Julian James, the Misses Lee, Miss Harlan, Miss Hagner, Mrs. Hagner, Gen. and Mrs. Oliver and Miss Oliver, Mrs. George T. Marye, Baron and Baroness Preuschen, Miss Carr, Mrs. William K. Kerr, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Moran, Mrs. Hudgins, Mrs. Henry Spencer, Mrs. Livingston Hunt, Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Gaines, Mrs. Barney, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. E. A. Mitchell, Mrs. George Howard, Dr. and Mrs. Simpson, Mrs. Swope, Dr. and Mrs. B. M. Randolph, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Thropp, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Miss Perkins, Mrs. Worthington Ford, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Richard Wallach, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Mrs. W. H. Moses, Miss Stevens.

From TIMES

Address Washington

Date FEB 22 1910

ORCHESTRA CHARMS IN VARIED PROGRAM

Sans Soloist, Boston Symphony Musicians Draw Large House.

By ROBERTA V. BRADSHAW.

The growth of musical appreciation in Washington, in America in fact, may be measured fairly well by the phenomenon of an orchestral concert being successful without the lure of a soloist.

Yesterday afternoon the largest house of the winter greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a porgram of orchestral numbers.

To be sure, much discretion was employed in the building of the program, which, opening with Weber's heroic overture to "Euryanthe," including two of the best known and best liked Wagner numbers, the "Siegfried" music and the overture to "Reinzi," as well as Schubert's melodious and poetic unfinished Symphony in B minor.

The chief event of the concert, however, very evidently was Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead." Inspired by the painting of the same name by the Swiss artist, Arnold Boecklin, the score is one of the most unusual of the past decade. Characterized by nobility, freshness and originality and an eloquent use of a few simple themes, the composition is carried along by the sweep of imagination which inspired the work. While the theme is characteristically Slavic it is not the "Russian" we are most familiar with.

An absolute beauty always is present to transport the fancy, while it carries a note of poignancy which reaches the heart. The recurring melodic phrase runs through the tone-poem, unifying and rendering it more logical and impressive, while the quiet climax gives the sense of satisfaction of a tale that is well told.

The work throughout is something that cannot be grasped at one hearing, even though it be interpreted with such clarity and dignity as Mr. Fiedler and his men displayed yesterday.

The fifth and last of the Boston Symphony's concerts will take place Tuesday afternoon, March 22, with Mr. Willy Heas as soloist.

From STAR

Address Baltimore,

Date FEB 26 1910

Russian Violinist Coming.

Mischa Elman, the Russian boy violinist, whose playing at a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here was a revelation to Baltimore music-lovers, will give a recital at the Lyric Theater on Tuesday night, March 8.

While Elman's fame preceded him from Russia, his performances in this country have brought him new laurels. In New York recently an audience that filled the Manhattan Opera House became so enthusiastic that he was forced to break the "no encore" rule and respond to the continued applause. Elman for his recital here has selected numbers that have been most enthusiastically received in New York and Chicago.

LAURELS FOR FIEDLER

Fourth Symphony Concert at National Pleases Many.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave its fourth concert this season yesterday afternoon in the New National Theater, before its customary large audience of music lovers. The programme, without a soloist, was one which was a test of the musical appreciation of a Washington audience. The opening number was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B minor, exquisitely given. It was the latter half of the programme which awakened the audience to a full appreciation of the orchestra, the conductor, and the music they were interpreting, and their work in Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" (symphonic poem for full orchestra to the picture by A. Bocklin, opus 29), was superb.

It is a wonderful composition—not somber, but powerful, fantastic, original. It requires particular strength in the cellos, where the Symphony yesterday was entirely satisfying. After passing through fury, torment, and powerful disorder, after the poetic opening measures, depicting the tranquil "lapping of the water that surrounds the Island of the Dead," the music falls back to the second theme and finally returns to the first, and ends peacefully and poetically. Mr. Fiedler was recalled again and again by the enthusiastic listeners. His reading of Wagner's "Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest"), from Siegfried, Act II, and the Overture to "Rienzi" was worthy of the genius of that composer, and very particularly will the memory of the former stand out brightly in the remembrance of those who heard it.

Those who have proclaimed Max Fiedler to be a conductor without temperament found themselves mistaken yesterday. He and his orchestra rose to heights of temperament in the Rachmaninoff and Siegfried numbers, but always without losing their delicious refinement.

[129]

POST

Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Taft occupied a box yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater. Her guests were Mrs. Laughlin, Mrs. McCagg, Mrs. Rae, and Mrs. John Reyburn, wife of the mayor of Philadelphia.

Mrs. Leiter had with her Mrs. Meyer, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Mulliken, Miss Dorothy Williams, and Mrs. Joseph Leiter.

Mrs. Charles Richardson entertained a box party, as did Mrs. James McMillan, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner.

Mrs. C. A. Williams had with her Mrs. Frank O. Lowden, Mrs. Graeme Stewart, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, and Miss Williams.

In another box were Mrs. Calderon Carlisle with Miss Carlisle and Mrs. Buckner Randolph.

Mrs. William F. Dennis entertained a party, including Mrs. Dickinson, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Green Clay Goodloe, and Mrs. T. DeWitt Talmage.

In the audience were the German ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Baroness Preuschen, wife of the naval attache of the Austro-Hungarian embassy; Mrs. Francis Crowninshield, the second secretary of the British embassy and Mrs. Kennard, Col. James, of the British embassy; Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Herbert Parsons, Miss Sherrill, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Edson Bradley, Miss Sterling, of New York; Mrs. Clarence Moore, Viscountess Henri de Sibour, Mrs. Jack Story, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, the Assistant Secretary of War, Gen. Oliver; Mrs. Barber, Mrs. Wesson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Clover, Miss Isabelle Hagner Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Guidet Duryee, Mrs. Parker Newton, of New York; Mrs. John Crayke Simpkins, Mrs. L. A. Coolidge, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Miss Annie Irwin, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Charles Fairfax, Mrs. C. P. Stone, Miss Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Crawford, Mrs. Huidekoper, Miss Catharine Britton, the Misses Perkins, Mr. Skybach, Mrs. Julian James, and Mrs. Barney.

From POST

Address Washington, D.

Date

National—Saengerbund Concert.

The second public concert this season of the Washington Saengerbund will take place at the National on Sunday evening, March 20. The popular organization will be assisted by Miss Lilla Ormond, the well-known mezzo-soprano of Boston; Arturo Tibaldi, the eminent violin virtuoso of London, and an orchestra of 35 musicians.

Miss Lilla Ormond for the past few years has sung with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, and at the last Worcester festival.

Tibaldi is the son of Col. and Lady Adela Larking, a nephew of the Earl of Listowel, and first cousin of the Earl of Yarborough. Tibaldi studied first in Florence under Prof. Faini, then later in London with August Wilhelmj, and also in Prague with Sevcick. He has played with great success before several crowned heads in Europe, and his appearance in this city is looked forward to with great interest.

The orchestra, composed of the city's best musicians, will render some attractive numbers, besides accompanying the chorus in two selections. The concert will be under the direction of Mr. Henry Xander, the musical director of the Saengerbund.

National—Boston Symphony.

The fifth and last of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 22, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the admired concert master of the orchestra, who will appear here in that capacity for the first time in several years. The program will be announced later.

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 19 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Lyric on next Tuesday evening instead of the usual Wednesday, may be considered generally speaking as the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, including the fourth and choral movement. In order to do this Mr. Fielder has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past several weeks has been rehearsing the tremendously difficult choruses under the direction of its own conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache, and as the solo singers, the best quartet for the purpose that is to be had in America, has been engaged, consisting of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Nor is this all, for Mr. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will play as soloist, the Mendelssohn concerto. Mr. Hess has not been heard here as soloist for everal years. None the less Baltimore knows what a really great artist he is and all lovers of the violin will welcome the opportunity to hear him again. The program will be opened by Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FEBRUARY 22

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Tuesday evening, Feb. 22, instead of the usual Wednesday, may be considered, generally speaking, as the most important the orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, including the fourth and choral movement.

In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the past several weeks has been rehearsing the tremendously difficult choruses under the direction of its own conductor, Mr. Joseph Pache, and as the solo singers, the best quartet for the purpose that is to be had in America, has been engaged, consisting of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass.

Nor is this all, for Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play, as soloist, the Mendelssohn Concerto. Mr. Hess has not been heard here as soloist for several years. None the less Baltimore knows what a really great artist he is, and all lovers of the violin will welcome the opportunity to hear him again. The program will be opened by Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven marks the culminating point in the career of the greatest musical genius the world has known. Although it was followed by some of the later quartets and pianoforte sonatas, it may be said that in this last symphony Beethoven reached the highest point in his creative career. The reason for the incorporation in the last movement of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," set for orchestra, chorus and mixed quartet, is familiar to all who are acquainted with musical history. In working out the scheme of the symphony Beethoven realized that at the end of the third movement he had expressed all he could with instrumental, and to reach his proper climax there was only one thing left, which was to emply the human voice.

The symphony was written for the Philharmonic Society of London, and altogether Beethoven was paid £150 for it. It was dedicated to the King of Prussia and had its first performance on May 7, 1824, in Vienna. It had been completed in February of that year, and while its actual composition occupied Beethoven about a year, it had been in his mind for nearly eight years. Its first performance in London was on March 21, 1825, London not getting it until it had been played in Vienna, Frankfurt and Leipsic. The first three movements are in conventional symphonic form. The program entire is as follows:

Schumann, Overture "Genoveva."
Mendelssohn, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E-Minor.
Beethoven, Symphony No. 9, with Final Chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125.
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Molto vivace: Presto.
III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Baritone Recitative.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor Solo and chorus: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

Soloists — Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Bedoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. Chorus of the Baltimore Oratrio Society.

from NEWS
dress Baltimore, Md.
ate FEB 21

No New Conductor.

There has been much talk of late of a change in the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it has been said that an entirely new man is to be brought in. Manager C. A. Ellis sends the following on the subject from Boston:

"In the hope of putting an end to the various reports and rumors which are being printed regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the management of the Orchestra desires to state with utmost emphasis that the only musicians who have been considered for the post of conductor this year are Max Fielder, who has just been engaged for a further term of two years, and Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. No other conductors have been approached nor has the possibility of engaging any other than Mr. Fielder or Dr. Muck been ever considered."

NEWS
ess Baltimore, Md.
FEB 19

NINTH SYMPHONY AT LYRIC TUESDAY

Concert Will Be Most Important Ever Given In Baltimore.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening instead of the usual Wednesday, may be considered, generally speaking, as the most important the Orchestra has ever given in this city, because for the first time it will give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, including the fourth and choral movement. In order to do this Mr. Fiedler has enlisted the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which for the last few weeks has been rehearsing the tremendously difficult choruses under the direction of its own conductor, Joseph Pache, and as the solo singers, the best quartet for the purpose that is to be had in America has been engaged, consisting of Madame Rider - Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass.

Nor is this all, for Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the Orchestra, will play as a soloist the Mendelssohn Concerto. Mr. Hess has not been heard here as soloist for several years.

The program follows:

Schumann—Orerture, "Genevera."
Mendelssohn—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E Minor.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 9, with Final Chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125.
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Molto vivace: Preston
III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Harrtone recitative.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor Solo and Chorus: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

Soloists—Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, basso. Chorus of the Baltimore Oratorio Society.

m AMERICAN
ress Baltimore, Md.
e FEB 21

Last Rehearsal for Symphony.

The last rehearsal of the chorus of the Oratorio Society, which, in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Lyric tomorrow night, will be held tonight in the East Hall of the Peabody Institute. Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Prof. Joseph Pache will conduct the last practice. The only orchestra rehearsal will take place tomorrow morning at the Lyric at 10 o'clock.

The quartet will be composed of Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass. Besides the symphony, which the Boston Orchestra has never given in this city, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture will be included in the program, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the organization, will play Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra.

n STAR
ress Baltimore, Md.
FEB 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A special event of tomorrow will be the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Lyric Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. The orchestra in the choral movement will have the assistance of the Oratorio Society of this city and of a quartet composed of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass. The other numbers on the program will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, being the soloist.

NEWS
ess Baltimore, Md.
FEB 21

MAX FIEDLER WILL REHEARSE SINGERS

Boston Symphony Director To Put Oratorio Society Through Its Paces.

At the last rehearsal of the chorus of the Oratorio Society, which will be held tonight, Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, in conjunction with the Society, will present Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Lyric tomorrow evening, will be present and will put the singers through their final paces preparatory to their first appearance in the great work.

The meeting to be held at the Peabody Institute tonight will be the last choral rehearsal. Director Joseph Pache of the Society will have charge during the first part of the evening in order to freshen the singers up so that they will be in good condition when Mr. Fiedler takes hold of them. The only practice with the orchestra will take place tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock at the Lyric.

A special rehearsal for the male choirs, called for Saturday night, revealed the fundamental strength of these voices, and the entire chorus is now in a rarely finished and perfected condition. It has been necessary to exclude a number of the singers on account of the fact that they were irregular at rehearsals, and Mr. Fiedler said that any who had been thus dilatory could not be permitted to appear in the symphony, as it was necessary that everyone should be thoroughly drilled.

Besides the Symphony, the orchestra will present Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Willy Hess, concertmeister of the organization, will play the Mendelssohn concerto for violin and orchestra. A quartet of well-known soloists will be heard in the Beethoven work. They are Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, basso.

rom STAR
ddress Baltimore, Md.
ate FEB 22

Boston Orchestra Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will play an excellent program this evening at the Lyric Theater, beginning promptly at 8:15 o'clock. The chief number of the performance will be the rendering of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

In the choral movement the orchestra will have the assistance of the Oratorio Society of this city and of a quartet composed of Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass. The other numbers on the program will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva" and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Mr. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, being the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

rom
ddress
ate

SYMPHONY AT LYRIC

The chief event of today will be the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Lyric Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler.

The Orchestra in the choral movement will have the assistance of the Oratoria Society of this city and of a quartet composed of Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor and Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass. The other numbers on the program will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva" and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Mr. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Orchestra, will be the soloist

n NEWS
ress Baltimore, Md.
FEB 22

VOCALISTS REHEARSE BEETHOVEN NUMBER

Baltimore Oratorio Society Has Final Practice For Symphony Tonight.

Preparatory to the production of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will be given at the Lyric tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Baltimore Oratorio Society, a final rehearsal with the musicians took place this morning.

The rehearsal was called for 10.30 o'clock, but it was nearly 11 before Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony, took his place at the desk. From that time until well into the late forenoon there was "something doing" every minute. All the soloists were present and the work was gone through in its entirety, the chorus having been drilled so carefully by Joseph Pache, director of the local organization, that but few alterations in tempo, phrasing or other method were necessary.

The manner in which the big chorus of Baltimoreans fell in with the famous orchestra in the Beethoven score was a matter of general congratulation, both by Director Fiedler and Mr. Joseph Pache. The soloists of the evening—Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass—were present at the rehearsal.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony has been sung only once in this city within the last decade; it was given several years ago by the Bach choir under Harold Randolph. It has never been given here by the Boston Symphony musicians, so that its announcement for tonight, with the local singers assigned to the choral of the last movement (which is a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy"), sacrificed to arouse the greatest interest in musical circles.

Besides the Ninth Symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, not frequently seen on programs of today, will be rendered, and Willy Hess, concert meister of the orchestra, will play Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and chestra.

STAR
ss Baltimore, Md.
FEB 23

TRIUMPH SCORED IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra and Oratorio Society Give Musical Treat at Lyric.

The Fourth Symphony Concert given at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the most remarkable musical events in recent years in Baltimore. This was due, of course, to the magnificent chorus by the Oratorio Society with the splendid support given by the Boston Orchestra. The program furnished a range for technical expression and melodic interpretation that afforded the fullest scope to the talents of Mr. Willy Hess, whose violin work created the intensest enthusiasm, as well as the orchestra in general. Mr. Max Fiedler delighted the audience by the ease, the precision and fine movement of his leadership.

The complete control by the leader over the musicians must be credited with the almost unparalleled toning of color, massing of effect, shading and general quality work of the instruments. The auditors were fully aware of the fact that they were being treated to music of the highest art delineation.

In his rendition of Mendelssohn's "Violin Concerto" Mr. Hess showed a range of technique and spiritual appreciation of the matchless theme that conveyed to the audience the full power and delicacy of its wonderful beauties. In intonation and that subtle linking up of melodies which finds its point of expression not at the bow, but in the soul of the artist, Mr. Hess gave an exhibition of skill and spirit that will mark a high point of musical excellence even in a city with such a large instructed body of music lovers as Baltimcre.

But, with all that may be said for the rest of the program, when the voices came in on Beethoven's marvelous Symphony No. 9, in the final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, the majesty and elevation, the joyousness and beauty, the strength and movement of the music bore the audience upon it as though lifted upon billows of song. With almost inconceivable precision the voices molded into the music which, diminishing in volume to give support to the chorus, rose again with the decline of the vocal interpretation only to gather the dignity of a new motive for the voices of the soloists.

The overflowing hall was the best evidence of the anticipations of Baltimore with respect to the choral festival. The final round of applause was oft repeated in the hope that the man who had trained the oratorio singers, Mr. Joseph Pache, might be induced to leave his box and come to the stage in

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 23 19

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY IS GIVEN

Boston Orchestra And Baltimore Singers Unite At Lyric.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was given at the Lyric Theater last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, and the Baltimore Oratorio Society.

The mighty Beethoven's instinct and trend were emphatically instrumental. He obviously thought orchestrally, to whatever means of expression he resorted—even when these means were voices or the piano. This resulted in his writing unnecessarily awkward difficulties for the piano, and almost impossible material for the voices. Much of the choral movement of the Ninth Symphony makes demands upon the chorus and vocal quartet which are seldom satisfied.

Last evening's program was:

Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81. .....Schumann
Concerto in E minor for violin, Op. 64.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.
Symphony No. 9, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125. .....Beethoven
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Molto vivace: Presto.
III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Barytone Recitative.
Quartet and chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor solo and chorus: Allegro assai vivaee, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

Overture Unusually Impressive.

Schumann's overture to his opera "Genoveva" is always attractive, but Mr. Fiedler made it unusually impressive. It is replete with significant material, which is developed into such sustained continuity as can be found in the works of few composers. Schumann always shows unique fealty to his themes, whether spinning a melody or weaving polyphonic texture. No other composer could have been as insistent without engendering monotony. His themes themselves are so individual and his harmonic schemes are so rich that this mode in his case only results in unity with ever-increasing power. In spite of its great virtues one feels that "Genoveva" was conceived for piano and then arranged for orchestra.

Mr. Hess played the Mendelssohn concerto brilliantly, and he was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, the chorus and his orchestral colleagues. Mr. Hess' tone has little sensuous beauty; it is indeed often a bit hard and thin, but he is obviously a good musician and possesses ample facility.

Chorus Well Sung.

The Beethoven symphony was the drawing card of the program. In it we find true orchestral idioms. Beethoven conceived it for the combinations of instruments to which its performance is entrusted, and they seem inevitable. The second movement is certainly one of its composer's most delightful creations. It has the daintiness of a Mendelssohn scherzo, but it is pervaded by a spirit of earnestness and deep sentiment. The orchestral introduction to the fourth movement is a marvelous piece of musical mosaic, formed from reminiscent touches of the themes of the preceding movements.

The choral portion of the last movement was well sung, but it presents difficulties which debar complete effectiveness. The chorus had been carefully trained, and knew its tasks, but continued high pressure is trying. There were far too many soprani for the other voices. It was seldom that the alti or men made themselves adequately felt as factors in the grand ensemble. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer and Messrs. Cunningham and Beddoe were the soloists, and each of them acquitted her or himself honorably.

The appearance of the stage, with the large chorus and orchestra upon it, was extremely impressive. O. B. B.

rom .....

ddress .....

e .....

ST CONCERT MARCH 23

The Boston Symphony season in Bal more will come to an end with its fifth and last concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 23.

It is the great, good fortune of the management of the orchestra to present as soloist for this concert Madame Marfor the only time here this season. Madame Sembrich, who retired from e operatic stage a year ago, has been voting the present season to concert rk with enormous success, and the portunity to her her here with the hestra will assuredly mean a crowded Mr. Fiedler is planning also to Richard Strauss' rogram will be andress ..... Baltimore, Md.

te ..... FEB 28 1910

EPOCH-MAKING MUSICAL EVENT

BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONY WAS SPLENDIDLY RENDERED.

By Boston Symphony Orchestra, Assisted by Baltimore Oratorio Society and Soloists — Local Singers Acquitted Themselves in Excellent Manner — The Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert in Baltimore for the present season in the Lyric Theater last evening, assisted by the Baltimore Oratorio Society, which had been rehearsed by its director, Joseph Pache. The following was the program:

Schumann—
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—
Concerto in E minor for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionata.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.
Beethoven—
Symphony No. 9, with Final Chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125.
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Molto vivace: Presto.
III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Barytone Recitative.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor solo and chorus: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

The Chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, Joseph Pache, Conductor.

Soloists—Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor; Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso; Mr. Willy Hess, violin.

Considering the perfect Boston Symphony Orchestra, the excellent Oratorio Society chorus, the quartet of fine soloists and the fact that the Beethoven Ninth Symphony is the crowning symphonic work of all history, up to the present time, the concert last evening was an epoch-making musical event for this city. The symphony has been heard in Baltimore several times, notably under the direction of Prof. D. Melamet, a few years ago, when he also presented his now justly-celebrated Columbus Cantata, which had earned for him the great Columbus prize in 1893, and which was given in New York with an orchestra of 150 and a chorus of 3,000 voices.

But the great epoch-making fact last evening was in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony itself. It marked the close of the classic period of musical composition, and the beginning of the romantic period, which immediately followed.

The first three movements of this gigantic masterwork musical tones are in the pure classic style, and their completion marked the finish of that well-named and well-rounded time. But the fourth and final movement is in the spirit of the later age. Beethoven, in it, confesses the inability of mere artificial human-made instruments to express all the emotions of the human soul. He was then convinced that this work could not be absolutely done without the employment of words of human thought and human feeling as told by living people by the human voice.

The idea had been in Beethoven's mind for years, but it came out only in the composition of this revolutionizing symphony. Schiller had given the right words in his "Ode to Joy" and Beethoven filled them to the brim with his masterly tones of human feeling. He was totally deaf and almost stone blind when he wrote the music, but by an inner way he not only heard every sound, but marked the expression of almost every note of the entire composition so that no presuming bandmaster afterward should knowingly mar his work or alter its expression.

The opening words of the bass solo, "O brothers! These sad tones no longer!" mark the great revolution in the musical kingdoms of mankind. The work is not merely the adaptation of the noble words of a noble ode to a master musician's finest music. They are the final expression of Beethoven's own feeling. He knew what he said, what he meant and the full value of what he had done. He wrote to his publisher in March, 1824:

"I must, also! now speak for myself d say that this, the greatest work that have ever written, is worth 1,000 flor- C. M. It is a new grand symphony, h a finale and voice parts introduced, and chorus, the words being those of iller's immortal "Ode to Joy," in the tyle of my pianoforte "Choral Fantasy," only of much greater breadth. One condition is attached to this symphony that it is not to appear until next July, 1825.

"The symphony was first performed at Vienna in May 1824, later it was performed at the Aix Festival, directed by Ferdinand Ries. This pupil of Beethoven afterward wrote to his master, "The orchestra and chorus consisted of 422 persons, and many very distinguished people were among them. * * The applause of the public was almost terrific! * * All was pleasure and contentment, and everyone said that this was the finest of the seven Whitsuntide Festivals held here."

The Schumann overture was finely done last evening and the Mendelssohn concerto splendidly performed by Concert Master Willy Hess, but the great symphony finally overshadowed all else in the performance of the evening.

rom AMERICAN

ddress ..... Baltimore, Md.

ate ..... MAR 1

Sembrich With Symphony.

The Boston Symphony season in Baltimore will come to an end with its fifth and last concert in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, March 23. It is the good fortune of the management of the orchestra to present as soloist at this concert Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will then be heard for the only time here this season. Madame Sembrich, who retired from the operatic stage a year ago, has been devoting the present season to concert work with enormous success and the opportunity to hear her here with the orchestra will assuredly mean a crowded house. Mr. Fiedler is planning also to give to Baltimore Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," but this is not quite settled. The program will be announced in a few days.

m ..... STAR

lress ..... Baltimore, Md.

MAR 19

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, March 23. For this Mr. Fiedler has arranged the most elaborate program the orchestra has ever given in Baltimore, not even excepting that for the last concert when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed with such success. The soloist will be that greatest of lyric sopranos, Madame Marcella Sembrich, who on this occasion makes her only appearance of the year in Baltimore. Mamade Sembrich is down for two arias and a group of songs with piano. Madame Sembrich will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. Madame Sembrich songs will be Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade."

Of quite equal importance will be the orchestral part of the program. At the request of a large number of Baltimore patrons, Mr. Fielder has placed on this program the Haydn Symphony in C Major, which is known as the Oxford Symphony. The great work, however, will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time.

STAR

ss ..... Baltimore, Md.

MAR 12

Sembrich With Symphony.

The Boston Symphony season in Baltimore will come to an end with its fifth and last concert in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, March 23. It is the good fortune of the management of the orchestra to present as soloist at this concert Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will then be heard for the only time here this season. Madame Sembrich, who retired from the operatic stage a year ago, has been devoting the present season to concert work with enormous success and the opportunity to hear her here with the orchestra will assuredly mean a crowded house. Mr. Fiedler is planning also to give to Baltimore Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," but this is not quite settled. The program will be announced in a few days.

n ..... SUN

ess ..... Baltimore, Md

e ..... MAR 13

N HARMONY'S REALM

Mme. Sembrich To Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony season in Baltimore will come to an end with its fifth and last concert at the Lyric Wednesday evening, March 23. The soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard here only once this season.

Mme. Sembrich, who retired from the operatic stage a year ago, has been devoting this season to concert work with much success. Mr. Fiedler is also planning to give to Baltimore Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." The program will be announced in a few days.

EVE. TELEGRAM

ress ..... New York City.

e ..... FEB 28 1910

Max Fiedler again demonstrated his daring as a programme builder, when, at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony, in Carnegie Hall, he gave Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Suite," Richard Strauss' remarkable tone poem; "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," followed by the exalted strains of "The Love Death" from the same opera.

From NEWS

Address ..... Baltimore, Md.

Date ..... MAR 19 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST PERFORMANCE

Final Concert Of Season At The Lyric On Wednesday Evening.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, March 23. For this Mr. Fiedler has arranged the most elaborate program the orchestra has ever given in Baltimore, not even excepting that for the last concert, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed with such success. The soloist will be that greatest of lyric sopranos, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who on this occasion makes her only appearance of the year in Baltimore. Madame Sembrich is down for two arias and a group of songs with piano.

Of quite equal importance will be the orchestral part of the program. At the request of a large number of Baltimore patrons, Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program the Haydn Symphony in G major, which is known as the "Oxford" Symphony. The great work, however, will be Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. This is the last of the monumental tone poems of the greatest living composer. It was performed for the first time at the third concert of the Richard Strauss festival at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 21, 1904, and the composer was the conductor. It was first performed at the Boston Symphony concerts three years ago by Dr. Karl Muck and Mr. Fiedler. The aesthetics of the work have been fiercely discussed; in fact, none of his works, not even excluding "Zarathustra," "Salome" or "Electra," have caused such bitter controversy among connoisseurs. It is a work of huge dimensions and enormous technical difficulty. The concert will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus."

HERALD

New York City.

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall, last night, before a vast audience.

The soloists were Messrs. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, and Willy Hess, violinist. They played the seldom heard Brahms Double Concerto remarkably well. At its close they were recalled many times. And later when Mr. Hess, concert master, took his accustomed place in the orchestra, he was rewarded with an extra round of applause.

Mr. Max Fiedler led the orchestra in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The latter work has been heard here this season under the baton of the visiting composer, but to many present it was a novelty that merited applause and received it. The playing of the orchestra was marked by the usual display of luscious tone and virtuosity, while Mr Fiedler's conducting had the usual authority.

EVENING POST,

ess ..... New York City.

FEB 25 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tchaikovsky, thirty years ago, had great difficulty in getting his symphonies accepted for performance in Vienna. He was told that he would do well to pay his respects to Brahms, who, being the musical lion of that city, might help him. Regarding this suggestion he wrote to a friend: "Brahms, the celebrity—and I, the unknown composer. I may tell you, however, without false modesty, that I place myself a good deal higher than Brahms. What could I say to him? If I were an honorable and sincere man I should have to say something of this kind: 'Herr Brahms, I regard you as an uninspired and pretentious composer, without any creative genius whatever. I do not rate you very highly, and look down upon you with disdain. But you could be of some use to me, so I have come to call upon you.' But if I were a dishonest man, then I should say exactly the opposite. I cannot adopt either course."

We all know that Tchaikovsky was wrong—that Brahms actually did possess creative genius—enough to place him among the great masters. Think of his second symphony, of some of his chamber music; think of several of his songs, among them the wonderful ballad, "Edward," which was made so thrilling on Washington's Birthday by Tilly Koenen and Ludwig Wüllner! But aliquando bonus dormitat Brahms, and when Brahms does nod he snores and makes everybody yawn. Perhaps the most somnolent of all his pieces is the double concerto for violin and violoncello which Mr. Fiedler and his admirable Boston Orchestra, aided and abetted by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, perpetrated in Carnegie Hall last night. It begins well, promising a great treat, but soon the flow of inspiration stops, and disappears, like the water of some southwestern streams, in the sands of the desert. There is not an idea in the whole concerto, and while its ingenuity of technical structure may interest professionals, it can never do anything but bore an audience of music lovers. Though admirably performed by soloists and orchestra, it evoked but one-fifth of the applause that usually follows some of Brahms's other works.

There was another piece on the programme in which there is more ingenuity of workmanship than evidence of inspiration—Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead," which the composer himself conducted in this city a few weeks ago. But there were also, to atone for these inflictions, two masterworks, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Vorspiel—as unlike to each other as two works could be, but both compact of what constitutes the essence of music—melody and emotion.

From EVE. GLOBE

Address ..... New York City.

Date .....

... The Walkure."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. FIEDLER and his men from Boston at least gave us our money's worth in length last evening, the concert consuming more than two hours. It began with a delicately tempered and exquisitely colored performance of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, wherein the themes were sung with a lyric grace, and the texture woven with a perfection of instrumental precision such as we expect from the Boston band. After this immortally lovely work came Brahms's Concerto in A minor, for violin and 'cello, with orchestra, Opus 102. Willie Hess played the solo violin, and Alwin Schroeder the 'cello. There are times when even his warmest admirers must be tempted in their hearts to confess that Brahms could be a bore. Certainly he came perilously near it in this double concerto, a diffuse work, which rambles on, and on, and then on some more, and then on again, and then once more on. But it was good to hear Mr. Schroeder's glorious tone, and his assured and authoritative style.

Next followed—after a needed rest—Rachmaninoff's Symphonic poem, "The Island of Death," "inspired" by the famous Böcklin painting. We have already heard this work, under the composer's direction. But it was not, at that time, adorned with such a perfection of orchestral coloring, such a rich, deep, harmony, as the Boston men supplied. Still, all the virtuosity in the world cannot make the piece of music the equal of—well, the equal of Böcklin's painting.

To the manifest pleasure of the big audience, the programme concluded with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"—tuneful old music, this of Wagner's—a "let down" at the finish of a stiff programme. How time changes! Mr. Fiedler and his men pitched into it with a will, and sprung it triumphantly out.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address ..... New York City

Date .....

THE Big Band from Boston on its fourth visit this year offered a programme at Carnegie Hall last night so diverse in its content and so admirably rendered that again only the highest praise can be accorded to this remarkable organization and to its leader, Mr. Max Fiedler. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" has never been played here better than last night. Following it, Brahms' concerto for violin and violincello, with Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder as the soloists, won hearty applause, although it is obviously a work which appeals only to the thoroughly informed music lover.

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," already given here this season under the composer's direction, was given by the Boston players last night with an excellent appreciation of its elegiac qualities. Mr. Fiedler wisely kept his best wine for the feast's end, concluding with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Wagner's superb overture, with its wealth of melody so nobly developed and interwoven with such truly magic skill, is a favorite piece with these players. They swept through it with electrifying abandon and sent the audience away uplifted and rejoicing.

EVE. MAIL

ess ..... New York City.

FEB 25

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth evening concert at Carnegie hall last night. Two works were of especial interest, although both had been heard before in New York. Under the baton of the composer, Rachmaninoff's "Isle of Death" was given just before his departure three weeks ago and the double concerto of Brahms for violin and 'cello has been played on rare occasions. The Brahms work will not often have such intrepreters as Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, who brought into it finished work and complete sympathy with the composer. It was masterly, not only on the part of the artists, but the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, gave an accompaniment worthy of the Boston organization. The artists were recalled several times.

The tone poem of the Russian composer, suggested by the picture of Boecklin, strengthened first impressions, although interpretations differed somewhat, and the gain in technic perfection did not offset the loss of atmosphere created by the composer. This, with no desire to reflect upon the excellent reading accorded it by Mr. Fiedler.

The programme opened with the Schubert "Unfinished" symphony and closed with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The audience was large and received with great appreciation Mr. Fiedler, who will occupy his post two years more.

om TIMES

ldress ..... New York City.

te .....

TWO NOVEL NUMBERS AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brahms's Double Concerto Played at Carnegie Hall with Hess and Schroeder as Soloists.

HARD PIECE, WELL PLAYED

Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem, "The Island of the Dead," Suggested by Boecklin's Painting, Also Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town for its fourth visit, and gave its evening concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained two numbers that had the effect of novelty for most of the audience, probably, though both had been heard in New York. One was Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello; the other was Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, called "The Island of the Dead." Brahms's concerto was played by Messrs. Alwin Schroeder and Willy Hess. It was first heard here in 1889, and has been played but very few times since, the reasons for which are not hard to find. It makes a less immediate appeal than most concertos, less than Brahms's own for the violin alone and for the piano. It is difficult and requires two artists of high accomplishment, willing to join with singular devotion. Now, a concerto in these days is generally conceived as a piece for the display of the powers of one artist, whose emoluments are not to be shared with another. The conjunction is rare, and it is welcome, especially when it brings Mr. Schroeder back to the concert platform in New York as a solo performer. He and Mr. Hess were warmly welcomed, and they gave a superb performance of the work; the performance of ripe and finished artists, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the music they were playing, and thoroughly in accord with each other. The first movement contains some of the finest and most glowing orchestration that Brahms ever wrote, and all three have the fine and individual quality of the master's work. The treatment has little for display; it is all for the sincere development of real musical ideas. It is in large measure symphonic, a characteristic it shares with Brahms's other concertos, and the interest is musical, not in the exploitation of a virtuoso's powers.

Mr. Rachmaninoff has written his symphonic poem after the suggestion of a picture by Arnold Böcklin, a German painter. The picture and its replicas are in Germany. Reproductions of it are not unknown in New York. There might be many aesthetic questions raised as to this particular species of programme music, especially as to the plight of listeners who have not the advantage of knowing the picture, or how great an advantage they have who know the original over those who know it only in reproduction. Most other programmes may be set before the anxious listener in some form or other, or he can have the opportunity of preparing himself in it in advance. A description of a picture is only less unsatisfactory than a description of music. Is Rachmaninoff's composition sufficient unto itself for those who know not Böcklin? Probably not. It is unquestionably an utterance of some extremely gloomy ideas—ideas that are in themselves fragmentary and that are repeated at great length. The work has much that is effective even without an interpretation, but it is written at too great length, with prolixity, and the themes yield comparatively little really musical development. There is a short fragment of the old church chant of the "Dies Irae" that is the most notable. The monotonous reiteration of the thematic bits contributes much to the effect that the composer was aiming at, effects of black gloom, that emerge into climaxes skilfully wrought and of real impressiveness. The instrumentation is especially skilful, and the employment of certain instrumental figures is extremely striking. But Mr. Rachmaninoff's work suffers from its length and, also being music that does not stand as something in and of itself, from the lack of the clearly outlined suggestion in the mind of the listener which the composer made his starting point.

The concert was brought to a close with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was opened by a finished performance of Schubert's unfinished symphony.

om EVE. SUN

dress ..... New York City.

e .....

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

NOW THIS TOWN AND BOSTON SWAP ORCHESTRAS.

Major Higginson's Men Play Again While Philharmonic Fathers Invade the Hub —Metropolitan Directors Watch the 'Rheingold' Audiences Grow—Kirkby-Lunn and Reinhold von Warlich.

Silver-crowned with the passing years, Alwin Schroeder rejoined Willy Hess and his old mates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night.

The two men were soloists in a double concerto of Brahms. Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony started the programme and Rachmaninoff's "Toteninsel" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture ended it. The stars had an ovation, and the whole band stood up after "Toteninsel."

Eleven symphony concerts in ten days is the unusual record begun in New York last night and going on daily through the coming week, all but one day, when there's not a symphony but an oratorio.

What would the town of Boston say to continuous performances like these? Four times the New York Symphony, thrice the Boston, twice the Philharmonic and once each the Russian and the People's orchestras play.

Over in Boston, the Philharmonic fathers and Mahler give their first and only concert to-morrow evening in the hub of the universe, which, orchestrally speaking, is Major Higginson's Boston Symphony Hall.

Opening with Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, the conductor is his own star in the Bach suite with harpsichord, followed by Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3 and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra goes to Brooklyn to-night, at the Academy of Music, with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Brahms's symphony No. 2, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival."

Reappearing in Carnegie Hall to-morrow, the Boston men play Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Strauss's "Zarathustra" again and Wagner's prelude and "Love's Death" from "Tristan." There is no soloist.

EVE. WORLD

ss ..... New York City.

Rachmaninoff's "Isle of Death" by Boston Orchestra

Max Fiedler's Men Play With All the Brilliancy to Be Expected of These Master Musicians—Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder in Brahms's Double Concerto.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night drew the usual large and fashionable audience.

The programme, one of somewhat more than the average length, consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, the Rachmaninoff tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello, played by Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, its former first 'cellist.

The Schubert symphony has been heard several times this season, but there has been no more sympathetic and delightful rendering of this symphonic gem than that led by Max Fiedler last evening. The celestial clarity and peace of the second movement were brought out with rare understanding.

The Rachmaninoff tone poem has for its subject the well known painting by Böcklin called the "Isle of Death," representing a tall, rocky and wooded islet rising from a quiet sea, across which glides the barge bearing a hooded figure and the corse. The composition was recently performed here under the composer's direction, and a second hearing confirms impressions already gathered. A sustained, sombre tone pervades the whole work, which has few well defined motives besides a monotonous figure first heard from the double basses which might represent the lapping of the water. The mood increases in intensity until a thrilling climax, introduced by divided first violins, culminates in a tremendous burst from the full brass choir. Then there is a gradual return to the first theme. The work is full of rich color and complex harmonic combinations, but, true to its subject, the gloomy undertow is never lost. It was played with the brilliant virtuosity for which the orchestra is unexcelled. Mr. Fiedler made his men stand in acknowledgment of the applause at the close of the number.

The "Meistersinger" prelude was given with sonorous dignity and with stirring spirit. The Brahms concerto, which has not often been done here, is an interesting work in its combination of the two solo instruments that sometimes reach the value almost of a string quartet, with "double stopping." The first movement has a very poetic principal theme, developed by both violin and cello in fairly divided honors. The slow movement, perhaps, is of less interest, but the rondo, built on a motif suggesting one of "Hansel and Gretel," has much charm and grace. The two soloists played with fine tone and such community of interest that they seemed often as one instrument.

[132]

TRIBUNE
New York City.
FEB 25 1910

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

If Mr. Fiedler (whom it was a pleasure last night to welcome as a conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had been re-elected for another year), indicated a frivolous disposition on the orchestra's visit to New York a month ago, he made amends at last night's concert in Carnegie Hall. He began beautifully and familiarly with Schubert's symphonic torso in B minor, and ended brilliantly and also familiarly with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; but between the opening and concluding numbers he introduced enough austerity to expiate his earlier offence and make his audience share in the penance. The second number was Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello, played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, and the third a symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," by Rachmaninoff. Brahms's music has been heard here before, but not often. It is beautiful; it is dignified; but it is not popularly appealing, and is not likely ever to become so. It is music for musicians and those who have enjoyed special advantages in musical culture. The exquisite performance which it received from the solo performers and orchestra was thoroughly appreciated last night, but the sensuous delight provided was not great. The new music by Rachmaninoff proved to be doleful. Ostensibly it is descriptive of Böcklin's picture, but it is largely a huge variation on a phrase of the "Dies Iræ," and while not deficient in fancy, and really eloquent in some of its details, the ultimate effect of the work is depressing.

AMERICAN
New York City.
FEB 25

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN VARIED CONCERT

Works of Schubert, Brahms and Rachmaninoff Presented with Rare Skill.

A concert in which at least three of the four numbers were of sufficient importance to be considered features, was given by the Boston Symhhony at Carnegie Hall last night. Each of these numbers was a distinct example of its composer's style.

One heard the essence of beautiful melody in Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony"—a work which consists of two movements only and which has been heard several times this season because. in these days of obstruse ideas in composition, there are still a number who hunger for music that really is "a concourse of sweet sounds."

One heard, as the second number, Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello, with Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the famous 'cellist, as the soloists. The work is particularly attractive in the opportunities for the soloists, the construction of their parts resembling an interesting, well-sustained conversation.

At times the melody was rather commonplace, but the harmonization that grew out of even these spots was noble and of incomparable beauty.

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" followed the Brahms number. It is a pity that the composer sailed before again hearing his symphonic poem played as it was last night. On the occasion of its last resentation in this city Rachmaninoff himself conducted, and last night Mr. Fiedler and his admirable company of musicians rose to even greater heights.

The constant roar and roll of the ocean; the tone-picture of the boat with its sad burden, while hopelessly melancholy as a composition, was nevertheless marvellously wrought out by the orchestra; the almost terrifying climax just before the end being managed with smoothness and skill that was masterful.

The Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" closed the programme.

There was not an empty seat, and the applause was sincere and decorous.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra goes rejoicing on its way after to-day's matinée in Carnegie Hall. On the week's tour, the Bostonians played to their best audience yet in Philadelphia, in spite of the street car riots there.

"The State Fencibles," said Mr. Ellis, "had called the help of the police and were holding onto their guns."

SUN,
New York City.
FEB 25

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BRAHMS'S CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN AND 'CELLO.

Performance of a Composition Seldom Given—Serge Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead" Heard Once Again—Also Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again, and at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night offered a programme which for liberality of taste could hardly be surpassed. The opening number was Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. Those who are acquainted with the ways of orchestras and the conductors of orchestras have been morally certain that the season could not come to an end without a performance of this composition by the musicians from Boston. Other orchestras have played it this season, so of course this one had to.

Without doubt this particular work was selected for last night's concert seven or eight months ago, and it was impossible to make any alteration in the arrangement even after it was learned that New York orchestras were going to play this music at us. Well and good, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has also played it and that is a sufficient record of the manifold presentations of Franz Schubert's two movements.

The second number on the list was the double concerto of Brahms for violin and 'cello. This composition, the opus 102 of its writer, is seldom heard, for it does not belong to the class of pieces which court the favor of the indolent public. It takes honest listening to extract the true delights of the work.

One's attention is aroused by the uncommonly fine introductory cadenza for both instruments at the beginning of the first movement, but when the real presentation of the composer's conception, namely that of a concerto grosso modernized, begins, the hearer is likely to lose himself in a maze of speculation.

The composer's method of modernizing the concerto grosso is to contrast the utterance of the two solo instruments treated in the manner of chamber music combination with that of the orchestra treated not in the ripieno fashion of the old concerto but in the full throated style of a modern score. If one can quickly enter into the spirit of this treatment it will provide striking beauties to hear.

The slow movement is naturally easier to grasp, for here the reflective and musing melancholy of the genius of Brahms is revealed in a new and entrancing way. The singing of the song by two individual voices, supported by the rich choral of the orchestra, is extraordinarily beautiful, and the writing for both instruments is such that it furnishes the two players with materials for the best exhibition of their art.

The finale is notable for the lavish employment of thematic matter. It is almost rhapsodic in its presentation of ideas. The work was the last in which Brahms wrote for orchestra. His subsequent compositions were in the field of chamber music. Those who always note the opacity of tint employed by this master will find it also in this concerto, but those who understand the melodic idiom of Brahms will wish that this music might be played oftener. It was admirably done last night by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, who had evidently devoted loving study to the composition.

Serge Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem after Böcklin's picture, "The Isle of the Dead," was the third number on the programme. This work was performed here by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer on January 28. On that occasion the Russian symphonists discovered that they could play better than they had supposed they could.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem is not a true copy of Arnold Böcklin's imaginative canvas. In the latter there is a phantasmal island rising from a slient sea. A boat carrying a dead body and guided by a white robed figure approaches the islayd. The whole story is told in a profound whisper.

Mr. Rachmaninoff, however, appears to use the picture only as a point of departure. He begins with a sigh, but he soon finds himself roused to passionate utterance quite at variance with the subdued speech of the painter. However, it is all quite proper. The composer is well within his artistic rights and his music is capable of standing on its own feet without the assistance of Mr. Böcklin's conception.

The final number of last night's concert was the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." This too has been played by other orchestras in the course of the current season and the end is not yet. Some time before the final curtain falls on the opera season the thrilling Mr. Toscanini will deliver himself of a reading of the entire lyric comedy of Wagner. Until that time let no dog bark.

MORN. TELEGRAPH
New York City.
FEB 25 1910

NEW YORK HAS MUSICAL DAY

Symphony's Two Recitals and an Opera Give Some Hint of Activities.

BOSTON ORGANIZATION HEARD

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn Gives Excellent Programme—"Rhinegold" at the Metropolitan.

The musical activities of New York yesterday included the penultimate visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our city; a performance of "The Rhinegold" at the Metropolitan Opera House, one recital at Carnegie Hall by the estimable English contralto, Madam Kirkby-Lunn, and another by Reinhold von Warlich at Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a programme in which there was no surrender to the populace. They played the Schubert "Unfinished" symphony, the Brahms concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the overture to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" of Richard Wagner.

The Rachmaninoff Symphonic poem was typical of much of the Russian music to which, of late years, we have generously been exposed. Its orchestral diction is rhetorical, high flown, almost "high-falutin," the employment of rich, rhetorical color, profuse sophisticated and astute. Yet the musical thought, the emotional thought, the intellectual appeal is neither profound nor persuasive.

Still Not Stirred.

We are told that this music is inspired by a familiar picture called "The Isle of the Dead." We have seen the picture, and are not stirred. We have heard Rachmaninoff's full scream of generous utterance, and are not stirred.

It is far otherwise in the case of the Brahms concerto, the strong fibres of Brahms' sublime musical intellect, strengthen every bar of his vigorously conceived music, strange, bare, distant and lofty, like mountain peaks, as at times it may seem to be.

The sound scholarship, the mature abilities of Alwen Schroeder, as 'cellist, and Professor Willy Hess, as violinist, never appeared to better advantage than in this austere but eloquent piece of composition.

The Schubert symphony received the exquisitely musical treatment which we have learned to expect from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, while the really splendid interpretation of the "Meistersinger" overture aroused an enthusiasm unusual even at Boston Symphony Orchestra performances.

Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Undaunted by a program of extraordinary heaviness, a multitude of Brooklynites filled the Opera House of the New Academy of Music, last night, to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth concert of the season. Max Fielder directed the performance of Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" (opus 81), Brahms' Second symphony, in D-major (opus 73), the Strauss tone-poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and the "Carneval Romaine" overture of Berlioz. No soloist relieved the slightly academic array of concert music, but the four ensemble offerings held the attention of the large and representative audience and each was spiritedly received.

The corps of symphonists from the "Back Bay" proved its worth once again in the opening number, the "Genoveva" overture, which was rendered with an animation and fire that communicated itself over the entire house and prepared the way for the great Brahms epic following, wherein some remarkable effects were had in the rigid observance of tempo and the carrying of rhythm. The strings were a delight throughout the rendition of the symphony, but the wind choirs were not always up to the Boston standard of evenness and resonance. In forte and furioso passages, the band was in excellent form, but in the attainment of softer and slower gradations of tone, there was more than a suggestion of raggedness.

A much better control of his great force was had by Maestro Fielder in the Strauss symphonic poem, which was given with a temperamental grasp of the spirit, as well as the text, of the ingenious musical scheme and all the varying and contradicting moods of the conception provided brilliantly fitting expression. The instrumentalists were called upon to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits which greeted the conclusion of the work.

The "Carneval Romaine" overture, played with exceeding finish and au-

PRESS
New York City.
FEB

Delightful Symphony Concert.

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, presented an interesting programme at their fourth evening concert of the season, last night in Carnegie Hall. Schubert's ever-welcome unfinished symphony in B minor opened the concert. Then came Brahms's seldom heard concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder as the soloists. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," after Arnold Boecklin's famous painting, was the next offering, and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" brought the evening to a close.

Needless to say the orchestra played Schubert's symphony beautifully. Any other treatment from the Boston men would be out of the question. The performance of Brahms's composition, however, surpassed even what every one has learned to expect from this remarkable aggregation of musicians, and the two artists who played the leading instruments in the ensemble put to their credit an achievement that was not only worthy of their reputation as musicians, but technically flawless.

Such perfect concerted playing as that of Hess and Schroeder—perfect in fusion of style, of musical intent and mechanical effort—is exceedingly rare. The difficulties Brahms has here created by using the two solo instruments, now as two voices, now as if they were one medium of wide range, always with eloquent results, are far greater than the average listener would note. But there were no apparent obstacles for these two artists, whose personality, whose physical energy, whose rhythmical pulse seemed to be one, and the orchestra under Fiedler responded to the same impulses with wonderful precision. Willy Hess never has revealed his powers to better advantage than last night, and Alwin Schroeder seldom has thrown his skill and his musicianship in a more favorable light.

The art of these two men certainly was devoted in a noble cause, for this concerto of Brahms is one of the most interesting works of the great composer, and the inspired first movement alone is worthy of holding a place among the masterpieces in musical literature.

To many persons in last night's audience Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem was an absolute novelty; to others it was almost new, as its only previous production here, though conducted by the composer himself, enlisted the services of an orchestra not quite capable of responding to all demands. On the whole, one cannot share the enthusiasm of Rachmaninoff's most ardent champions in estimating the value of this creation. The composer in his effort to paint tonal pictures, to suggest mood, to fire the imagination, has failed to build something which will stand sturdily on its own musical legs. Unquestionably Boecklin's picture awakened certain feelings in Rachmaninoff which he felt impelled to recreate in tones. The source of inspiration, however, ought not to be half as important to the listener as the result, which, in this case, cannot be asserted. One cannot help wondering what kind of success this work could win without the interest of Boecklin's picture attached to it. Let it not be denied that the tone-picture contains some effective writing, but, considered in its entirety, it is not a composition that will long endure.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH
Address New York City.
Date FEB 27 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Concert at Carnegie Hall Well Conducted by Herr Fiedler.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Max Fiedler, gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The mainstays of the programme were Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" suite and Strauss' attempt to philosophize in music.

Careful rehearsal had been given to this powerfully written piece of music, and it was most brilliantly interpreted, for to knowledge and captaincy Herr Fiedler adds real fire and vivid temepr.

From AMERICAN
Address New York City.
Date FEB 27

Cormack ...

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

Goldmark, Strauss anId Wagner contributed a symphony, a tone-poem and an excerpt from an opera to yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.

There was no soloist to divide the audience's interest in the orchestra's work, and that work was of such high order and of such absorbing interest that the lack of an assisting artist was rather a relief than cause for complaint.

The symphony was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," in five movements, representing the wedding march, bridal song, serenade, in the garden and the dance. The music was of the highest, most graceful order, melody in its daintiest and most playful mood.

At times, especially in the garden movement, the music was of most affecting tenderness, and as a compliment to this the spirited dance which followed romped and galloped through the orchestra.

Mr. Feidler caught the spirit, bent to it, so to speak—for he usually conducts as if he were standing at "attention"—and his musicians played as if inspired.

The strange, wierd, "thus spake Zarathustra," Strauss' music setting to the Nietzsche evolution story, was next heard. The orchestra struggled bravely with this unusual composition, one of the earlier works of the man who has done so much to upset the sane ideas of harmony.

With the assistance of a clear, well-worded thematic programme, it is to be hoped that at least a part of the audience understood some of Mr. Strauss's tone ideas.

The prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" was the last number. A very large and enthusiastic audience

WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 27 1910

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MATINEE CONCERT.

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony Is the Feature of a Rather Tame Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

It certainly says much for the personal popularity and drawing powers of that admirable organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra that in spite of a rather uneventful programme, without either novelty or soloist, at their matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday the audience was as large and seemingly as well pleased as usual. I do not remember having seen Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which was the piece de resistance of the concert, on a New York programme for some time, and I understand the Boston Orchestra has not played this particular work for over twenty years.

More symphonic suite than symphony, the "Rustic Wedding" is an agreeable if not a great work. Fluently melodious and charmingly scored, with much color and variety, it is programmatic only in its pictorial suggestion of mood rather than incident. Although each of the five movements carries a definite caption, like "Wedding March," "Bridal Song," "Serenade" and so on, the effect of the work is atmospheric rather than boldly descriptive like Raff, of which composer Goldmark may be said to be a modern survival.

Although later developments of the art in harmonics and orchestral construction make this music sound somewhat simple and even obvious, its sincerity and melodic straightforwardness give it an artistic value which time will show to outweigh the morbid extravagances and paroxysmal cacophony of moderns like Noren, Kooh, Reger, Bruckner and the arch cacophonist Strauss himself.

The work was read with much poetic feeling and appreciation by Mr. Fiedler, though his rhythms at times seemed blurred and indecisive, and well played by the orchestra, especially the opening variations on a theme suggesting "Adestes fidelis," as good a set as were ever written, and the lovely fourth movement, a genuine love duo, "In the Garden." The finale was taken too fast, and sounded rather confused in consequence.

After this restful music Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," with its riot of color without form, though superbly played, seemed a very chaotic Babel of restless sound which arrives nowhere in particular, unless one can trace its course with Nietzsche's work in hand—which I fear few keep beside them. So long as Strauss continues to give vent to vague mutterings he is impressive; but once let him attempt definite melody and he becomes banal and common, not to say vulgar. Vide the waltz movement in this same tone poem.

An impressive rendering of the Tristan "Prelude" and "Liebstod" closed a programme which, if lacking in event, justified itself in interest and excellence of performance.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

Orchestral Music and Opera.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon consisted of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, with its pretty variations on a theme so familiar that it has always been a wonder in the minds of (let us say) the sophisticated that the composer could have used it; Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and the Prelude and Finale of "Tristan und Isolde." It was noticeable that the simplest music in the list, the Goldmark symphony, was the most indifferently played. But there is nothing unusual in that circumstance; it is the customary thing. Compositions which call for brilliancy receive attention and simpler matters are neglected. But it was a delightful concert, and the audience enjoyed all the music, as it ought to have done, for it was all beautifully played.

SUN,

New York City.

FEB 27

RICHARD STRAUSS AND OTHERS

"ZARATHUSTRA" AFTER A "RUSTIC WEDDING."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Offers a Programme of Great Variety —Strauss and His "Uebermensch" Come Again—The Henison of Wagner.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon supplied sufficient musical contrast to sate the appetite of the most omnivorous. The first number was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which does not come often, and the second was Richard Strauss's descriptive, delineative, psychological and philosophical tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." As a fitting postlude to these two hymns of the imagination came that supremely simple and yet fathomless music, the vorspiel and liebestod of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony at a date in the musical progress of this young and vigorous country was the battle horse of Theodore Thomas. But we have lived fast and deep since those days and it is hard to interest even a Saturday matinée audience now in music so naive and superficial in its style. Goldmark just made pretty tunes and dressed them up in a little orchestration and let his work go out into the lands. Now musicians look wise and say, "Oh, the variations are good anyhow."

All the way from such music is this to Richard Strauss's tone poem on the philosophy of Zarathustra. Again the injustice of criticism! Let us be candid in dealing with the mighty composer of "Elektra." In 1897 writing of his "Zarathustra" he said: "I did not intend to write philosophical music nor to portray Nietzsche's great work musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race from its origin through the various phases of development (religious as well as scientific) up to Nietzsche's idea of the Uebermensch, the Beyond Man of Goethe."

An irreverent British critic declared that even this was a "tall order." But it is one of the striking merits of Mr. Strauss that he has never permitted himself to be daunted by the nature of the materials he has chosen for musical exposition. From the death rattle of Don Juan to the insane dance of Elektra is a perfectly logical line of progress. However too much has already been written about the futility of putting into music thoughts of a purely intellectual character. It is conceded by one large party that it cannot be done, while the opposing party holds that a composer has a right to compose a theme and declare that it represents anything he may choose to have it represent.

This being the case, of course it is feasible to delineate in music the "world sickness" or the Zeitgeist or the Gemüthlichkeit, or the fin de siécle or any other interesting and intangible matter that may chance to strike the composer's fancy. Zarathustra says himself: "It is long since I found by experience the reasons for my opinions." No more need Strauss find from his experience the reasons for his music. He can make his reasons at the same time as he makes his themes.

Some carping brethren will wish that the themes in "Thus Spake Zarathustra" had been manufactured with a little more imagination. Most of them are rather bald and unsuggestive. The Zarathustra theme itself, with its insistent C-G-C, is at any rate annoying after one has heard it fifteen or twenty times. The best part of the tone poem is the introduction. The worst is that which sounds most like "Til Eulenspiegel," because "Til Eulenspiegel" is so much better.

The interesting thing about yesterday's matinée is that the orchestra played the difficult Strauss music better than the simple symphony of Goldmark. Why was this? There were moments when unanimity walked off the stage during the performance of the symphony, while in the tone poem the tonal splendors of the orchestra were ravishing to the ear.

To be sure, in the solo violin part Mr. Hess indulged in some cometlike excursions into the outer spaces of tonality, but that does not count for so much in in a Strauss composition as it would in some others.

On the whole the tone poem was played as if Mr. Fiedler and the entire orchestra actually believed it in. Perhaps they do. These are wondrous days in the world of art, and to cherish advanced ideas is to be marching proudly with the sappers and miners.

If you love old laws of beauty you are but a barnacle on the keel of the majestic ship of novelty. Every one knows that in order to put ships in proper condition the barnacles should be scraped off. Time will attend to that.

Meanwhile ponder the ineffable eloquence and passionate directness of the vorspiel to "Tristan und Isolde" and wonder why an Uebermensch, even though conceived by the fecund brain of a Goethe, should be deemed preferable to it because turned into a prolix piece of orchestration of themes not inevitable, not even distinguished.

TIMES

New York City.

FEB 27 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Goldmark, Strauss, and Wagner at the Matinee Concert.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme began with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, a symphony that is such only in name, if old definitions are to be allowed to stand. But under whatever name, it is agreeable, pleasing, diverting music, not aiming at profundity anywhere, yet sincere and worth a not too frequent hearing. In the variations which form the first movement there are ingenuity and warmth of imagination, and the instrumentation in all the movements has richness and a euphony that never fails.

This is "programme music" of one sort—the sort that aims at only the most general suggestion for the listener's fancy to follow. Of a wholly different sort is Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which followed it on the programme. Strauss has denied that he intended in this to represent a philosophical system or to portray in music Nietzsche's work; but he has a curious and offhand way of entering denials and affirmations about his music, and the superscriptions of the several sections of this work mean nothing if they do not mean an attempt to develop in music at least the outlines of the curious and paradoxical book whose title the music bears.

There are in it many kinds of symbolism by which an attempt is made to give the music a significance which it cannot have, as music, and does not have. The various transformations and combinations of themes that are intended to do this form a curious study for the inquisitive; but they mean little for the listener. There is much ingenious writing in it; much also that is crabbed and forced. Much wrenching of the orchestral instruments out of their natural utterance in the fashion that has become a mannerism in Strauss's later works. There are same passages that are sonorous, impressive at the introduction—a truly grandiose page of music, such as the literature of modern compositions has few to offer.

There are passages waywardly characteristic; some that have traits of sincerity and true musical expressiveness. They are, overweighted, however, by others that are not only crassly ugly but of downright dull stupidity. The "dance section," that seeks to suggest lascivious pleasings, is extremely commonplace as music; the section that represents science may do so, but it forgets to be music.

The ear, even of the most courageous modern, soon wearies of the tune C—G—c, no matter in what guise it is presented or with what wonders of technical resource it is employed. Some of that which expresses grandeur ill bears consideration or analysis, and, subjected to them, turns out to be a very imposing way of saying little. In no other of his symphonic poems has Strauss made such an ambitious failure as he has in "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

The concert was brought to a close with the prelude and final scene from "Tristan und Isolde." The playing of the orchestra, especially in the enormously complicated work of Strauss, was most excellent; yet in the last movement of Goldmark's symphony, taken at a very rapid pace, there was not always the absolute clearness and precision that are expected from the Boston orchestra.

PRESS

New York City.

FEB 27

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Oil on Operatic Waters.

This soothing statement was issued in the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday: "The executive directors of the Metropolitan Opera Company have decided to defer until May all action in regard to the future administration of the Metropolitan Opera Company."

Strauss Tone-Poem Delights Crowd.

Not so many years ago, when Emil Paur and the Philharmonic Orchestra first produced the tone-poems of Richard Strauss in New York, concertgoers used to show unequivocal signs of disapproval. To be sure, our good citizens did not indulge in such rude demonstrations as hissing and whistling in vogue among some European people. But the stopping up of ears and other movements of disgust were not unusual, and it was quite the fashion for hypersensitive listeners to get up, sometimes in bodies of six or seven, and leave the house. In those days, too, that group of critics called appropriately New York's musical obstructionists, brought to bear all the verbal venom they could muster against the introduction of Strauss's music on local programmes.

What a change has now come about! Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the great German composer's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," yesterday in Carnegie Hall inspired a matinee audience to such applausive approval as afternoon gatherings seldom give to an orchestral contribution. Again and again Mr. Fiedler had to bow his acknowledgment and so insistent was the show of enthusiasm that the conductor asked all his men to stand up in response.

Of course yesterday's performance was so much better than those early productions that the listener in any circumstances got a far more lucid and euphonious impression of Strauss's beautiful work. But this Zoroastrian tone poem was not played under Taür in a way that hid its remarkable originality. The fact is the public, and some critics, too, have learned to appreciate by repeated hearing what in those days sounded to their unaccustomed ears like tonal chaos.

Credit should be given not only to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but also to Max Fiedler for one of the finest and most compelling interpretations of Strauss's tone-poem ever heard in this city. It may be that a few of Fiedler's tempos could be subjected to criticism. But the general spirit of enthusiasm and devotion that pervaded the performance, the euphony of the orchestra as a body and in its individual elements, the beautiful clarity of the musical exposition, all combined to make this a notable performance, although for some reason or other Willy Hess, the concertmaster, did not distinguish himself in the solo violin parts.

The afternoon opened with an exceedingly refreshing performance of Gold

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

FEB 28 1910

Das Konzert der Bostoner am Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall gestaltete sich vor ganz gefülltem Saal wieder zum Vollerfolg. Das Programm brachte Goldmark's selten gehörte Symphonie „Ländliche Hochzeit", in der Form eigentlich mehr einer Suite ähnelnd, aber von noch immer schöner Wirkung. Die fünf Theile des Werkes tragen Ueberschriften als eine Art Programm, aber es handelt sich mehr um die Fixirung der Stimmungsgrundlagen als um ein förmliches Programm. Das Gedankenmaterial ist gefällig, ohne auf besondere Originalität Anspruch erheben zu dürfen, die Instrumentirung zeigt Farbenfülle und feinen Klangsinn. Herr Fiedler dirigirte das Werk mit liebevollem Eifer und bestem Gelingen. So spielte das Orchester namentlich die 12 Variationen des ersten Satzes mit Poesie und Virtuosität. Der zweite Satz, das „Brautlied", brachte feinen Empfindungsinhalt und zarte Farbengebung. Im dritten, dem Scherzo „Serenade", gelangte der Humor namentlich in der diskret gebrachten Klangspielerei der ländlichen Musikmacherei zu seinem Rechte, der vierte Satz, „Im Garten", wurde gebührend poetisirend gebracht, und im Finale wurde die ausgelassene Fröhlichkeit ebenso wirksam betont als die graziöseren Züge. Sollen wir Einzelleistungen hervorheben, so würden wir den seelenvollen Gesang des Cellos im zweiten Satz und die schöne Führung der Klarinetten, offenbar des Lieblingsinstruments Goldmark's, besonders, ganz besonders aber die geniale Technik der Bässe, welche in ihrer Biegsamkeit und Klangschönheit mitunter förmlich einem Cello-Ensemble glichen, herausstreichen.

Strauß' „Also sprach Zarathustra" wurde mit einer einfach bestrickenden Virtuosität gespielt. Dieses Werk hat nie zu unseren Lieblingsstücken gezählt, aber eine solche Ausführung hebt ungeahnte Klangschätze, die uns fesseln, selbst wenn das Ganze etwas gequält erscheinen sollte. Das Violinsolo spielte Herr Heß mit blühender Klangschönheit. Den Beschluß des Concerts bildete Wagner's „Vorspiel und Liebestod" aus „Tristan und Isolde". Ob wir nicht auch dieses Wagner'sche Excerpt allzuhäufig vorgesetzt erhalten?!

H.

EVENING POST

New York City.

Boston Symphony conductors seem afflicted with a singularly unhappy propensity for always managing to spoil a really excellent programme by the inclusion of at least one unworthy offering. Mr. Fiedler forms no exception to this rule, and at Saturday afternoon's concert, he sandwiched between Goldmark's ever delightful "Rustic Wedding" symphony and the "Tristan" prelude and finale, Strauss's "philosophical" monstrosity "Thus Spake Zarathustra." There was, naturally, no adequate reason for such a course, as far better matter is available to illustrate the technical prowess of an orchestra. Needless to say, it was played with remarkable virtuosity, and though the audience was obliged to submit to over half an hour of unmusical boredom, relieved momentarily by a glimpse of something of interest, it forced the players to rise and acknowledge its plaudits at the close. Most charming, on the other hand, was the Goldmark number, which preceded it. Though not of brain-splitting ultra-modern complexity, it is brimful of what ninety-nine out of a hundred concertgoers would prefer—enchanting original melodies. The opening movement, to be sure, commits the unspeakable offence of not being in sonata form, but no one in the audience seemed particularly aggrieved over the fact. It should be heard far oftener than it is. Mr. Fiedler's men played it beautifully and were heartily applauded after it and again after the "Tristan" music.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York C

Date MAR 8 1910

STRAUSS AND GOLDMARK BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

There was no soloist at the fourth afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. It began with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, with its simple tunes, then, by way of contrast, switched off to Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," modern and complicated to the core, and finished with the vorspiel and liebestod from Wagner's majestic "Tristan und Isolde." There was a crowded house that paid deserved tribute to the splendid playing of the band.

[134]

EVE. Gglobe

New York City.

FEB 28 1910

The Boston Orchestra.

NEITHER in opera nor in concert are we neglecting Richard Strauss this season. Saturday afternoon one of the most perplexing of his tone poems, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was the piece de résistance of the programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The work is one of its author's most perplexing in regard both to its musical contents and to the technical difficulty of performance. In spite of its superb opening the work as a whole has not won the favor that has been accorded to such other of Strauss's orchestral compositions as "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan." The Boston orchestra played it wonderfully well.

So much cannot be said for the performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which opened the concert. There the orchestra fell somewhat short of its usual perfection. It was an impressive performance of the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," however, which brought the concert to an end.

EVE. MAIL

New York City.

FEB 28 1910

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a matinee concert at Carnegie hall Saturday afternoon. Most interesting was the contrast between the naive "Rustic Wedding" symphony of Goldmark and the "Thus Spake Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss. The brilliant concert closed with the prelude and close to "Tristan und Isolde."

EVE. SUN

New York City.

MAR 1910

Marcella Sembrich, at the last of the Boston Symphony visits to New York in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, is to be heard for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned for her to sing two short arias and a group of songs. That same Thursday evening also, Mr. Fiedler plans to perform Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon, March 26, last day of all, will be Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard concerto No. 3 of Max Bruch.

EVE. SUN

New York City.

MAR 1 3 19

Georges Longy of the Boston Symphony is star of the Kneisel Quartet's first Tuesday matinée at Mendelssohn Hall in a quartet with oboe by Mozart.

Josef Kovarik, viola, assists in the Brahms quintet, op. 111. Mr. Kneisel repeats Schubert's posthumous quartet by request.

AMERICAN

New York City.

MAR 13 1

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26.

From PRESS

Address New York Cit

Date MAR 1

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned to have her sing two short arias and a group of songs. Mr. Fiedler also plans to perform on that occasion Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Professor Willy Hess, the admired concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

MAR 13 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned for her to sing two short arias and a group of songs. Mr. Fiedler will also perform Richard Strauss's "Sinphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard Third Concerto of Max Bruch.

WORLD

New York City.

MAR 13 19

Music Notes.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned to have her sing two short arias and a group of songs. On Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler also plans to perform Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch.

EVE. SUN

New York City.

1910

Before Mme. Sembrich gives her annual charity matinée at the Hudson Theatre on Easter Monday, she is making a flying tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting in Boston to-morrow and coming to New York next Thursday night. Sembrich will sing here the "Deh vieni, non tardar," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a tune indelibly connected with her name in opera in New York, and also the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion oratorio, "Der tod Jesu," a song which was heard more often than it is now during the lifetime of Mrs. Lillian Henschel.

In addition, Mme. Sembrich will also have four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade."

The "Spring" symphony, which is Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, will be reenforced by the "Domestica" of Strauss, which has not been heard here in three years since the Boston men played it in Carnegie Hall under Muck.

From AMERICAN

Address

Date MAR 18 1910

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24th at 8.15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon, March 26th at 2.30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in thiis capacity with the Boston Symhony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the oloist will be Mr. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Orchestra who has not for several yeras played a concerto here although at the Thursday night concert in February he with Mr. Alwin Schroeder played the Brahms's Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello.

On Thursday night Madame Sembrich wi sing "Deh Vieni" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion Oratorio "Der tod Jesu." Madame Sembrich will also sing four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fielder's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade." The Symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No.1 called the "Spring" Symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" which has not been heard here in three years when the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it in Carnegie Hall under the leadership of Dr, Muck. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

m EVENING WORLD,

ress New York City.

MAR 19 1910

MARCELLA SEMBRICH SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Marcella Sembrich will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday night. She will sing two arias with the orchestra and four songs with piano accompaniment. Schumann's first ("Spring") symphony in B flat and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. At the Saturday matinee Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist in Bruch's violin concerto. Haydn, Richard Strauss and Tschaikowsky compositions will be played by the orchestra. These two concerts will end the Boston Orchestra's season in New York.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

MAR 19 1910

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24, at 8:15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, March 26, at 2:30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Marcella Sembrich. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra. On Thursday night Sembrich will sing "Deh vieni" from Mozart's "Figaro," an aria from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion Oratorio, "Der tod Jesu," four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song," and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No. 1, called the "Spring Symphony." Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture will also be played. On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy, "Fom Italy," and Tchaikovsky's overture, "1813."

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York Ci

Date MAR 19 1910

The last Boston Symphony concerts will be given Thursday night and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall. Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, in four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," May Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade;" also "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet." The symphony will be Schumann's first in B flat and Richard Strauss's "Domestic Symphony." Another orchestral number will be the Beethoven "Coriolan" overture.

Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, concert master of the organization, in the third violin concerto by Bruch, seldom heard in this country. The programme will also contain "A Saga" by Sibelius; Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonic fantasy: "From Italy," by Richard Strauss, and the "Oxford" symphony by Haydn.

om EVE. GLOBE

ldress New York City.

te MAR 19

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme Sembrich, at the second Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Mme Sembrich is to sing "Deh vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro"; the aria "Lo, the Heaven-descended prophet," and songs by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler, and Strauss. The orchestral numbers for the first concert are Schumann's first symphony in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Domestic" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture. The second programme includes Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, Bruch's violin concerto, played, with orchestra, by Mr. Hess; Sibelius's tone poem "A Saga," and pieces by Richard Strauss and Tchaikowsky.

The Oratorio Society will end its season by singing Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew" on the evening of Good Friday, March 25, in Carnegie Hall. The soloists will be Mme Jane Osborn-Hannah, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor; Sydney Biden, baritone, and Herbert Witherspoon, basso.

m HERALD

dress New York City.

MAR 20 19

te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO GIVE LAST CONCERT

Mme. Sembrich To Be Soloist at Its Last Entertainment of the Season Here—Other Musical Events.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra will give its final concerts of the New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Mme. Sembrich will be the soloist. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and one from Graun's oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu," besides a group of songs, including Schumann's "Widmung," Mr. Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Mr. Richard Strauss' Serenade." Mr. Fiedler's orchestra piece de résistance will be Mr. Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Schumann's "Spring" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture are also on the programme.

At the Saturday afternoon concert the Bostonians will play Mr. Sibelius' tone poem, "A Saga," which is new here, and Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Bruch's third violin concerto. A movement from Mr. Strauss' fantasia "From Italy" and Tschaikowsky's "1812"' overture will also be heard.

PRESS

New York City.

MAR 20 1910

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24, at 8.15 o'clock, and on Saturday afternoon, March 26, at 2.30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Marcella Sembrich, who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who performed at a Thursday night concert in February, with Alwin Schroeder, the Brahms Double Concerto for violin and violoncello.

On Thursday night Sembrich will sing "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," which was heard more often during the lifetime of Mrs. Lillian Henschel than it is now. Sembrich also will sing four songs with piano accompaniment—Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann in B flat No. 1, called the "Spring" symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which has not been heard here in three years, the last performance being that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

Saturday afternoon's programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra, a work little known in this country, although those who are acquainted with it consider it quite equal to the more familiar concerto in G minor. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date MAR 20 1910

The closing concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening. The solists will be Mr. Willy Hess, who will play Bruch's Third Concerto for violin and orchestra. The programme will be;

Symphony in G major, "Oxford" ..... Haydn
Concerto 3 for violin and orchestra, Op. 58 .. Bruch
"The Island of the Dead" ..... Rachmaninoff
"On the Shore of Sorrento," (from "Italy") Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner
Soloist, Willy Hess.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 20

The closing concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening. The soloist will be Mr. Willy Hess, who will play Bruch's Third Concerto for violin and orchestra.

[135]

EVE. Gglobe

New York City.

FEB 28 1910

The Boston Orchestra.

NEITHER in opera nor in concert are we neglecting Richard Strauss this season. Saturday afternoon one of the most perplexing of his tone poems, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was the piece de résistance of the programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The work is one of its author's most perplexing in regard both to its musical contents and to the technical difficulty of performance. In spite of its superb opening the work as a whole has not won the favor that has been accorded to such other of Strauss's orchestral compositions as "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan." The Boston orchestra played it wonderfully well.

So much cannot be said for the performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which opened the concert. There the orchestra fell somewhat short of its usual perfection. It was an impressive performance of the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," however, which brought the concert to an end.

n EVE. MAIL

ress New York City.

e FEB 28 1910

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a matinee concert at Carnegie hall Saturday afternoon. Most interesting was the contrast between the naive "Rustic Wedding" symphony of Goldmark and the "Thus Spake Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss. The brilliant concert closed with the prelude and close to "Tristan und Isolde."

n EVE. SUN

ress New York City.

Marcella Sembrich, at the last of the Boston Symphony visits to New York in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, is to be heard for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned or her to sing two short arias and a group of songs. That same Thursday evening also, Mr. Fiedler plans to perform Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon, March 26, last day of all, will be Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard concerto No. 3 of Max Bruch.

n EVE. SUN

ress New York City.

Georges Longy of the Boston Symphony is star of the Kneisel Quartet's first Tuesday matinée at Mendelssohn Hall in a quartet with oboe by Mozart.

Josef Kovarik, viola, assists in the Brahms quintet, op. 111. Mr. Kneisel repeats Schubert's posthumous quartet by request.

AMERICAN

ess New York City.

MAR 13 1

* * *

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26.

* * *

From PRESS

Address New York Cit

ate

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned to have her sing two short arias and a group of songs. Mr. Fiedler also plans to perform on that occasion Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Professor Willy Hess, the admired concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch.

TRIBUNE

ss New York City.

MAR 13 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned for her to sing two short arias and a group of songs. Mr. Fiedler will also perform Richard Strauss's "Sinphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard Third Concerto of Max Bruch.

WORLD

New York City.

MAR 13 19

Music Notes.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will be heard in New York for the first time this year with orchestra. It is planned to have her sing two short arias and a group of songs. On Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler also plans to perform Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch.

* * *

EVE. SUN

s New York City.

Before Mme. Sembrich gives her annual charity matinée at the Hudson Theatre on Easter Monday, she is making a flying tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting in Boston to-morrow and coming to New York next Thursday night. Sembrich will sing here the "Deh vieni, non tardar," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a tune indelibly connected with her name in opera in New York, and also the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion oratorio, "Der tod Jesu," a song which was heard more often than it is now during the lifetime of Mrs. Lillian Henschel.

In addition, Mme. Sembrich will also have four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade."

The "Spring" symphony, which is Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, will be reenforced by the "Domestica" of Strauss, which has not been heard here in three years since the Boston men played it in Carnegie Hall under Muck.

From [illegible]

Address

Date

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24th at 8.15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon, March 26th at 2.30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear and thiis capacity with the Boston Symhony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the oloist will be Mr. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Orchestra who has not for several yeras played a concerto here although at the Thursday night concert in February he with Mr. Alwin Schroeder played the Brahms's Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello.

On Thursday night Madame Sembrich wi sing "Deh Vieni" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion Oratorio "Der tod Jesu." Madame Sembrich will also sing four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fielder's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade." The Symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No.1 called the "Spring" Symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" which has not been heard here in three years when the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it in Carnegie Hall under the leadership of Dr, Muck. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

m EVENING WORLD,

lress New York City.

MAR 19 1910

MARCELLA SEMBRICH SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Marcella Sembrich will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday night. She will sing two arias with the orchestra and four songs with piano accompaniment. Schumann's first ("Spring") symphony in B flat and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. At the Saturday matinee Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist in Bruch's violin concerto. Haydn, Richard Strauss and Tschaikowsky compositions will be played by the orchestra. These two concerts will end the Boston Orchestra's season in New York.

From EVENING POST,

ddress New York City.

MAR 1 9

ate

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening,

March 24, at 8:15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, March 26, at 2:30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Marcella Sembrich. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra. On Thursday night Sembrich will sing "Deh vieni" from Mozart's "Figaro," an aria from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion Oratorio, "Der tod Jesu," four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song," and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No. 1, called the "Spring Symphony." Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture will also be played. On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy, "Fom Italy," and Tchaikovsky's overture, "1813."

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York Ci

Date MAR 19 1910

The last Boston Symphony concerts will be given Thursday night and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall. Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, in four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," May Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade;" also "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet." The symphony will be Schumann's first in B flat and Richard Strauss's "Domestic Symphony." Another orchestral number will be the Beethoven "Coriolan" overture.

Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, concert master of the organization, in the third violin concerto by Bruch, seldom heard in this country. The programme will also contain "A Saga" by Sibelius; Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonie fantasy; "From Italy," by Richard Strauss, and the "Oxford" symphony by Haydn.

om EVE. GLOBE

ldress New York City.

ate

22 [illegible]

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme Sembrich, at the second Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Mme Sembrich is to sing "Deh vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro"; the aria "Lo, the Heaven-descended prophet," and songs by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler, and Strauss. The orchestral numbers for the first concert are Schumann's first symphony in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Domestic" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture. The second programme includes Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, Bruch's violin concerto, played, with orchestra, by Mr. Hess; Sibelius's tone poem "A Saga," and pieces by Richard Strauss and Tchaikowsky.

The Oratorio Society will end its season by singing Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew" on the evening of Good Friday, March 25, in Carnegie Hall. The soloists will be Mme Jane Osborn-Hannah, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor; Sydney Biden, baritone, and Herbert Witherspoon, basso.

m HERALD

dress New York City.

MAR 13

te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO GIVE LAST CONCERT

Mme. Sembrich To Be Soloist at Its Last Entertainment of the Season Here—Other Musical Events.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra will give its final concerts of the New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Mme. Sembrich will be the soloist. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and one from Graun's oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu," besides a group of songs, including Schumann's "Widmung," Mr. Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Mr. Richard Strauss' Serenade." Mr. Fiedler's orchestra pièce de résistance will be Mr. Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Schumann's "Spring" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture are also on the programme.

At the Saturday afternoon concert the Bostonians will play Mr. Sibelus' tone poem, "A Saga," which is new here, and Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Bruch's third violin concerto. A movement from Mr. Strauss' fantasia "From Italy" and Tschaikowsky's "1812"' overture will also be heard.

PRESS

s New York City.

ishe

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24, at 8.15 o'clock, and on Saturday afternoon, March 26, at 2.30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Marcella Sembrich, who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who performed at a Thursday night concert in February, with Alwin Schroeder, the Brahms Double Concerto for violin and violoncello.

Thursday night Sembrich will sing "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," which was heard more often during the lifetime of Mrs. Lillian Henschel than it is now. Sembrich also will sing four songs with piano accompaniment—Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann in B flat No. 1, called the "Spring" symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which has not been heard here in three years, the last performance being that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

Saturday afternoon's programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra, a work little known in this country, although those who are acquainted with it consider it quite equal to the more familiar concerto in G minor. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibellus's tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

TIMES

From

Address New York City.

Date

***

The closing concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening. The solists will be Mr. Willy Hess, who will play Bruch's Third Concerto for violin and orchestra. The programme will be;

Symphony in G major, "Oxford".....Haydn
Concerto 3 for violin and orchestra, Op. 58..Bruch
"The Island of the Dead".....Rachmaninoff
"On the Shore of Sorrento," (from "Italy")
Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Soloist, Willy Hess.

***

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date MAR

The closing concert in Brooklyn the Boston Symphony Orchestra will given in the Academy of Music Friday evening. The soloist will Willy Hess, who will play Bruch's Concerto for violin and orchestra.

[135]

WORLD,

New York City.

MAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra. On Thursday night Mme. Sembrich will sing "Deh vieni" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro;" the aria, "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet," and four songs with piano accompaniment; Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and "Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, called the "Spring" Symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's" Sinfonia Domestica," which has not been heard here in three years, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it in Carnegie Hall under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's Concerto for violin and orchestra, a work which is little known in this country, although those who are acquainted with it consider it quite equal to the better known concerto in G minor. Mr. Hess played this a number of times in Germany and England two years ago when he was in Europe on a leave of absence from the Boston Symphony. The programme also contains a novelty, Sibelius's tone poem "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture "1812."

Philharmonic Pension Fund.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

MAR 20 1910

* * *

Die letzten Konzerte der laufenden Saison des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden in Carnegie Hall am Donnerstag Abend bezw. Samstag Nachmittag der kommenden Woche mit sehr interessantem Programm abgehalten. Die Solistin des Donnerstag Abend-Konzerts ist Marcella Sembrich, welche seit zehn Jahren nicht mit den Bostonern aufgetreten ist. Am Samstag Nachmittag ist Herr Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, als Solist in Aussicht genommen. Herr Heß hat mit den Bostonern seit mehreren Jahren kein Violinkonzert mehr gespielt. Obgleich er im Februar d. J. im Gemeinschaft mit Herrn Alwin Schroeder Brahms' Doppelkonzert für Violine und Cello zum Vortrag gebracht hat.

Frau Sembrich wird nächsten Donnerstag Abend folgende Nummern singen „Deh vieni" aus Mozart's „Die Hochzeit des Figaro"; die Arie „Lo, the heaven-descended prophet", ferner vier Lieder mit Pianobegleitung: Brahms Die Nachtigall; Schumann's Widmung; Max Fiedler's Wiegenlied und Strauß' Serenade. Herr Max Fiedler wird Schumann's Erste Symphonie, genannt „Frühlings-Symphonie" dirigiren, ferner Richard Strauß' Symphonia domestica und Beethoven's „Coriolan"-Ouverture.

Am Samstag Nachmittag wird Herr Heß das Bruch'sche Konzert für Violine und Orchester spielen, womit er in Deutschland und England in den letzten zwei Jahren den größten Erfolg erzielt hat. Das Konzert bringt eine regelrechte Novität, nämlich Sibelius' Tonpoem „En saga", welches in Boston vor zwei Wochen mit großem Erfolg zur Aufführung gebracht wurde. Die übrigen Nummern des Orchesters sind Haydn's „Oxford"-Symphonie; der dritte Satz aus Richard Strauß' Symphonischer Phantasie „Aus Italien", genannt „Am Strand von Sorrento" und Tschaikowsky's Ouverture „1812".

*

TRIBUNE

New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next concert under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences next Friday night at the Academy of Music. The assisting artist will be Willy Hess, violinist. On Saturday afternoon the New York Symphony Orchestra will give the last in its series of Young People's Concerts. A Wagner programme will be rendered. Miss Beatrice Herford will give an original monologue at the Academy on the evening of April 6. An exhibition of pictures of the Battle of Long Island, by Miss Georgia Fraser, of New York City, will open in the rooms of the institute at the Academy beginning next Tuesday.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, at 8:15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, at 2:30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, who has not for several years played a concerto here, although at the Thursday night concert in February he, with Alwin Schroeder, played the Brahms concerto for violin and violoncello.

On Thursday night Mme. Sembrich will sing "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion oratorio "Der tod Jesu," an aria which was heard more often than it is now during the lifetime of Mrs. Lillian Henschel, with whom it was a favorite. Mme. Sembrich will also sing four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, called the "Spring" symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has not been heard here in three years, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it in Carnegie Hall urder the leadership of Dr. Muck. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra, a work which is little known in this country, although those who are acquainted with it consider it quite equal to the better known concerto in G minor. Mr. Hess played this a number of times in Germany and England two years ago, when he was in Europe on a leave of absence from the Boston Symphony. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture "1812."

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

MAR 20 1910

NOTES OF MUSIC

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, March 24, at 8.15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, March 26, at 2.30 o'clock. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, who has not for several years played a concerto here, although at the Thursday night concert in February he, with Alwin Schroeder, played the Brahms double concerto for violin and violoncello.

On Thursday night Madame Sembrich will sing "Deh Vieni" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the aria "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet." Madame Sembrich will also sing four songs with piano, Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade." The symphony will be Schumann in B flat, No. 1, called the "Spring" symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra, a work which is little known in this country, although those who are acquainted with it consider it quite equal to the better known concerto in G minor. Mr. Hess has played this a number of times in Germany and England two years ago, when he was in Europe on a leave of absence from the Boston Symphony. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius' tone poem, "A Saga," which was done with much success in Boston two weeks ago. The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento" from Richard Strauss' Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

AMERICAN

New York City.

MAR 20 1910

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra. On Thursday night Madame Sembrich will sing "Deh vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," the tune which is so indelibly connected with her name here in New York, and the aria, "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," an aria which was heard more often than it is now during the life time of Mrs. Lillian Henschel, with whom it was a favorite. Madame Sembrich will also sing four songs with piano. The symphony will be Schumann's in B flat No. 1, called the "Spring" Symphony. The principal work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture. On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. The programme also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga." The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

HERALD

New York City.

MR. WILLY HESS, violinist, will be the soloist at the last of this season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn, next Friday evening at the Academy of Music opera house.

The following programme will be presented under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler:—

Symphony in G major, "Oxford"...Haydn
Concerto No. 3, for violin and orchestra, op. 58.....Bruch
"The Island of the Dead"...Rachmaninoff
"On the Shore of Sorrento" (from "Italy").....Strauss
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg".....Wagner

EVE. SUN

New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closes its season in New York this week Thursday and Saturday, passed through the city this morning on its way to the last concerts in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. At the Thursday night concert, as already announced, the soloist will be Marcella Sembrich.

The last Saturday matinée at Carnegie Hall will present, in addition to music already told here, Sibelius's "En Saga" and Tschaikowsky's "Overture, 1812."

The last Brooklyn programme on Friday has for added numbers Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers" and Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead."

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 22 1

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

The President and Mrs. Taft Give Second Musicale.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—The President and Mrs. Taft gave their second musicale of the season this evening, when a company of nearly 400 guests listened to the Hess-Schroeder Quartet in the East Room. Following the music, supper was served in the State dining room.

Mrs. Taft attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, accompanied by Mrs. John E. Reyburn, of Philadelphia; Mrs. Laughlin and Mrs. McCagg, guests at the White House, and Mrs. Charles Rae, of this city.

Senator and Mrs. Depew entertained a dinner company this evening. Many of the guests later attended the musicale at the White House.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Richardson Clover entertained a dinner company of eighteen guests this evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Perry Belmont entertained a large company at luncheon today.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 22

Mrs. Reyburn Mrs. Taft's Guest.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—Mrs. Taft, accompanied by Mrs. John E. Reyburn, wife of the Mayor of Philadelphia, and other guests, occupied the presidential box this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. President and Mrs. Taft had between 300 and 400 guests at a musicale this evening.

RECORD

Philadelphia

FEB 23

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music to-night. The novelty will be Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the solo number will be Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello to be played by Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder. The other numbers will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphnoy, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music to-night. The novelty will be Rachmanioff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the solo number will be Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello, to be played by Mr. Willy Hess and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The other numbers will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TIMES

FEB 24 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

A program of brilliant numbers, in which were included "The Island of the Dead," of Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Strauss' famous "'Till Eulenspiegel," was given to a fair sized house in the Academy of Music last night on the the occasion of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The symphonic poem "The Island of the Dead" is a brilliant conception and modern in treatment. It is written after the famous painting by Anton Brocklin, the Swiss artist, and conveys a sombre expression of grief and desolation. Musically it is of great effect and has a splendid climax. It was the third number on the program and was enjoyed by the audience greatly.

Concerto Enjoyed.

Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder, the violinist and cellist, appeared together in a concerto which was exceptionally well played. Both Mr. Hess and Mr. Schroeder have an individuality in playing which was heard to good advantage last night and which was applauded by the audience heartily.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra read the "Unfinished Symphony" in a masterly manner and the last number on the program "'Till Eulenspiegel" was given splendidly.

This concert is the last but one of the season, the last one being scheduled for March 21, when Madam Sembrich will be the soloist.

[136]

EVE. TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 24 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth of Current Series Has Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder as Soloists.

Gathering within the limits of its programme works of such varied character and sterling excellence as Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, Brahms' concerto in A minor for violin, 'cello and orchestra, in which Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder appeared as soloists, Rachmaninoff's symphonic tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," never before performed here, and, by way of strong concluding contrast to bring the hearers down to earth once more after the mental tension of the preceding lofty compositions, Strauss' "Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel," the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of its Philadelphia season, played last night at the Academy of Music, could not have failed of being profoundly impressive.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, imbued with melody, haunts one's memory, and at every rehearing seems to gain additional charm. Mr. Fiedler's reading of it was most satisfying. The Brahms concerto, in which Mr. Hess and Mr. Schroeder both fully upheld their high standards, also exhibited in marked degree the exceptional coherence and finish of the whole orchestra. During the solo passages the accompaniment was always substantial, but never in the least blotted out the work of either Mr. Hess or Mr. Schroeder. The compelling beauty of the andante, with its echo-like passages, fascinates the imagination. Of course, an encore was demanded and the soloists were brought out again and again, but the inexorable rule of no encores was preserved. The Rachmaninoff number, by its gruesome treatment, sent thrills and shivers through the audience. It is rarely beautiful, but really needs "Till Eulenspiegel" as a psychological antidote. The whole concert was uniformly excellent and sustained the reputation of the Boston Symphony for consummately artistic and intelligent interpretation.

QUARTETTE

om EVENING BULLETIN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te FEB 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fourth Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

Notwithstanding the suspension of the street car service, the audience which listened to the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening, was almost as large as usual, and the orchestra has not often played here before a more appreciative or enthusiastic gathering of music lovers. The program was of more than ordinary interest, including the favorite and ever entrancing Unfinished Symphony (the B-minor) of Schubert, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," never before played here; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and, as a solo feature, Brahms's Concerto in A-minor for violin and 'cello, with orchestra, played by Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony, and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist.

The Schubert symphony, in sheer beauty of the most melodious and appealing variety, probably is unsurpassed in the entire realm of symphonic music, and as played last night its charm was compelling and complete. The word "unfinished" applies only to the absence of two movements, which Schubert never wrote, for there is nothing else lacking to make it one of the most beautiful and satisfying of compositions. Mr. Fiedler's reading is not noticeably emotional, but it is sane, reverent and enlightening, with the composer, not the conductor, most in evidence.

The Rachmaninoff work, "The Island of the Dead," was inspired, or suggested, by a painting by A. Bocklin, and, as the title suggests, is of a sombre and gloom-enshrouded nature. So prevalent is the air of tragedy and portent, in fact, that the effect is one of monotony and depression, though this may have been intended. Certainly, the doleful subject permits of little in the way of cheerfulness, but Rachmaninoff has at least written a rich and colorful work, even if the colors all are of sombre hue, and his instrumental ingenuity and powers of graphic tonal elucidation are apparent. It was wonderfully well played, and the effect on the audience evidently was distinctly favorable, for Mr. Fiedler was recalled several times at its conclusion.

The Brahms concerto, starting off in a rather dry and unattractive manner, soon develops more melodious charm, and proved on the whole an interesting composition, of characteristic technical intricacies and bizarre effects, so well played that it could not fail to please. The soaring soprano of Mr. Hess's seraphic violin, and the deep, rich contralto of the far-famed Schroeder 'cello, sang exquisitely in solo passages and united harmoniously in duet measures, while the orchestra, which really has the most attractive part, joined in an interpretation so effective that the audience was most cordial in its expressions of delight, recalling the distinguished soloists at least half a dozen times. The "Till Eulenspiegel" number, a musical joke in quaint, fantastic measures, aptly realizing the mischievous "Merry Pranks" suggested in the title, closed the program in delightful fashion. The fifth and last concert of the season will be held on Monday evening, March 21, with Mme. Sembrich as soloist.

88.

n PUBLIC LEDGER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 24 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Alwin Schroeder and Willy Hess Play Brahm's Double Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

1. Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
2. Brahms: Concerto in A minor for Violin and 'Cello, with Orchestra.
3. Rachmaninoff: "The Island of the Dead," Symphonic Poem.
4. Richard Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel.

A large audience found its way to the Academy last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction, with Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, and Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the orchestra, as the assisting artists in a double concert.

The great symphony, of which but two movements were written ere the premature termination of Schubert's life and labors, was given an authoritative interpretation. The first notes of the double basses, sotto voce, projecting the austerely solemn mood of the first movement, were not less impressive than the shimmering tremolo of the violins in their further enunciation of the composer's message, and in the andante the flute of Percy Macquarre and the oboe of Georges Longy were heard like pleading voices in a dialogue. Mr. Fiedler is not of the number of those conductors who would impart strained and unusual readings of familiar texts. Neither does he suffer his individuality to any undue degree to come between the instrumental corps and the audience. He seems to approach the classical score in a spirit of veneration like that of an officiating priest in a temple whose mission is not the exploitation of himself, but the inspiration of the multitude.

The dual achievement of Willy Hess and Alwin Schroeder in the Brahms concerto was a brilliant performance. The two instruments, onsoaring together in the intervals between the "tutti" passages sounded as full-voiced as a string quartette, by virtue of the full, resonant chords evoked from Mr. Schroeder's 'cello and Mr. Hess's singing violin. The work is prolific in melody, and while the composer asks a good deal of the dual alliance of soloists in the way of technique the general intent of the music is fairly clear even to a layman at first hearing.

At any rate the music was so well liked that the applause consumed a large fraction of the intermission of ten minutes that divided the concerto from the symphonic poem.

The Rachmaninoff music was played for the first time in Philadelphia. Its inspiration is a picture by the German painter Bocklin. The opening chords put one in mind of Strauss's "Elektra," and every now and then for many staves together came passages of battle, murder and sudden death, wherein one saw Madame Mazarin pawing the ground in quest of the hatchet, or heard Aegisthens yammering at the bars before the vengeful fury of orchestra. But at other points the work attained an epic breadth and majesty that were overwhelmingly impressive. The light of day is fairly blotted out by the arriving host of vampires and harpies; there are the wild shrieks of ravening monsters of every sort, and charnel-house reveiries that make the grisly horrror of Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" sound as innocently gay as a debutante's dancing party by comparison. It was the quintessence of Poe's tales, in terms of music. The composer's handling of the muted brasses, in particular, is masterly, and no means is left unemployed to accentuate the effect of mortuary mystery. The audience liked the work well, and its recurrence will be welcomed.

The diverting Eulenspiegel, in his "merry pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner," brought the programme to an end, with a fine chance given every instrument for what in the vernacular would be called a "stunt." One mystified hearer said it reminded him of a slightly insane musician trying to amuse children. The work was magnificently played and correspondingly well received.

HESS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...

om ...

dress ...

te MAR 10 1910

* * *

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21, and with this concert will come the last opportunity Philadelphia will have of hearing Madame Marcella Sembrich, for she is to be the soloist.

She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the program will be announced in a few days.

* * *

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 24

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Concert at the Academy Last Evening Enjoyed by a Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of a large and enthusiastic audience. How all the people managed to get there in view of the fact that no street cars were running is a dark mystery, but they were there and they were rewarded for the energy and courage they had shown by being treated to one of the most satisfying and enjoyable concerts of the present musical year.

It began with a reading of Schubert's enchanting "Unfinished Symphony," which was quite exquisite in its crystalline clearness, tone and beauty and polished refinement, and it closed with a brilliantly effective interpretation of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." In between came Brahms' concerto for violin and violoncello, admirably played by Mr. Willie Hess and Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, and a symphonic poem for full orchestra by Rachmaninoff, entitled "The Island of the Dead." The Brahms' concerto is rich in thematic material of an ingratiating and attractive character, which is worked up and worked over by Brahms' accustomed skill; but it is not music whose full significance or whose whole value can be apprehended at a single hearing, and the impression which it chiefly produced last night was that of a desire to hear it soon again.

An absolute novelty was the Rachaninoff tone poem which proved to be extremely interesting. It is not necessary to its appreciation that its association with the subject to which it is related should be clearly identified. It is an originally conceived, powerfully written and poetically imaginative piece of work without regard to the label which it bears, and the hearty applause which its performances elicited indicated the pleasure which its performance had afforded. Its appearances on symphony programs hereafter are likely to be frequent.

The fifth and last of these concerts is announced for Monday evening, March 21.

n RECORD

ess Philadelphia, P.

FEB 24 191

"ISLAND OF THE DEAD"

Boston Orchestra Gives Symphonic Poem by Russian Composer.

Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fourth concert of its Philadelphia season before a large audience, in the Academy of Music last night. In addition to Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," there were two interesting novelties. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Brahms' Concerto in A minor, for violin and violoncello.

It is noticeable, in these days of elaborate program notes "that there is no detailed description of what Rachmaninoff's work attempts to do. It is attributed "to the picture by A. Boecklin," and a great deal more space is given to description of the celebrated painter and his art in the program than to the work of Rachmaninoff. This would seem to indicate that Rachmaninoff, who so recently conducted his Symphonic Poem for the Boston Orchestra, has not authorized a specific "program." He has probably allowed for the fact that such a work would be suggestive enough to an intelligent hearer without any attempt at explanation of the picture involved, although it is to be feared that with a subject so attractive and suggestive the program writers will not be long in arranging an elaborate guide.

"The Isle of Death" is a strikingly monotonous work, probably intentionally so. There are passages which fill the listeners with a sense of awe that almost approaches terror. In a way it is intensely dramatic, creating in a decided manner both atmosphere and mood. It is too massive and impressive a piece of writing to be digested at a single hearing, but there can be no doubt that it left the audience deeply stirred. and perhaps of such a composition no greater test could be given.

The Brahms' Concerto for violin and violoncello was played by Professor Willy Hess and Alvin Schroeder. It is a very long and rather dry work, but, played by two such artists, the interest was maintained throughout. They were recalled several times, the audience evincing a keen desire to recognize the worth of these two musicians, apparently, for Max Fiedler's aversion to encores prohibited any hope in that direction.

The "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert was beautifully played, and the Strauss work was presented with admirable skill and in a strikingly effective manner.

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 12 1910

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music one week from next Monday evening. Mme. Sembrich, who is to be the soloist, will sing two short arias and a group of songs.

1884

[137]

rom NORTH AMERICAN

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate FEB 24

RACHMANINOFF PLAYS HIS 'ISLE OF THE DEAD'

Russian Pianist Strongly Interprets Symphonic Poem of Picture.

ORCHESTRA NOVELTY

Boston Symphony Organization is Accompanist for Gifted Musician.

By H. T. Craven

RACHMANINOFF'S genius, typical of that of many of his compatriots, for expressing a certain wistful and somber poetry in terms of music, has found a natural inspiration in Arnold Boecklin's familiar picture, "The Isle of the Dead." The young Russian composer's symphonic poem bearing this title was played for the first time in this city last evening at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, and proved itself in several respects one of the most interesting musical novelties of the current season.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is universally recognized as a pianist. He is also known, perhaps too well, as the author of a "prelude" for his chosen instrument that seems likely to win almost the indiscriminate favor of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" or Rubinstein's "Melodie." The reputation of the pianist-composer, who has been heard in Philadelphia twice this year, may easily rest on firmer ground.

His symphonic poem, which Director Fiedler interpreted in a mood of the keenest appreciation, is "atmospheric" to a degree unusual even in modern music where "tone pictures," "mood pictures," orchestral silhouettes and "instrumental" etchings predominate.

The new composition, however, by no means monopolized all the interest in a most attractively arranged program. Willy Hess, the admirable concertmaster of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, the former first cellist, were heard in Brahms' melodious and, for virtuosi, rather effective concerto for violin and cello.

EXCELLENT PROGRAM DU...

m INQUIRER

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e MAR ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21, and with this concert will come the last opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Madame Marcella Sembrich, for she is to be the soloist. She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the program will be announced in a few days.

m PRESS

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e MAR 13 MAR

* * *

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21, and with this concert will come the last opportunity Philadelphia will have of hearing Madame Marcella Sembrich, for she is to be the soloist. She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the program will be announced in a few days.

* * *

m RECORD

ress Philadelphia,

e MAR 13

MUSIC NOTES

—The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21. Marcella Sembrich is to be the soloist. She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the program will be announced in a few days.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 24

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rachmaninoff Symphonic Poem the Novelty—Hess and Schroeder the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a most delightful program for their fourth concert of the season, and a large audience, in spite of poor traffic facilities, was present. There were four numbers, one of which was a novelty in Philadelphia. Equally attractive was the joint appearance of Willy Hess, the violinist, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, who played a concerto, the combination being rarely heard in the concert room.

Rachmaninoff's first appearance in America this season has made the Russian pianist and composer quite a vogue. His presence in Philadelphia, in the early part of the season, in which he not only played but conducted his own compositions, had made the performance of any of his works, for the first time here, of more than the usual interest. His symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," was the third number on the program.

"The Island of the Dead."

This composition was heard for the first time in America at the Theodore Thomas Orchestra concert in Chicago on December 3 last. It had its first hearing in Moscow less than a year ago, and, like all of the writings of this modern composer, it is modern in construction. The "Poem" is written after the well-known painting of the celebrated Swiss artist, Anton Bocklin. Like its inception, it is somber in color, though full of musical inspiration. It is original in its rhythmic life. It will hardly become popular, yet it raises one's respect for the composer to a still higher elevation. It well conveys musically the hidden human passions of grief and despair, yet the vision is never dreadful, but rather enticing. The climax is inspiring and well worked out.

Mr. Fiedler and his instrumentalists gave the usual eloquent reading of the Rachmaninoff number, and at its finish their was hearty applause, which was evidently intended for a joint tribute to composer and conductor.

Violin and 'Cello Concerto.

The Brahms concerto was another very much enjoyed number. It is not Brahms at his most brilliant moments, but at the period when he is full of musical thought. The two instruments combine well and it is hard to account for their infrequent combination. Mr. Hess has an individuality in his playing that is truly delightful and last evening his tone was particularly fine and brilliant. Mr. Schroeder is an equally finished 'cellist, whose playing never fails to arouse enthusiasm and while in the concerto he is frequently given opportunity to display his finished art, it is not a work in which he can display any particular brilliancy of execution, nor a show of marvelous execution, which he is able to accomplish with such wonderful effect.

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" opened the concert and was read as only Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony can interpret it. The last number on the program was Strauss' brilliant "Till Eulenspiegel," which is quite familiar to Philadelphia concert-goers. It was admirably read by Mr. Fiedler and was played with even more than the ordinary dash by the orchestra. It was given with an unusual amount of spirt and the incorrigible "Till," and his merry pranks, coverted in their richly humorous but no less masterful way, through the conductor's interpretation of Strauss.

The concert is the last but one of the season, the soloist for the final concert, on March 21, being Mme. Sembrich.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 13

Boston Orchestra Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final concert of the season in the Academy of Music on the evening of March 21. The special feature of the program will be Marcella Sembrich, the soprano, so long connected with the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard in two short arias and a group of songs. The full program will be announced in a few days.

Mary Hallock, the American pianist, will give a recital in the New Century Drawing Room on the evening of March 19 for the benefit of the Linden Hall Alumnae Association. Miss Elizabeth Cleeman Clayton, soprano, will be the assisting artist. The detailed program will be:

Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Prelude, Nos. 4, 22.
Waltzes, G flat major and A flat major. Chopin
Mary Hallock.
Aria from "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Tschaikowsky
Arietta ..... Grieg
Elizabeth Cleeman Clayton.
Spinning song ..... Mendelssohn
"The Skylark" ..... Tschaikowsky
Gavotte ..... Dreyschok
Rakeczy March ..... Liszt
Mary Hallock.
"Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces."
Wilson Damon Strange
Elizabeth Clayton.
Rhapsodie ..... Liszt
Mary Hallock.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 13

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21, at 8:15, and with this concert will come the last opportunity Philadelphia will have of hearing Madame Marcella Sembrich, who is to be the soloist. She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the programme will be shortly announced.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 19 1910

THE fifth and final Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, the soloist being Madame Marcella Sembrich, who has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is connected with her fame. The first is the familiar "Deh vieni," from the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro," the other "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss' "Serenade." The orchestral part of the concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B-flat Major No. 1, and in conclusion Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 20 1910

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, at 8.15. The soloist will be Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this city for the first time with the Boston orchestra. Madame Sembrich has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is so indelibly connected with her fame as the most musical singer of her time. The first is the familiar "Deh Vieni," Susanna's aria in the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro." For the present generation of opera-goers Madame Sembrich is the only Susanna known, for during the last 10 years, in which she was one of the principal singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, whenever this opera was given this role was hers. Her other aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a famous Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano—Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss' "Serenade."

MARCELLA SEMBRICH.

The orchestral part of the concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," and then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B-flat major No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 25 1910

FINE CONCERT TO-NIGHT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music to-night. The principal works will be Brahms' Symphony in D Major, No. 2, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 26 1910

MORE OF STRAUSS AT THE ACADEMY.

The manifest growth of the Strauss craze was never more apparent than last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth of its series of Institute concerts in the Academy of Music gave this composer's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." In view of the fact that this composition has not been heard in Brooklyn for several years, at least not since its creator was swept into the limelight of sensationalism by such characteristic exemplaries as "Salome," and more recently "Elektra," there were many in the audience who were naturally curious. It represents not only a work of a character distinctly peculiar to the present generation of musical development, but also a line of thought which was considered by all authorities to be far beyond the province of artistic expression. But all the laws ever promulgated by his predecessors never restrained Strauss for a moment from casting them aside or using them for purposes which would have turned the hair of those venerable preceptors gray for fright. In "Zarathustra," Strauss endeavors to portray the philosophic growth of the superman as conceived by that painwracked genius, Frederick Nietzsche. The human being, aspiring to rise above itself into a personification of the ideal, is the theme upon which Neitsche sought to build his theory of the evolution of man. As he progresses into his argument, his ideas become more and more fanatical and after all, little remains of the realization of the superman further than the crushed and disappointed hopes of the philosopher—Nietzsche himself. From this subject Strauss, with his wonderful imaginative faculty, receives abundant inspiration. His picture of the man's development from grovelling matter to a great, powerful force, to the like of which man in his present state should aspire, is fraught with the conflict of concrete personalities. There are loves, passions, whims, which he freely attributes to the human nature and for which Nietsche in his impossible idealistic dream had absolutely no regard. Many pages of the music bear absolutely no relation to Nietsche—they tell of Strauss solely. The audience received this number with much applause. It was not only interesting from the opening bars right through to the vague mysterious finale, but absolutely fascinating. The orchestra under Fiedler could not be found wanting in any single respect. Not only was the director's reading of the tone poem illuminating and scholarly, but under his intelligent guidance the musicians passed from page to page without the slightest suggestion of difficulty or misunderstanding. As for the remainder of the programme, the conspicuous feature was Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," two numbers that are not heard very often, were also on the programme. Neither of them are of very great consequence, being among the earlier and less important efforts of their respective composers. Willie Hess, who was to be the soloist last evening, will appear at the next concert of the Bostonians.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 12 1910

Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orcrestra, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of that organization in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 25. He will lay the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch. The rest of the programme will be anonunced in a few days.

Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 12 1910

Prof. Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of that organization at the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 25.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 27

STRAUSS' TONE POEM HEARD.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Played by Boston Orchestra.

A finely interpretative reading of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," an attempt to convey in music the development of mankind up to Nietzsche's superman, was the feature of Friday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. Like all of Strauss' works, however, even the most sympathetic reading can convey only a vague idea of what it is all about to the musically informed, while to the average concert goer the symphony is a mere melange of strange sounds in which appear now and then pasages of exquisite melody and thrilling climaxes. It is a composition that requires more than one hearing.

Strauss' own outline of the work is: "First movement—sunrise. Man feels the power of God, but man still longs. He plunges into passion, but can find no peace. He turns toward science, and tries in vain to solve life's problem. Then agreeable dance tunes sound and he becomes an individual, and his soul soars upward while the world sinks beneath him."

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is scored for many instruments, among these being two harps and a low-toned bell in E, which is used with beautiful effect, especially in the "Song of the Night Wanderer," which comes after a stroke of the bell in fortissimo, with the bell sounding twelve times in accents that die away into silence.

Throughout Max Fiedler had his players masterfully in hand, and the famous Boston Symphony tone was in evidence to fully as great a degree as in the past. Much of the Strauss work requires orchestral playing of an almost virtuoso technique, and there are unusual combinations to be wrestled with, but the orchestra measured up to the requirements.

Equally fine was the reading of Brahm's Second Symphony, in D major, in which the second movement, adagio upn troppo, and the third, adgietto grazioso, were exquisitely done. The scherzo in the second movement was delightfully played. The vivacious finale, with its golden beauty, was most effective. Mr. Fiedler brought out finely the peaceful serenity which is most characteristic of this symphony.

The programme opened with Schumann's overture, "Genovera," well played, but not over interesting. Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," was the final number, and was read with spirit and sympathy.

On the whole, the programme was the most interesting that Mr. Fiedler has given his Brooklyn audiences this season.

LIFE
From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date MAR 5 - 1910

THE performance of Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—"freely after Freidrich Nietsche"—overshadowed everythng else on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert this season at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. Weird enough in itself, the effect produced was aggravated, for some of the audience at least, by certain untoward circumstances over which Mr. Fiedler had no control. The following is a condensed version of one listener's description of her impressions during the performance: "It began with an impressive introduction, with solemn trumpet motive; then shivery ascending passages in a minor key answered by weird chromatic thirds from the wood winds. This sent an unreasoning terror through one which changed to a feeling of deep depression upon the introduction of a pathetic voice-like dirge played on violins and oboes. In the midst of this a young woman stumbled up the aisle and fell in a dead faint just as she reached my seat. She was carried out and a physician called upon to attend her. About this time the music fell to so soft and grave a song that the ticking of a clock inaudible before could be heard distinctly and the horrible thought kept forcing itself upon me that it was the heart beats of the young woman out in the corridor that I was listening to. Then came Zarathustra's struggles with science and when my companion leaned over and remarked flippantly 'This reminds me of —— Street on a summer's night, with all the cats, graphophones, pianos, hand-organs and rag men making the welkin ring,' it was too much for me. We both, in fact, gave way to an uncontrollable fit of suppressed laughter until, sobered by a reproving voice from behind remarking audibly 'Well, I call that a real pretty piece,' to which her friend naively replied: 'But it's awful hard to get men to come and sit through a thing like this.'" The other numbers on the program were Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Brahms' serenely beautiful symphony Number 2 in D major, and Berloiz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Arthur Wellington Foote and Miss Grace Palmer occupied one of the boxes, and in another were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mr. and Mrs. Albert L. Mason, Miss Sarah W. Holmes and Mrs. John Van Nostrand. Others noticed in the audience were: Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. Chauncey E. Low, Miss Nathalie Low, the Misses Ingalls, Miss Marion Terry, the Rev. Eliphalet Terry, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Henry E. Ide, Miss Isabel Ide, Miss Eunice Mallory, Mrs. George White Field, Miss Benson, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Miss Kate D. Allin, Miss Alice Fowler, Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss Alice Ide, Mrs. Richard P. Merritt, Miss Lilla Merritt, Mrs. Adolph Goepel, Miss C. Muriel Goepel, Miss Marie Appleton and Mr. and Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer.

* * *

m PRESS
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te FEB 24

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rachmaninoff Symphonic Poem the Novelty—Hess and Schroeder the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a most delightful program for their fourth concert of the season, and a large audience, in spite of poor traffic facilities, was present. There were four numbers, one of which was a novelty in Philadelphia. Equally attractive was the joint appearance of Willy Hess, the violinist, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, who played a concerto, the combination being rarely heard in the concert room.

Rachmaninoff's first appearance in America this season has made the Russian pianist and composer quite a vogue. His presence in Philadelphia, in the early part of the season, in which he not only played but conducted his own compositions, had made the performance of any of his works, for the first time here, of more than the usual interest. His symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," was the third number on the program.

"The Island of the Dead."

This composition was heard for the first time in America at the Theodore Thomas Orchestra concert in Chicago on December 3 last. It had its first hearing in Moscow less than a year ago, and, like all of the writings of this modern composer, it is modern in construction. The "Poem" is written after the well-known painting of the celebrated Swiss artist, Anton Bocklin. Like its inception, it is somber in color, though full of musical inspiration. It is original in its rhythmic life. It will hardly become popular, yet it raises one's respect for the composer to a still higher elevation. It well conveys musically the hidden human passions of grief and despair, yet the vision is never dreadful, but rather enticing. The climax is inspiring and well worked out.

Mr. Fiedler and his instrumentalists gave the usual eloquent reading of the Rachmaninoff number, and at its finish their was hearty applause, which was evidently intended for a joint tribute to composer and conductor.

Violin and 'Cello Concerto.

The Brahms concerto was another very much enjoyed number. It is not Brahms at his most brilliant moments, but at the period when he is full of musical thought. The two instruments combine well and it is hard to account for their infrequent combination. Mr. Hess has an individuality in his playing that is truly delightful and last evening his tone was particularly fine and brilliant. Mr. Schroeder is an equally finished 'cellist, whose playing never fails to arouse enthusiasm and while in the concerto he is frequently given opportunity to display his finished art, it is not a work in which he can display any particular brilliancy of execution, nor a show of marvelous execution, which he is able to accomplish with such wonderful effect.

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" opened the concert and was read as only Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony can interpret it. The last number on the program was Strauss' brilliant "Till Eulenspiegel," which is quite familiar to Philadelphia concert-goers. It was admirably read by Mr. Fiedler and was played with even more than the ordinary dash by the orchestra. It was given with an unusual amount of spirt and the incorrigible "Till," and his merry pranks, coverted in their richly humorous but no less masterful way, through the conductor's interpretation of Strauss.

The concert is the last but one of the season, the soloist for the final concert, on March 21, being Mme. Sembrich.

om NORTH AMERICAN
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te MAR 13

Boston Orchestra Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final concert of the season in the Academy of Music on the evening of March 21. The special feature of the program will be Marcella Sembrich, the soprano, so long connected with the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard in two short arias and a group of songs. The full program will be announced in a few days.

Mary Hallock, the American pianist, will give a recital in the New Century Drawing Room on the evening of March 19 for the benefit of the Linden Hall Alumnae Association. Miss Elizabeth Cleeman Clayton, soprano, will be the assisting artist. The detailed program will be:

Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Prelude, Nos. 4, 12 .....
Waltzes, G flat major and A flat major. Chopin
Mary Hallock.
Aria from "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Tschaikowsky
Arietta ..... Grieg
Elizabeth Cleeman Clayton.
Spinning song .....
"The Skylark" ..... Mendelssohn
Gavotte ..... Tschaikowsky
Rakecsy March ..... Dreyschok
Mary Hallock. ..... Liszt
"Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces."
Wilson Damon Strange
Elizabeth Clayton.
Rhapsodie ..... Liszt
Mary Hallock.

m PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te MAR 13

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 21, at 8:15, and with this concert will come the last opportunity Philadelphia will have of hearing Madame Marcella Sembrich, who is to be the soloist. She will sing two short arias and a group of songs. The rest of the programme will be shortly announced.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa. ss MAR 19 1910

THE fifth and final Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, the soloist being Madame Marcella Sembrich, who has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is connected with her fame. The first is the familiar "Deh vieni," from the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro," the other "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano, Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss' "Serenade." The orchestral part of the concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B-flat Major No. 1, and in conclusion Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

RECORD
s Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 20 1910

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, at 8.15. The soloist will be Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this city for the first time with the Boston orchestra. Madame Sembrich has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is so indelibly connected with her fame as the most musical singer of her time. The first is the familiar "Deh Vieni," Susanna's aria in the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro." For the present generation of opera-goers Madame Sembrich is the only Susanna known, for during the last 10 years, in which she was one of the principal singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, whenever this opera was given this role was hers. Her other aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a famous Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano—Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss' "Serenade."

MARCELLA SEMBRICH.

The orchestral part of the concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," and then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B-flat major No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

* * *

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 25 1910

FINE CONCERT TO-NIGHT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music to-night. The principal works will be Brahms' Symphony in D Major, No. 2, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genevera" and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
m
dress
te FEB 26 1910

MORE OF STRAUSS AT THE ACADEMY.

The manifest growth of the Strauss craze was never more apparent than last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth of its series of Institute concerts in the Academy of Music gave this composer's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." In view of the fact that this composition has not been heard in Brooklyn for several years, at least not since its creator was swept into the limelight of sensationalism by such characteristic exemplaries as "Salome," and more recently "Elektra," there were many in the audience who were naturally curious. It represents not only a work of a character distinctly peculiar to the present generation of musical development, but also a line of thought which was considered by all authorities to be far beyond the province of artistic expression. But all the laws ever promulgated by his predecessors never restrained Strauss for a moment from casting them aside or using them for purposes which would have turned the hair of those venerable preceptors gray for fright. In "Zarathustra," Strauss endeavors to portray the philosophic growth of the superman as conceived by that painwracked genius, Frederick Nietsche. The human being, aspiring to rise above itself into a personification of the ideal, is the theme upon which Neitsche sought to build his theory of the evolution of man. As he progresses into his argument, his ideas become more and more fanatical and after all, little remains of the realization of the superman further than the crushed and disappointed hopes of the philosopher—Nietsche himself. From this subject Strauss, with his wonderful imaginative faculty, receives abundant inspiration. His picture of the man's development from grovelling matter to a great, powerful force, to the like of which man in his present state should aspire, is fraught with the conflict of concrete personalities. There are loves, passions, whims, which he freely attributes to the human nature and for which Nietsche in his impossible idealistic dream had absolutely no regard. Many pages of the music bear absolutely no relation to Nietsche—they tell of Strauss solely. The audience received this number with much applause. It was not only interesting from the opening bars right through to the vague mysterious finale, but absolutely fascinating. The orchestra under Fiedler could not be found wanting in any single respect. Not only was the director's reading of the tone poem illuminating and scholarly, but under his intelligent guidance the musicians passed from page to page without the slightest suggestion of difficulty or misunderstanding. As for the remainder of the programme, the conspicuous feature was Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," two numbers that are not heard very often, were also on the programme. Neither of them are of very great consequence, being among the earlier and less important efforts of their respective composers. Willie Hess, who was to be the soloist last evening, will appear at the next concert of the Bostonians.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
m
ress
te

Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orcrestra, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of that organization in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 25. He will lay the rarely heard third concerto of Max Bruch. The rest of the programme will be anonunced in a few days.

m ress
te MAR

Prof. Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of that organization at the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 25.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. ess
FEB 27

STRAUSS' TONE POEM HEARD.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Played by Boston Orchestra.

A finely interpretative reading of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," an attempt to convey in music the development of mankind up to Nietzsche's superman, was the feature of Friday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. Like all of Strauss' works, however, even the most sympathetic reading can convey only a vague idea of what it is all about to the musically informed, while to the average concert goer the symphony is a mere melange of strange sounds in which appear now and then pasages of exquisite melody and thrilling climaxes. It is a composition that requires more than one hearing.

Strauss' own outline of the work is: "First movement—sunrise. Man feels the power of God, but man still longs. He plunges into passion, but can find no peace. He turns toward science, and tries in vain to solve life's problem. Then agreeable dance tunes sound and he becomes an individual, and his soul soars upward while the world sinks beneath him."

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is scored for many instruments, among these being two harps and a low-toned bell in E, which is used with beautiful effect, especially in the "Song of the Night Wanderer," which comes after a stroke of the bell in fortissimo, with the bell sounding twelve times in accents that die away into silence.

Throughout Max Fiedler had his players masterfully in hand, and the famous Boston Symphony tone was in evidence to fully as great a degree as in the past. Much of the Strauss work requires orchestral playing of an almost virtuoso technique, and there are unusual combinations to be wrestled with, but the orchestra measured up to the requirements.

Equally fine was the reading of Brahm's Second Symphony, in D major, in which the second movement, adagio upn troppo, and the third, adgietto grazioso, were exquisitely done. The scherzo in the second movement was delightfully played. The vivacious finale, with its golden beauty, was most effective. Mr. Fiedler brought out finely the peaceful serenity which is most characteristic of this symphony.

The programme opened with Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," well played, but not over interesting. Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," was the final number, and was read with spirit and sympathy.

On the whole, the programme was the most interesting that Mr. Fiedler has given his Brooklyn audiences this season.

From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date MAR 1910

THE performance of Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—"freely after Freidrich Nietsche"—overshadowed everything else on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert this season at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. Weird enough in itself, the effect produced was aggravated, for some of the audience at least, by certain untoward circumstances over which Mr. Fiedler had no control. The following is a condensed version of one listener's description of her impressions during the performance: "It began with an impressive introduction, with solemn trumpet motive; then shivery ascending passages in a minor key answered by weird chromatic thirds from the wood winds. This sent an unreasoning terror through one which changed to a feeling of deep depression upon the introduction of a pathetic voice-like dirge played on violins and oboes. In the midst of this a young woman stumbled up the aisle and fell in a dead faint just as she reached my seat. She was carried out and a physician called upon to attend her. About this time the music fell to so soft and grave a song that the ticking of a clock inaudible before could be heard distinctly and the horrible thought kept forcing itself upon me that it was the heart beats of the young woman out in the corridor that I was listening to. Then came Zarathustra's struggles with science and when my companion leaned over and remarked flippantly 'This reminds me of —— Street on a summer's night, with all the cats, graphophones, pianos, hand-organs and rag men making the welkin ring,' it was too much for me. We both, in fact, gave way to an uncontrollable fit of suppressed laughter until, sobered by a reproving voice from behind remarking audibly 'Well, I call that a real pretty piece,' to which her friend naively replied: 'But it's awful hard to get men to come and sit through a thing like this.'" The other numbers on the program were Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Brahms' serenely beautiful symphony Number 2 in D major, and Berloiz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Arthur Wellington Foote and Miss Grace Palmer occupied one of the boxes, and in another were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mr. and Mrs. Albert L. Mason, Miss Sarah W. Holmes and Mrs. John Van Nostrand. Others noticed in the audience were: Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. Chauncey E. Low, Miss Nathalie Low, the Misses Ingalls, Miss Marion Terry, the Rev. Eliphalet Terry, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Henry E. Ide, Miss Isabel Ide, Miss Eunice Mallory, Mrs. George White Field, Miss Benson, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Miss Kate D. Allin, Miss Alice Fowler, Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss Alice Ide, Mrs. Richard P. Merritt, Miss Lilla Merritt, Mrs. Adolph Goepel, Miss C. Muriel Goepel, Miss Marie Appleton and Mr. and Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer.

* * *

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 19 1910

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, March 25, at 8:15, and to wind up his season Mr. Fiedler has made a more than usually elaborate programme. The soloist will be Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. He will play Bruch's seldom-heard third concerto for violin and orchestra, which he has played much in Europe and in this country, for he deems it an even more successful composition than the better-known concerto in G minor.

Daily Eagle
Brooklyn
MAR 19

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, at 8:15, and to wind up his season Mr. Fiedler has made a more than usually elaborate programme. The soloist will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who is one of the most popular violinists that comes to Brooklyn. He will play Bruch's seldom heard Third Concerto for violin and orchestra, which he has played much in Europe and in this country, for he deems it an even more successful composition than the better known Concerto in G minor.

The programme begins with Haydn's charming Oxford Symphony and comprises beside this and the Bruch Concerto, Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the Third Movement from Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia "From Italy," entitled "On the Shore of Sorrento" and Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 19 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE MARCH 25

Willy Hess the Soloist in Striking Programme.

FULL WEEK OF MUSIC AHEAD.

N. Y. Symphony and Philharmonic Society Offer Fine Concerts —Music Notes.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, March 25, at 8:15, and to wind up his season. Mr. Fiedler has made a more than usually elaborate programme. The soloists will be Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Bruch's seldom-heard third concerto for violin and orchestra, which he has played much in Europe and in this country, for he deems it an even more successful composition than the better-known concerto in G minor.

The programme will begin with Haydn's charming "Oxford" symphony and will comprise besides this and the Bruch concerto, Rachmaninoff's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the third movement from Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," entitled "On the Shore of Sorrento," and Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Rachmaninoff's tone-poem will be heard in Brooklyn for the first time. The impression made by this Russian during the past season in this country not only as a pianist, but as a composer and conductor, was one of the most enduring kind. The "Isle of the Dead" stamps him, if he had written nothing else, as a composer of the very first quality, decidedly a man to be reckoned with. He has drawn his inspiration from the familiar fantastic picture of the Swiss artist, Arnold Bocklin, which represents a rocky, cypress-crowned islet in the midst of a still calm sea, having in the foreground a boat containing a single oarsman, a coffin and standing a figure robed in white. It is a picture full of imagination and fancy and it is easily understood how it could stir the imagination of Rachmaninoff's poetic genius. The work has been played in Boston, New York, Chicago and other cities, both under the conductorship of Mr. Rachmaninoff and of Mr. Fiedler, with much success.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 26 1910

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Splendid Concert in Its Brooklyn Series.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music (the fourth in the season's series), had much to say for itself. It spoke eloquently and convincingly to the crowded auditorium and as the programme was given over entirely to orchestral music, the concert was an impressive illustration of how truly edifying such an entertainment can be. The occasion was one of the few opportunities Brooklyn has had this season to test the satisfying vitality of a concert devoted exclusively to orchestral music.

It is not too much to say that it was one of those concerts that, besides gratifying the musical sensibilities, seem to stir the thought and feeling of the listener to a finer appreciation of the power of music, and leaves a memory that fondly dwells upon the proposition of what really delightful things orchestral concerts are. The concert opened with Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," not often heard, and not a work of the greatest interest. It is composed with an obvious knowledge of how to write such a work, but its musical material is not of a character to take a very definite hold of even the most willing listener.

There was the customary principal symphonic number, in this case Brahms Second Symphony, his most gracious and, it might be said, his greatest work, if right consideration is given to actual musical interest as a qualification. And why should not such a consideration be a determining factor in estimating the value of a musical creation. Brahms has written much that is fine composition in a strictly technical or musically professional sense, but which is lacking in the milk of human kindness that must appear in every really great musical work. Brahms' unrelenting admirers are inclined to speak patronizingly of this Second Symphony because it is so direct and understandable as compared to his other writings, but this quality has much to do with making it one of the really splendid expositions of the symphonic form.

Strauss was again represented on the programme (this is surely a Strauss season), and his tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was heard for the first time in Brooklyn. This composition has in the past called forth a great deal of criticism, and there was probably some misgiving on the part of last night's audience as to just what it would prove to be. After its splendid performance there could hardly be a doubt that it is a remarkably interesting work. Of course, it is what is known in musical circles as strictly "programme music," music that seeks to interpret precisely a given scheme of thought or story, and in this respect the composer gives a vivid exposition of passages from a book by Frederick Nietzsche. For a proper understanding of this tone poem it was desirable that the listener should have one of the explanatory programmes which, it is understood, is sent to subscribers to these concerts, but which, for advertising reasons, cannot be distributed at the concert. This music is not interesting in the commonplace way, but it is a singularly vivid fulfillment of its ostensible purpose.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, was a brilliant and fitting finale to the concert. Mr. Fiedler conducted so earnestly that it may seem like quibbling to qualify commendation of his task, but it is not out of the way to remark that his wielding of the baton was rather too indiscriminately energetic to ensure the finest results. More poise and finished delicacy of expression was desirable at some points, especially in the third movement of the symphony.

n.....
ess.....
.....
MAR 26 1910

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, March 25, and to wind up his season Mr. Fiedler has made a more than usually elaborate programme. The soloist will be Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, who is one of the most popular violinists that comes to Brooklyn. He will play Bruch's seldom heard Third Concerto for violin and orchestra, which he has played much in Europe and in this country, for he deems it an even more successful composition than the better known Concerto in G minor. The programme begins with Haydn's charming "Oxford" symphony, and comprises besides this and the Bruch Concerto, Rachmaninoff's tone-poem "The Isle of the Dead," the Third Movement from Richard Strauss' symponic fantasia "From Italy," entitled "On the Shore of Sorrento," and Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Rachmaninoff's tone-poem will be heard in Brooklyn for the first time. The impression made by this Russian during the past season in this country, not only as a pianist but as a composer and conductor, was one of the most enduring kind. The "Isle of the Dead" stamps him, if he had written nothing else, as a composer of very first quality, decidely a man to be reckoned with. He has drawn his inspiration from the familiar fantastic picture of the Swiss artist, Arnold Bocklin, which represents a rocky, cypress crowned isle in the midst of a calm sea, having in the foreground a boat containing a single oarsman, a coffin, and standing figure robbed in white. It is a picture full of imagination and fancy, and it is easily understood how it could stir the imagination of Rachmanioff's poetic genius. The work has been played in Boston, New ... Chicago and other cities, both under the conductorship of Mr. Rachmaninoff and of Mr. Fiedler, with much success.

ADVERTISER.
MARCH 26, 1910

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Madame Marcella Sembrich is again showing her generosity of spirit in volunteering to be the soloist at the second Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, April 17..

Madame Sembrich will have to make a special trip from South Bend, Ind., where she sings on Friday evening, April 15, and then she will hurry away from Boston early in the morning after the concert to continue her tour. Mr. Fiedler plans to devote the entire orchestral part of the programme to excerpts from Wagnerian music dramas, while Madame Sembrich ... arias from Italian operas, and ... songs.

BOSTON JOURNAL—APRIL 8, 1910.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tickets for the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 17, are now on sale at Symphony Hall. The soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will sing the "Involami" aria from Verdi's "Ernani" and a group of songs. The first part of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner, the selections being the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "Parsifal," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Between the aria and the ...ngs the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler ... play Martin Loeffler's "The ...'s Villanelle."

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 25, 1910

News of Music

The Boston Orchestra gave its final concert for the year in New York last night, and on the programme stood Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Schumann's symphony in B flat and Strauss's "Domestica." Of Mr. Fiedler's conducting in all three pieces and of the playing of the orchestra in them the Sun this morning has this timely word: "Mr. Fiedler has throughout the season sought to evoke from the Boston Symphony Orchestra a larger and more brilliant tone than it hitherto emitted. There were rude thunders in last night's concert such as we have not been wont to hear from the clear and starry firmament of this organization. Doubtless some music lovers are troubled with questionings as to whether this is altogether for the best. Ancient Horace emitted this pungent line: 'Vis consili expers mole ruit sua. This is a truth worth pondering. The big tone habit is almost as bad for orchestras as it is for singers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been renowned for the exquisite finish of its performances. There were moments in the symphony of Schumann last night when one wondered whether something of this had not been sacrificed to other things not so desirable. Strauss's music better endures the power of sound, yet even in this there are passages which would have been better for a little polishing. Nevertheless there was much brilliancy of style in the playing of both pieces, and Mr. Fiedler produced some splendid dramatic climaxes."

BOSTON JOURNAL—MARCH 26, 1910

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Mme. Marcella Sembrich will be the soloist at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 17. Mr. Fiedler plans to devote the entire orchestral part of the program to excerpts from Wagnerian music dramas.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will provide two more novelties by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, an elegie and musette from his suite, "King Christian II.," and the second is a "Valse Triste." The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the other unmbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

MONITOR.
MARCH 26, 1910.

THE CONCERTS.

At the twentieth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, April 1, and at the twentieth concert Saturday evening, April 2, two novelties by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, will be presented. Both works are short. They come in the course of the following program: Beethoven, Symphony in F major, "Pastoral," No. 6, op. 68; Tschaikowsky, "Francesca da Rimini," Fantasia after Dante, op. 32; Sibelius, Elegie and Musette from Suite "King Christian II"; Valse triste, first time in Boston; Dvorak, overture, "Carneval."

The seventh symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theater Thursday evening, March 31. The soloist will be Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, who will play Saint-Saens' concerto for violin No. 3. The program of this concert contains works that have found favor at the Boston concerts, as follows: Schumann's Spring symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Richard Strauss' "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonic fantasy "From Italy," and Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival."

NOTES.

Mme. Marcella Sembrich has volunteered her services as soloist at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given Sunday evening, April 17, in Symphony Hall. The orchestral part of the program will be excerpts from the Wagner music dramas; Mme. Sembrich's numbers will be arias from Italian operas and songs.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 26, 1910

sion is called.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Bossi's "Paradise Lost" for the Easter Oratorio of the Handel and Haydn Society —Two New Pieces by Sibelius at the Symphony Concert—Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead" for the Orchestra's Concert in Cambridge

For its final concert of the present season the Händel and Haydn Society will give Enrico Bossi's "Paradise Lost," tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall. The work, which is designated as a "Symphonic Poem for Solo Voices, Chorus, Orchestra and Organ," follows a large design. Its divisions are a Prologue in three parts, Hell, Paradise and Earth. A note on the flyleaf of the score explains that the text, which is a translation of Milton into Italian, is necessarily very free. It is, in fact, substantially a paraphrase of Milton's verses. The persons are represented variously, Adam by the baritone voice, Eve by soprano, Satan by baritone, Molock by bass, Belial and Uriel by contralto, the voice of the Father by the full chorus, and the voice of the Son by the tenors in chorus. The soloists chosen for these parts are Mme. Jomelli, the soprano; Mme. Alice Lakin, an English, contralto; Mr. Sidney Bidell, baritone, and Mr. Stephen Townsend and Mr. Willard Flint. Although Bossi's work ... been made well and favor... abroad by many perf... has never hitherto be... public in America. The ... support has been strengthened and Mr. Emil Mollenhauer's capable leadership may be trusted to enhance the inherent beauties of the score. Owing to the length of the oratorio the performance will begin at half past seven.

GLOBE—MARCH 27, 1910.

Mme Sembrich Soloist at Symphony Fund Concert.

That Mme Sembrich has volunteered her services as soloist of the second pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra, which will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, April 17, is but another evidence of the good will she has always exhibited toward fellow musicians. Since coming to America she has made it a rule once a year to give her services for some worthy object, and this year she will extend her allotment, for she has already consented to sing for a charitable concert in New York.

It will be remembered that after the San Francisco earthquake she gave a song recital in Carnegie hall shortly before her sailing, and devoted the entire receipts to the purchase of new instruments for the members of the opera orchestra, who had lost everything they possessed in that great catastrophe.

Mme Sembrich will be compelled to take a long journey from South Bend, Ind. where she sings Friday evening, April 15, in order to get here for the concert Sunday evening. She will leave early Monday morning to continue her tour.

Mr Fiedler plans to devote the orchestral part of the program to excerpts from Wagnerian dramas, and Mme Sembrich will sing arias from Italian opera and probably a group of songs with piano.

[139]

HERALD, BOSTON,

MARCH 27, 1910

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Mme. Sembrich has volunteered her services as soloist of the second Pension Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, April 17. Since coming to America she has made it a rule once a year to give her services for some worthy object. The only question that has been in her mind about singing for the Symphony orchestra in this concert has been the possibility of arranging a date convenient for both herself and the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler plans to devote the purely orchestral part of the program to excerpts from Wagnerian music dramas and Mme. Sembrich will sing arias from Italian operas and probably a group of songs with piano.

The seventh and last but one of the Symphony concerts in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, who will play Saint-Saens' concerto for violin No. 3. The program will include Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," Strauss' "On the Shore of Sorrento," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

POST, MARCH 27, 1910

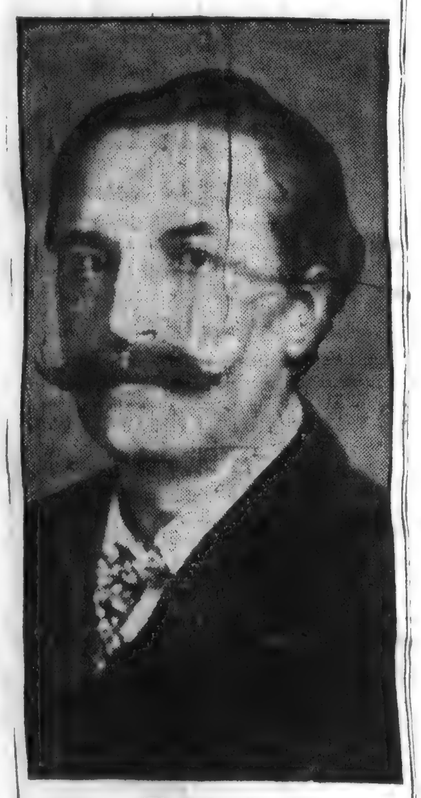
Pension Fund Concert

That Mme. Sembrich has volunteered her services as soloist of the second Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 17, is but another evidence of the good-will she has always exhibited toward fellow-musicians. Since coming to America she has made it a rule once a year to give her services for some worthy object, and this year she will extend her allotment, for she has already consented to sing for a charitable concert in New York. It will be remembered that a few years ago after the San Francisco earthquake she gave a song recital in Carnegie Hall shortly before her sailing and devoted the entire receipts to the purchase of new instruments for the members of the opera orchestra, who had lost everything they possessed in that great catastrophe.

MONITOR,

MARCH 28, 1910.

Concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra Gets Offer of Rare Berlin Post



(Photo by Garo.)

WILLY HESS.

Called to Royal Academy of Music, Berlin, to direct violin department to succeed Professor Holie.

BERLIN—Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been called to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to become director of the violin department in succession to the celebrated late Professor Holie.

The Symphony orchestra is at present en tour and Professor Hess is not in the city. It could not be learned definitely whether he would consider the call to Berlin. He has been concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra since the season of 1905.

Herald

MARCH 28, 1910.

WILLY HESS IS CALLED TO BERLIN

Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Offered Post of Director of Violin School of Royal Academy.

[Special Cable Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

BERLIN, March 27—Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been called to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to become director of the violin department in succession to the celebrated late Prof. Holie.

The Symphony Orchestra is at present en tour and Prof. Hess is not in the city. It could not be learned definitely whether he would consider the call to Berlin. He has been concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the season of 1905.

He was born on July 14, 1859, at Mannheim. When he was 6 years old he began to study the violin with his father, and at the age of 10 he gave concerts in Holland and afterward in Belgium, France and Germany.

In 1869 he visited Boston as a member of Theodore Thomas' orchestra. In 1876 he went to Berlin to study with Joachim. In 1878 he was appointed concert master of the opera and of the Museumsgesellschaft orchestra at Frankfort-on-the-Main. He remained in Frankfort for eight years.

In 1886 he was called to Rotterdam as concert master, but after two years he was called to Manchester, Eng., to take the place of Ludwig Strauss, who had resigned his position as concert master of the orchestra led by Charles Halle.

In 1895 he settled at Cologne as concert master of the Guerzenich concerts, leader of the Guerzenich quartet and professor of the violin at the conservatory.

He was appointed professor of the violin at the Royal Academy of Music, London, a year or so ago, and resigned this position to come to Boston as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RECORD,

MARCH 28, 1910

WILLY HESS WILL GO TO BERLIN

Berlin, March 28.—Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been called to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to become director of the violin department in succession to the celebrated late Prof. Holie.

Professor Willy Hess has sent in his resignation as concert master of the Symphony, to take effect at the close of the current Symphony season on April 30.

Although Mr. Hess' contract with the Symphony Orchestra had one year to run, the management has consented to release him.

Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and one of the most notable violinists in Germany, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Hess.

Hess was born on July 14, 1859, at Mannheim.

In 1869 he visited Boston as a member of Theodore Thomas' orchestra. In 1876 he went to Berlin to study with Joachim.

He was appointed professor of the violin at the Royal Academy of Music, London, five years or so ago, and resigned this position to come to Boston as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 29, 1910.

SEEKING WITEK AS SUCCESSOR OF HESS

Confirming cable despatches from Berlin that Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been called to the German capital, announcement was made yesterday at Symphony Hall that Professor Hess had sent in his resignation, to take effect at the close of the season, April 30. Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, a noted violinist, and it is probable he will come to Boston. Professor Hess was under contract to stay a year longer in Boston, but the management consented to release him.

HERALD,

MARCH 28, 1910.

ANTON WITEK TO TAKE PLACE OF WILLY HESS IN SYMPHONY

Orchestra Negotiating with Violinist Who Will Probably Succeed Concert Master.

Prof. Willy Hess.

Confirming a cable dispatch in The Boston Herald this morning that Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been called to Berlin, announcement was made at Symphony Hall today that Prof. Hess had sent in his resignation, to take effect at the close of the current Symphony season, April 30.

Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, is the probable successor of Prof. Hess. The announcement puts it in this way:

"Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, ane one of the most notable violinists in Germany, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Hess was under contract to remain one year longer with the Symphony Orchestra; but his invitation to Berlin is so advantageous to him that the management consented to release him. The announcement says:

"Prof. Hess has just been appointed the head of the violin department of the Koenigliche Hochschule of Berlin, as successor to the late Carl Halir, who succeeded Josef Joachim in this very hoonrable and important position. Moreover, Mr. Hess will become the head of the Halir quartet, which was the successor of the Joachim quartet, and will now be known as the Hess quartet; and, also, will become the first violin of the Schumann trio, of which the head is Georg Schumann, the well known composer and conductor. He also becomes conductor of the orchestra of the Hochschule, the post which Joachim held with that institution.

"Although Mr. Hess' contract with the Symphony Orchestra had one year to run the management has consented to release him, but with much regret, for Mr. Hess has proved himself to be, during his stay in Boston, not merely a violinist of extraordinary quality, but a concert master, than whom there is no better in the world."

BOSTON POST

APRIL 2, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

As if in honor of the weather, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony opened the programme of the 20th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," after Dante, followed. Three pieces of Sibelius were heard for the first time here, and "Elegie" and "Musette" from incidental music to Adolph Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II.," and a "Valse Triste," from music to another drama, Arvid Jarnefelt's "Kuolema" ("Death").

Of these pieces the "Elegie" is the best. It has true though constrained melancholy. There is no caterwauling. The composer says less, instead of more, than he feels. The "Musette" is pleasant and has the savor of folk music. The "Valse Triste" is cheap and ordinary to the last degree. It has an impressive programme: a dying mother in her last delirium. She hears dance music, the dancers appear before her. She leaves her bed and moves noiselessly about among them, but they do not see her. Presently, when the classic is at its height, the door opens—the music stops. Death enters; The music might enhance the effect of such a spectacle on the stage, but it is so purely external that it has no significance in the concert room.

Tschaikowsky's overture is in many respects a clumsy piece of workmanship, and more than once the composer is felt pulling himself up by his boot straps.

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 3, 1910

Mr. Fiedler has arranged the principal features of the remaining weeks of the season at Symphony Hall. Next week Fritz Kreisler will play Tchaikowsky's violin concerto, and Mr. F. S. Converse's early work, "Endymion's Narrative," after Keats, will open the programme. At the following pair of concerts Liszt's Faust Symphony will be given with the Apollo Club. For the 23d concert and public rehearsal Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme Strauss' "Don Quixote," which has not been heard here since Mr. Gericke produced the work for the first time in Boston in the season of 1903-04. The last programme will consist of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies.

[140]

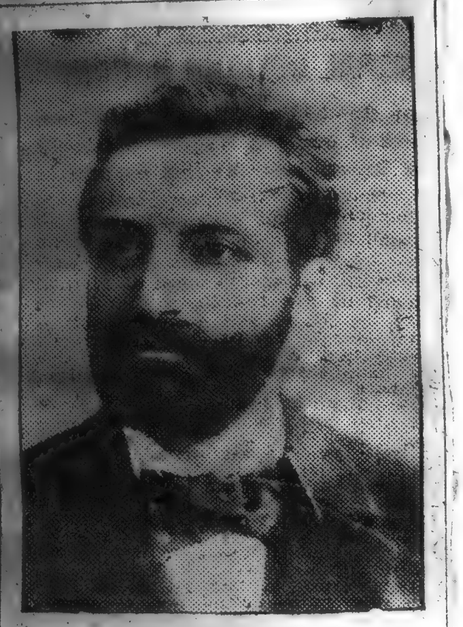
GLOBE—
MARCH 28, 1910.

TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Prof Willy Hess Accepts Position in Berlin.

Prof Willy Hess has sent in his resignation as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to take effect at the close of the current Symphony season on April 30.

Prof Hess has just been appointed the head of the violin department of the Konigliche Hochschule of Berlin, as successor to the late Carl Halir, who succeeded Josef Joachim in this very honorable and important position. Moreover, Mr Hess will become the head of the Halir quartet, which was the successor of the Joachim quartet and will now be known as the Hess quartet; and also will become the first violin of the Schumann trio, of which the head is Georg Schumann, the well-known composer and conductor. He also becomes conductor of the orchestra of the Hochschule, the post which Joachim held with that institution.



PROF WILLY HESS.

Although Mr Hess' contract with the Symphony orchestra had one year to run, the management has consented to release him, but with much regret, for Mr Hess has proved himself to be, during his stay in Boston, not merely a violinist of extraordinary quality, but a concert master than whom there is no better in the world.

Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin philharmonic orchestra, and one of the most notable violinists in Germany, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Mr Hess.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
APRIL 2, 1910.

BEETHOVEN NUMBER SYMPHONY FEATURE

Thunderstorm in "Pastoral" Strikingly Expressed by Players.

MANY NOVELTIES ON THE PROGRAM

Music in "Francesca da Rimini" Fantasia Splendid Exhibition of Orchestral Bravura.

There were brave tone painters before Agamemnon Strauss. Beethoven's thunderstorm, in the "Pastoral" symphony, and Tschaikowsky's windstorm, in the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, were among the striking features of yesterday's Symphony matinee. The simple, yet profound spirit of the Beethoven number was perfectly expressed in Mr. Fiedler's reading, while the performance of the music depicting Paola and Francesca, imprisoned in the winds and blowing around the world was a splendid exhibition of orchestral bravura.

The novelties this week are the Elegie and Musette from the "King Christian II." music by Sibelius, and a "Valse Triste," by the same downhearted composer. The Sibelius pieces were interesting, but it was good to hear, immediately afterward, the Dvorak "Carnival" overture, with its pictures of revelry by night and by day.

Converse's "Endymion's Narrative," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, with Kneisel as soloist, and Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme" are on next week's program.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 28, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MR. HESS TO LEAVE THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The New Posts in Berlin That He Has Accepted in Succession to Joachim—The New Concert-Master for the Orchestra Here—The Haendel and Haydn Society in a New Oratorio — Bossi's "Paradise Lost" as It Was Sung Last Night for the First Time in America—An Opera of American Indians and by Americans Approaching Performance in Berlin—The Ways of Mr. Hammerstein—Mr. Zach's Work in St. Louis—A Kind Word for Mr. Converse

Mr. Hess, the concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, has decided to accept the new posts that have been offered to him in Berlin; the management of the Symphony Orchestra is willing to release him from its contract with them; and, accordingly, he will leave the band at the end of the current season and in the autumn settle permanently in Berlin. First of all, Mr. Hess will succeed the late Carl Halir, the eminent violinist who died last November, as the head of the violin department in the Royal Academy of Music (the Hoch-Schule) in Berlin. He will, furthermore, become the leader of the Halir string quartet, and the violinist of Georg Schumann's trio—piano, violin and violoncello—and he will conduct at the concerts of the orchestra of the Hoch-Schule. The Halir Quartet was the successor to Joachim's; and the Hess Quartet, as it will now become, will succeed in its turn to the Joachim tradition. The Schumann Trio likewise continues it; while in the teaching of the Hoch-Schule Mr. Hess will practically succeed to the work that Joachim did for many years before old age and his administrative duties as the principal of the whole academy compelled him to abandon it. The experiment that brought Mr. Marteau to the Hoch-Schule, after Joachim's death, has evidently proved less fruitful than anticipations suggested, and Mr. Hess will now succeed to Joachim's various activities in the school itself and in the concerts of Berlin.

Now that Halir is gone, no violinist is so directly the heir of Joachim as is Mr. Hess. He studied with the elder violinist; and he has continued all his life to follow the Joachim methods, and, duly liberalized by his own temperament and the changing musical times, the Joachim "traditions" and standards. Though Mr. Hess has chosen oftenest to work as a teacher, as a concert-master, and as the leader of string quartets, rather than to lead the life of a wandering virtuoso, he is one of the foremost violinists of our time, who has at last entered into rewards that properly crown such distinction. From Mr. Gericke, through Mr. Fiedler, the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, the men of the band, the public of the concerts have all borne witness to Mr. Hess's abilities as concert-master. In him indeed, and in nearly equal measure are the steadying sureness and the communicating spirit that are essential to such work. As a leader of a string quartet, connoisseurs here have long known the quality of his work and applauded. His individuality in a chamber concert was indeed insistent, but in itself it struck fire. As a virtuoso at the Symphony Concerts and elsewhere, especially in the fine richness of his present maturity of mind, imagination and execution, it is easy to believe that Mr. Hess, had he chosen, might have made his career like to those of the violinists who go up and down the world. He elected another, and now one of its richest rewards has come to him.

Symphony Hall: "Paradise Lost"

Enrico Bossi calls his "Paradise Lost" a symphonic poem. His compatriot, Ferrucio Busoni, is the composer of a "choral" concerto for pianoforte. Always the human voice invites the invention of an Italian composer; if he is an eighteenth century violinist writing a concerto, or a twentieth century piano virtuoso, he must sing. It has evidently occurred to Bossi that oratorio, as a form, lends itself to symphonic structure, and "Paradise Lost" is his experiment. It would have been more successful had the librettist been less generous of text and the composer more ample in his conception of orchestral parts. The present structure is necessarily piecemeal, frequently interrupted, or confronted with the full stop. It has neither symphonic unity, on the one hand, nor the dignified restraint of old oratorio on the other. Conceivably, the composer's purpose could have been better served by a symphony in more than the ordinary number of movements, with choral obbligato. But would Bossi have been capable of dealing with this scheme successfully? "Paradise Lost" leaves a doubt of it.

The performance of the work last night in Symphony Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society dealt with it now as oratorio, now as operatic, and again as symphonic, and complaint of a mixing of styles is somewhat stilled by the suspicion that the styles were mixed, not by the performers, but by the composer. Indeed, it is a fair question whether the man lives who could weld a chorus and orchestra in such a manner as not to suggest (let his purpose be symphonic) either opera or operatic oratorio. If the composer had been a Frenchman, instead of an Italian, his instinctive sense of style would have compelled him to keep to the form of the prologue, and, in fact, it is the prologue which most nearly achieves the form of a symphonic poem with a choral part. The vague orchestral background, denoting chaos, receives the murmured comment of voices chanting descriptive verses. The resource of instrumental coloring is used with vigor, and also with restraint, as when the violoncellos, divided into a choir of voices, sing alone, or a solo violin interludes the strophes of a small chorus, "heard from afar." Finally chorus and orchestra rise in solemn jubilation, wave above wave of sound, almost visualizing Milton's concentric rows of flaming seraphim, and mounting to a sustained climax which makes the eardrums tingle. So far, in its kind, then, the work is symphonic. The voices, for the most part, have been made an integral part of the whole, weaving and interlacing like the purely orchestral parts. With Part One, "Hell," the empty rhetoric of the music begins.

Villanis, the librettist, hastens to explain that his verses are a "free translation" from Milton. This is well, for after the transfer into Italian they are refitted to the proper rhythmical syllables of the English tongue, and one remembers the horrified cry of the clown in "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Bless, thee, Bottom, thou are translated!" Bless thee, Milton, thou are translated, indeed! Satan declaims what is meant to be mighty wrath. It is noisy bombast, mostly in unnatural intervals. Moloch has a word or two. Belial, in contralto voice, sings a reflective lament, which includes a line of lyric melody and a flourish of horns with some of the romantic remoteness of Wagnerian treatment; the chorus follows with a warlike strophe ending in rapidly descending chromatics. All this is operatic warfare.

It is so in a double sense: it has the essential artificiality of opera, and, as has been said, many of its incidental beauties.

Infirmity of imagination is the besetting failure of the work. Ingenuity is made to do duty in its stead. This is flatly apparent in the use of the organ to accompany Satan's revelation of his mystical welfare against God. In style these measures are nobly ecclesiastical, the use of the instrument is most appropriate—and its effect falls far short. The sense of contrast (here conflict) between sacred and secular, which is the æsthetic function of organ against orchestra, is not forthcoming. There is no strong, sweet odor of ecclesiasticism, breathing like censor smoke from holy glooms. Instead there is only a correct instrument and capable measures. Some important property was wanting. It may have been sincerity. Again, the final chorus was stirring; it marched in a martial rhythm, spinning slurred runs for the voices interchangeable with wind and strings, recovered a shade of symphonic character and swept up to close the episode in grandeur.

The second part, while it is not steadily one thing nor the other, oratorio or symphonic poem, opera or cantata, repeatedly approximates the good qualities of all four. The invention of instrumental color and figuration is labored, and it is frequently startlingly acute, as the prelude, with its alternate phrases of first violins choiring and moody comment of horns, with harps shimmering above, a union of celestial choir, of visionary splendor and the blazonry of the firmament. The treatment of the voice parts, too, in the choruses, in the solo and in the duet of Adam and Eve which follow return to the something more than oratorio and something other than opera (if something less than symphony), of the prologue. And presently, in the "Voice of the Father," given to full chorus, and the "Voice of the Son," to the tenors, we are back in platitude, both of text and of music.

It remains to be said frankly that the third part, "Earth," is justly named. Here we have an Italian exerting his utmost ingenuity to write music of sensuous seduction. Opinion may differ as to whether he has succeeded or failed. A protracted duet of the unholy wooing that first brought death into the world and all our woe occupies the most of the canto. Opinion may differ, also, as to whether this is precisely the music for the night of Easter Sunday, but to the most casual eye in Symphony Hall last night it was plain enough that there were many present old-fashioned enough to show their distress in their faces. This music was not oratorio in form; it was even less oratorio in spirit, and it was not being received as oratorio. The instrumentation, which aimed to be subtle, just managed to be bald. The least and the most charitable thing that can be said is that it was probably not foreseen how it would sound in performance on a Sunday evening; that it was rather an error of judgment than of taste. The experiment with a new work of these proportions is commendable and was commendably performed. It might, nevertheless, have come at a more fitting time. This is putting into words what was, last night in Symphony Hall, visible but unexpressed.

L. P.

News of Music

Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and one of the most notable violinists in Germany, as the successor to Mr. Hess in the like post in the Symphony Orchestra, and the probabilities are that he will accept it.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 8, 1910

News of Music

It seems a pity that Mr. Fiedler did not choose his pieces from Wagner for the Pension Fund Concert, on April 17, from the body of the music-dramas. No one is likely to repine at the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Parsifal," "Die Meistersinger," and "Tristan," or to the overture to "Tannhäuser" in themselves; but they are the readiest and the most familiar excerpts from Wagner's music; they are played on occasion at the regular Symphony Concerts; while this season every one of them, except the overture to "Tannhäuser," has been heard in the opera house and in due introduction to the particular opera. "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser," "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," and even "Parsifal" come on occasion to our stage. Very rarely, however, in recent years have we in Boston heard any one of the four "Ring" operas except "Die Walküre," and we are almost forgetting what they contain. Out of them Mr. Fiedler might have drawn the passage of the gods to Valhalla, the scene of the forging of the sword; the ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's rock, or the orchestral apostrophe of the dead hero. Even with the more familiar music-dramas, the introductions to the third acts of "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhäuser" and the music of the Venusberg too rarely come to the programmes of orchestral concerts. Dr. Muck had scruples against the detachment of many such a fragment from its due place in the opera in the theatre. No such scruple holds Mr. Fiedler's hand, and thus his choice should be only the freer.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 9, 1910

COMING CONCERTS

Mr. Fiedler's Final Programmes—A Wagner Concert with Mme. Sembrich—Mrs. Hall's French Music—The People's Choral Union Again—The Summer "Pops"

Sunday evening, April 17, in Symphony Hall, a concert to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Sembrich for a singer and a "Wagner programme." Mme. Sembrich will sing an air from Verdi's "Ernani," a group of songs and, presumably, extra pieces. The excerpts from Wagner, to be played by the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler, are the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Parsifal," "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan" and the overture to "Tannhäuser," Mr. Loeffler's "Round of the Devil" also stands on the programme.

Tuesday evening, April 19, in Jordan Hall, a concert of contemporary and unfamiliar French music by the Boston Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy. [illegible] incidental saxophone pieces played by Mrs. [illegible] Balakireff, for an exceptional Russian, Franck, Lalo, Massenet, Roger-Ducasse, and [illegible] composers to be heard.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 9, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Lizst's Faust Symphony and Ducasse's Suite Francaise at the Symphony Concerts—A Final Recital by Mr. Busoni, with Another of His Herculean Programmes—Mr. Myron Whitney, Jr., Mme. von Unschuld, Mr. Buonamici, the Misses Patten, the Reynolds Trio and Miss Van Kuran to Fill a Week with Concerts

For the first time in eleven years Lizst's "Faust" Symphony will be given with its choral ending at the symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, and for its performance the orchestra will have the assistance of the Apollo Club of Boston and of Mr. James H. Rattigan, the tenor. The obstacles to the performance of this work are many, and not the least of them has been the arrangement for a male chorus to participate in a Friday afternoon rehearsal. The reluctance of the conductors to give the symphony except in the entirety which it deserves has prevented its performance in earlier seasons. This, then, with one other work completes the programme. The Suite Française in D major by Roger Ducasse will be performed next Friday for the first time in America. The Suite has been described as an artful combination of early form and modern manner. It is the craftsmanship of a man of thirty-five, a pupil of Fauré. Its parts are four, an overture, bourrée, air and minuet.

[141]

HERALD,
MARCH 29, 1910.

ANTON WITEK MAY LEAD SYMPHONY

Concert Master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra Asked to Assume Position Vacated by Willy Hess.

The resignation of Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, confirming the cable dispatch published in The Boston Herald in the morning. Prof. Hess has sent in his resignation to take effect April 30, at the close of the current Symphony year.

His successor probably will be Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. Herr Witek was born in Saaz, Bohemia, Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894 was chosen concert master of the Philharmonic orchestra in Berlin, a position that he now holds. He is an excellent chamber music player.

The announcement of the probable appointment of Anton Witek is made in this way:

"Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and one of the most notable violinists in Germany, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Mr. Hess."

Mr. Hess was under contract to remain one year longer with the Symphony Orchestra; but his invitation to Berlin is so advantageous to him that the management consented to release him. The announcement says:

"Prof. Hess has just been appointed the head of the violin department of the Koenigliche Hochschule of Berlin, as successor to the late Carl Halir, who succeeded Josef Joachim in this very honorable and important position. Moreover, Mr. Hess will become the head of the Halir quartet, which was the successor of the Joachim quartet, and will now be known as the Hess quartet; and, also, will become the first violin of the Schumann trio, of which the head is Georg Schumann, the well known composer and conductor. He also becomes conductor of the orchestra of the Hochschule, the post which Joachim held with that institution.

"Although Mr. Hess' contract with the Symphony Orchestra had one year to run the management has consented to release him, but with much regret, for Mr. Hess has proved himself to be, during his stay in Boston, not merely a violinist of extraordinary quality, but a concert master, than whom there is no better in the world."

MONITOR,
APRIL 9, 1910.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with choral ending, will be performed at the twenty-first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, April 15; and at the twenty-first concert Saturday evening, April 16. The Apollo Club of male voices and James H. Rattigan, tenor, will assist. Only one other work appears on the program, a modern French suite, consisting of an overture, bourree, air and minuet.

The "Faust" symphony was produced in Boston by Bernhard Listemann's orchestra before the Boston symphony orchestra came into existence and it was once given by Mr. Gericke with men of the Cecilia Society singing the choral finale. The work is divided into three main parts: Faust, Marguerite and Mephistopheles. The Marguerite division, the slow movement, was performed in Boston before the symphony as a whole was undertaken. The finale for male chorus and tenor solo is written on only a few lines of Goethe's poem; much of the singing is in unison and offers no technical difficulties for the performers. The chief artistic problem for the conductor is to keep a good balance between vocal tone and orchestral accompaniment.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 2, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

"FRANCESCA" ACCORDING TO TSCHAIKOWSKY

An Orchestral Fantasia in the Composer's Finest Style, and a Performance of It in Mr. Fiedler's Best Manner—Of Horns and Romanticism—Imagination and the Response It Claimed—Two New Pieces of Sibelius with Familiar Traits—Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony as Early Programme Music

On our library tables a score of years ago lay a volume of sombre drawings. They frightened the children one way; they frightened their elders another. The text was a bad translation of Dante's "Inferno"; the drawings were gloomy and powerful interpretations of the poet's vision—a shade corporeal, perhaps, for spirits, yet splendidly in key with the conception. Early in the book came a picture of huddled shapes, half-human, half-fanciful, whipped aloft in darkening spirals on a sounding blast. Near at hand, hovering beside the crag where the brother poets stood, hung a dolorous pair in embrace. The picture was Gustav Doré's incomplete but unforgettable Paolo and Francesca.

Tschaikowsky knew this drawing, and yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall it was had again in terms of music. It is idle to inquire whether the idealized tragedy of these immortal lovers best finds its way to the imagination by the graphic or the tonal art. Its beauty and its elevation are there. The poet shows us that this catastrophe was one of the things that was to be—he presents the stimulus to the imagination; the interpreter must do the rest. The interpreter yesterday afternoon happened, fortunately, to be Mr. Fiedler. It is often said that the Germans have a faculty of seeing these things largely. Somewhere in the journals of a great English novelist it is remarked, for instance, that Kaulbach conceived and painted the most impressive of his "Weltgeschichtliche Bilder," "simply under the inspiration of a grand myth," and this is a tolerably accurate account of Mr. Fiedler's dealing with Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia. It contains, to be frank, passages of mere conventional declamation. They are brief, infrequent and mostly occur at the beginning. They were present yesterday afternoon, but so transformed by the fervor of the conducting as to pass unnoticed and merge into the splendor of the parts which are more genuinely inspired, for the fantasia (if it had been written this year it would be termed "symphonic poem") was a labor of love, and even the labored measures show this. They would not have shown it if Mr. Fiedler's interpretation had not been quite as much a labor of love. The journalizing novelist again prefigures him. He seized the whole conception of the piece at a flash, and welded even its commonplaces into significance and distinction.

Tschaikowsky has strewn this score with careful ornament. At the same time he has conceived it on a grand scale. He has adorned without cluttering. The full string choir will sweep upward in gust of sound over subtle accents of wood wind and sharp blasts of brass in peculiar poignancy. Such passages reveal the dual character of the music. It is large in pattern and minute in design. It was precisely this largeness and, at the same time, this fineness, that Mr. Fiedler threw upon his orchestral screen. They were Dante's creatures, interpreted in tones by Tschaikowsky and speaking with a powerful eloquence which they owed to the conductor. For details: He lashed the spinning rhythms into spirals which almost visualized the blast which drove the restless spirits on; the strings swept up wailing chromatics and swept down again as we have heard wind under eaves of lonely nights; the dialogue of the lovers came as that self-forgetting speech when the voice turns unconsciously to music—breaths of flute notes fluttering over the lament of violoncellos lighted by harp strings in pale flickerings. This, in justice, was a conductor plus individual virtuosity, and yet it was individual virtuosity which would have counted for little without such leadership. This quality made itself apparent in another important detail. The fantasia opens with a phrase for horns which sounds instantly the whole romantic range of the legend. The phrase recurs, and to go wandering among the other instruments, but never with the same atmospherical effect as when it recurs for horns. Tschaikowsky seems to have apprehended as much, for when it is wanted with this special emphasis, the horns have it. There is good reason to suppose that the composer learned this idiom from Wagner. It is used in several of the earlier operas which were known to Tschaikowsky, and the manner reappears in Parsifal, notably in the first scene of the last act, where it is used once and again to herald the return of the guileless knight. Wagner knew and Tschaikowsky learned that the very essence of the romantic spirit can be summed up in the rich, mysterious timbre of these horns—the mediæval, the chivalric, the ascetic and the mystical. There is matter in the precise psychological effect of such a phrase—as connoting the content of romanticism—to fill chapters. In this particular "orchestral fantasia" one had almost said the interpretation stands or falls by a right apprension of such a phrase. It may mean everything, or it may mean nothing. To Mr. Hertz, conducting "Parsifal," it meant the casual—which is to say, nothing; to Mr. Fiedler, conducting Tschaikowsky's work, it meant the definite romantic value—which is to say, everything. It is not within the scope of a review to enumerate the studied excellences of this thing; it may only be recorded here that, given music to fire the imagination, Mr. Fiedler has the imagination to fire. Even a Frday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall felt its glow.

The two new pieces of Sibelius, an elegie and musette and a valse triste, are relatively unimportant. After the composer's Second Symphony and Saga of previous concerts these minor pieces stand with little to distinguish them but an occasional manner in instrumentation, the plucked strings, dearly beloved of the savage Finlander, or a certain knack of getting a sombre resonance out of the violins. Sibelius is better when he has something to paint; best when he has something to resent. If music could predispose hearers to his favor for a new piece, the Symphony and the Saga had done so, but these two bits are not of their stature in any dimension. It is merely interesting to note that the quartet of first violins which sounds with such wistfulness choiring in the Saga is employed for a sigh of three notes to end the valse triste.

For the rest came Dvorak's overture, "Carnival," and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (No. 6) which Mr. Fiedler took in the mood of tempered "programme" music. It was skilfully done, and it was the style of interpretation which Mr. Fiedler can do better than another—he made, for instance, the "thunder storm" an incident of classic realism—but the performance was completely overshadowed by his surpassing leadership of the romantic fantasia. Cold blood preferences are one thing; Tschaikowsky balanced in the scales with Beethoven: persuasion like Mr. Fiedler's conducting of the latter yesterday afternoon is another, and leaves little choice. The thing was done, and it was only the hard condition of the interpretative art that prevented its being done to stay.

L. P.

NOTES.

At the twenty-second pair of Symphony concerts Mr. Fiedler will give one of the important works which he promised for this season, the Strauss tone poem "Don Quixote."

The soloist at the Symphony pension fund concert of Sunday evening, April 17, will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will sing the Involami aria from Verdi's "Ernani" and a group of songs with piano accompaniment. The first part of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner, the selections being the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "Parsifal," the prelude and love death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

* * *

BOSTON HERALD,
APRIL 2, 1910.

SIBELIUS' MUSIC PLAYED.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Twentieth Public Rehearsal.

The program of the 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F major, "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven
"Francesca da Rimini" ..... Tschaikowsky
Elegie and Musette from the suite taken from incidental music to Paul's "King Christian II." ..... Sibelius
Valse triste from the music to "Kuolema" ..... Sibelius
Overture "Carnival" ..... Dvorak

The symphony was well played, and Mr. Fiedler's reading was effective, although exceptions might be taken to his turning the allegretto into an allegro. The "jolly gathering of country folk" did not cross in mirth the bounds of respectability.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" is profoundly emotional and dramatic. Mr. Fiedler took the allegro, the musical picture of the heilish storm, which never rests and leads the spirits with its sweep, at so fast a pace that even the accomplished virtuosos of the orchestra were hardly able to play the notes, much less give expression to them. Mr. Fiedler of late has shown a singular tendency to rush his allegros so that the result is confusion and tumult. It is true that this allegro of Tschaikowsky is an "allegro vivo," but it is not an unreasonable one. The section which depicts Francesca with her pathetic story was played poetically.

Three short pieces by Sibelius were performed here for the first time. The Elegie and Musette are from a suite made out of the incidental music to Adolf Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II." The Elegie is a romance for strings, and it has tender sentiment, but it is the tenderness of strength, far removed from sentimentalism or mere prettiness. The Musette, for clarinets, bassoons and strings, is a delightful little piece, not too archaic, yet with decided character. The Valse triste, for small orchestra, is also taken from the music to a drama, Jaernfelt's "Death." On the stage a woman, dying, hears in delirium waltz music and sees the shapes of dancers. She rises from her bed and would fain dance with them. They seem to avoid her. The dance grows wilder. There is a knocking at the door. The music ceases and the shapes vanish. The door opens. Death enters. Played in concert, without any reference to the stage, this strange and mournful waltz makes an effect. Little pieces the three, yet they are the work of a true master, and as they were played yesterday they made a marked impression. A very fast performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture brought the end.

HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 10, 1910.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

With the exception of the names of the songs with which Mme. Sembrich will end the concert, the program of the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall Sunday night, April 17, is complete. Mme. Sembrich will sing "Involami" from Verdi's "Ernani," and four songs at the end of the program, not to speak of encores.

The first part of the program will be devoted to Wagner. This part will comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the prelude to "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." In the second part after the aria and before the songs will come Mr. Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle."

Tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

THE POPS.

The regular season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will begin on Monday evening, May 2, and continue for nine weeks, the last one coming on Saturday, July 2. Concerts, as in the past, will be given on every evening except Sundays beginning at 8 o'clock and lasting until 11. Mr. Strube will be the first conductor. Tables for the opening night may now be reserved on application at the box office at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON HERALD,
APRIL 8, 1910.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Tickets for the pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall the evening of April 17 go on sale at the box office at Symphony Hall this morning. The soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, who has given her services, and she will sing "Involami," from Verdi's "Ernani," and a group of songs.

The first part of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The selections will be the Prelude of "The Mastersingers," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude to "Parsifal," the Prelude and "Dove Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Between the aria and the songs the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, will play Loeffler's "Devil's Villanelle."

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 2, 1910

PHONY PROGRAMME PURELY ORCHESTRAL

BEETHOVEN PASTORAL SYMPHONY FIRST NUMBER

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini," Sibelius' Elegie and Waltz and Dvorak's Carnival.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. "Pastoral Symphony."
Tschaikowsky. "Francesca di Rimini." Orchestral Fantasie.
Sibelius. Elegie and Musette, from Suite "King Christian II."
Valse Triste.
Dvorak. "Carnival" Overture.

It was quite right, in the midst of the Opera season, to make the programme purely orchestral, and it was pleasant to turn from cadenzas and high Cs to the more classical paths of music. Rubinstein always maintained that the Symphony was a much higher form of Music than the Opera, but as all of his operas had failed and one of his symphonies had succeeded, it may have been but a case of Sour Grapes.

Beethoven's sixth symphony, however, is not the greatest of the nine, and although its pictorial effects appeal most to the multitude, it by no means proves that Music which gives a definite picture is the greatest. His seventh symphony tells no definite story, yet it has more to say than this "Pastorale," which may be considered as the very foundation-stone of "Programme-music" (i.e. pictorial music). It was so considered by Mendelssohn, who, when he was reproached with giving too many pictures in instrumental music, replied—"After Beethoven has opened the door, anyone may enter."

One point may well be borne in mind. When instrumental music paints pictures it is much less definite than Painting or Poetry. The present writer has tested this often by playing to an audience a tone-picture, without giving a clue to its meaning, and then repeating it with the title and explanations. The different reception of the two interpretations was remarkable. Painting would scarcely need the label—"This is a horse," "this is a peasant," before it could be understood.

But the performance of the symphony was quite another matter. It was a vivid presentation of Beethoven's ideal, such as probably he never heard during his life time. He probably never dreamed of such an excellent interpretation of his work as it received at this concert. The constant development of fragments of the opening phrase was delightful to follow.

The picture of the Brook, in the second movement, always used to be Mr. Gericke's favorite portion of the work, and we have therefore had many good performances of it, but it could scarcely be interpreted better than it was yesterday afternoon. The poultry at the end, the distinctly labelled "Quail, Cuckoo, the Nightingale" of the Coda, always seem a trifle ludicrous to the present writer, but they were clear enough in their warblings.

With the Scherzo matters grow much more spirited and one gets the Village Band, a Dance, a Fight, and all the simple dissipation of a country fair. Here Mr. Fiedler allowed the portrayal of the drunken bassoonist, with his three-noted instrument, to stand out in good relief, which we think was a proper reading, for it is too often toned down into meaningless elegance, but the village dance, as a whole, might have been louder.

The thunder-storm, in which the lightning comes after the thunder, was nobly played, and the passages on the deepest contra-basses (deeper than the ordinary instrument) were rumbling enough, while the passages between the violoncellos and the contra-basses were well roared.

Odd it is, after the storm, to find the shepherd's pipe given to the French horn and the clarinette. All other composers have used the English horn as the shepherd's pipe. But Beethoven was not well acquainted with the English horn and never used it in an orchestral score. The Finale was a broad Hymn of Thanksgiving and was played with proper breadth. The audience seemed to appreciate the old work to the fullest extent.

Tschaikowsky's Fantasie was windy enough to have been a tone-picture of Chicago. It received a splendid reading. Not only were the whirlwinds of Hades given with graphic effect, but there were "sounds and lamentations, heard i' the air," (and not from aviators either) that were most impressive. The clarinette and flute solos were very well played, and the piccolo player in this and in the Dvorak overture, blew in a manner that showed that he had no pulmonary troubles. Altogether "Francesca di Rimini" was the most successful number of the concert and was immediately appreciated by the audience as such.

Sibelius tends to melancholy, as all Norsemen do. But while the average modern composer displays his gloom by smashing all the rules of harmony into fragments, our Finnish gentleman gave a finished composition that did not stray from the paths of musical rectitude. The Elegie was a very definite tune, chiefly upon the violoncellos, which were played with direct and sympathetic expression. The work, which is for strings, is not a very profound one but is pleasantly musical.

The Musette is more original. Now the wood-wind are added to the strings (muted) and the clarinettes are made very prominent. It was unusual to find the clarinettes taking the leading part in so [illegible] work, where one expected the [illegible] (the countryman of the orchestra) [illegible] background. The bassoons [illegible] cally used. The [illegible] which its [illegible] character

The "Valse Triste" was perhaps too light in style for a symphony concert. There is a story attached in this case. It is a dying mother who is watched by her son. He falls asleep. Music is heard in the distance. A waltz. The mother awakens, rises from her bed, and, clad only in her gown of white, dances to the tune. Other dancers join with her. When the waltz is in full swing there is a knock at the door. Death enters and claims her.

We give the plot in full, since it will probably at once be seized upon by the bare-faced—we mean bare-footed—dancers who are leading us back to Greek Art. We only venture to hope that they will not reduce the costume.

Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture is not one of his greatest works. Nor does it compare well with such a carnival as Berlioz has given in Music. In fact Dvorak is not wearing as well as some of his contemporaries. Is it possible that he is going along the path that Gade and Raff have taken. For in Music there is a fatal "Down and Out Club" which yawns for many composers who write too easily or too profusely. There have been some remarkable changes of opinion about composers who were not deeply enough in earnest, no matter how high they stood during their lifetime. Dvorak's teacher, Smetana, is coming to be thought a greater genius than his great pupil, because he was more deeply in earnest.

The "Carnival" was however, very brilliantly played. It was a rather wild affair altogether and might perhaps be called "Jamboree" rather than Carnival. If those merry-makers were not searching for oranges, cracked ice, and soda water, the next morning, there is no meaning in sounds.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

APRIL 6. 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last of Season Marked by Brilliant Programme and Large Audience.

The fourth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. An unusually large audience almost filled the hall and greeted the brilliant playing with tempestuous applause. Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss, soprano, appeared as the assisting artist and sang an aria with orchestra and a group of songs with piano. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Aria, "L'amero, saro constante," from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, op. 67..Beethoven
Songs with piano:
(a) "Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from "Joshua".....Handel
(b) "O Sleep! Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from "Semele".....Handel
(c) "Heimliche Aufforderung"....Richard Strauss
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," op. 28.....Richard Strauss
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"....Wagner

This was a fine bit of programme making, in which the elder classicists Mozart and Handel were set over against the moderns Wagner and Richard Strauss, with the mighty Beethoven, who belongs to both, and to all, periods standing between. The "Magic Flute" overture shows Mozart at his best, his melodic freshness, his contrapuntal dexterity, his marvellous gift of accomplishing broad effects with comparatively slender orchestral means. To compare this limpid and charming creation with the cunning devices resorted to by Wagner or Strauss in order to produce their brilliant tone pictures is to realize both the direction and the distance the art of composition has travelled during the last century and a half.

The challenge given by the New York Philharmonic Society in its recent concert here was promptly accepted by the Boston orchestra. For the first time it gave us one of Richard Strauss's famous "tone poems," and in order that there might be no uncertainty as to the lifting of the gage, chose the same one—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—played by the New Yorkers. This most imaginative and highly spiced composition was given with an impressive virtuosoship. The Philharmonic drew from it broader tone effects—they had more men—but the Boston players excelled in the subtleness and polish of their delivery.

Beethoven's fifth symphony occupied the place of honor on the programme, a post it is able to fill with perfect appropriateness in any company. The great composer and critic, Hector Berlioz, declared emphatically that this is the greatest of the immortal nine. Nor is he alone in that opinion, though the seventh and the ninth, the "Choral," have equally sturdy advocates. A review of the symphony is superfluous; it is thoroughly familiar to all and has been sufficiently dissected upon other occasions. Suffice it to say that it was played magnificently, so well, indeed, that it brought forth an ovation from the audience. Mr. Fiedler very properly and courteously made his players rise and join him in acknowledging the compliment.

Mrs. Hissem De Moss proved a most pleasing singer with a voice not large but admirably schooled and of beautiful quality. Her aria was accompanied by a violin obligato, played with fine discretion and charm by Mr. Hess, concert-master of the orchestra. She was heard at her best, however, in the group of songs, and particularly in those by Handel, where her breath control, smoothness and agility of execution and correct phrasing were a study which any vocal student could have noted with abundant profit. The brilliant song by Strauss displayed her ability in a different direction, and added to the distinct pleasure she afforded the audience.

So closes one of the most brilliant seasons the orchestra has ever had in this city, and the size and appreciation of the audience was a compliment justly earned as well as evidence that the educational work which this organization has persisted in doing here has not been without its legitimate effect.

W. A. P.

HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 3, 1910

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Anton Witek.

The Herald publishes today a portrait of Mr. Anton Witek, who will succeed Mr. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Witek was born at Saaz, Bohemia, Jan. 7, 1872, and he studied under Bennewitz, at Prague. In 1894 he was appointed concert master of the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin. It is said of him as a violinist that he plays as a serious, solid, thoroughly grounded musician, and not as a virtuoso; that he is an excellent interpreter of the classic masters, and has a wide acquaintance with the modern repertory. He has travelled with success as a soloist in Scandinavia.

Many will mourn the decision of Mr. Hess to leave Boston, for he is an unsurpassable concert master, a violinist of many fine qualities, enthusiastic and indefatigable in his work, a genial, high-minded, honorable man. No one is more appreciative of worthy colleagues; no one is more generously disposed toward men of humbler attainments.

The inducements offered Mr. Hess to go to Berlin are many and flattering, and he is undoubtedly wise in accepting the offers. And Mr. Hess has the gypsy's [illegible] for wandering. Born at Mannheim in 1859, he played in Boston in 1869. He left America for Holland. He has lived in Heidelberg, Berlin, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Rotterdam, Manchester, Cologne, London. The good wishes of the public will go with him to Berlin.

A rumor has been spread that Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable first flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will leave Boston at the end of this season to accept a position with the Philharmonic Society of New York. The truth of this report is authoritatively denied. This is welcome news, for Mr. Maquarre's place could not be easily filled.

It has also been rumored that Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the violoncellist, will return to the orchestra, and this rumor is not denied.

CONCERT NOTES.

Mr. Fiedler has mapped out the chief features of the remaining concerts of the present Symphony season. Next week's program will include Converse's "Endymion's Narrative," Tschaikowsy's concerto for violin and Elgar's "Variations of an Original Theme," with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The following week Mr. Fiedler purposes to give Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the choral finale, and with the aid of the Apollo Club. For the 23d concert on April 22 and 23, Mr. Fiedler has chosen "Don Quixote." The last program will include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the chorus of the Cecelia Society and Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, Miss Margaret Keyes, Berrick von Nordan, and Frederick Weld. The program will also include Beethoven's First Symphony.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 5, 1910.

FIEDLER GUEST OF THE PAPYRUS CLUB

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest or honor at the spring dinner of the Papyrus Club at Young's. In honor of Mr. Fiedler a quartet sang a parody with the following chorus:

Bing go the cymbals and bang goes the drum—
Scherzo in skirtso, nocturne in Te Deum.
And you'll get a thriller that thrills you through and through
When Fiedler's fiddlers fiddle a tune that's new to you.

Among the guests were Eben D. Jordan, Wallace Goodrich and Louis C. Elson.

GLOBE—APRIL 10, 1910.

Symphony Hall "Pops."

The regular season of "pop" concerts at Symphony hall will begin Monday evening, May 2, and continue for nine weeks, the last one coming Saturday, July 2. Concerts, as in the past, will be given on every evening except Sunday, beginning at 8 o'clock and lasting until 11. Mr. Strube will be the first conductor. Tickets for the opening night may now be reserved on application at Symphony hall.

Pension Fund Benefit.

With the exception of the names of the songs with which Mme Sembrich will end the concert the program for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra, which will be given in Symphony hall one week from tonight, is complete. Mme Sembrich will sing one aria, the "Involami" from Verdi's "Ernani," and she will sing four songs at the finale of the program, not to speak of what encores the audience may persuade her to give.

The first part of the program will be devoted to Wagner. This part will comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of "Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser." In the second part, after the aria and before the songs, will come Martin Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle."

As Mme Sembrich is making great personal sacrifice to sing at this concert, for which she has volunteered her services, it is hoped that there will be a full house to greet her. The enthusiasm which she aroused last month when she was the soloist at the regular concerts of the orchestra is still fresh in the mind and this will be the best opportunity to hear her this year.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last novelty Mr Fiedler expects to present this year is on this week's program of the Symphony orchestra. It is a suite Francaise in D-major by Roger Ducasse. Ducasse is one of the younger Frenchmen who have lately sprung into prominence through the performance of orchestral works in Paris. He is a pupil of Faure and leans rather to the school of d'Indy than to that of the Conservatoire.

The suite is in four movements, an overture, a bouree, a recitative and air, and a minuet. While the form is simple and conventional, he has filled it with ultra-modern material.

This and Liszt's "Faust" symphony which will be the first number, comprise the entire program. It is now 11 years since this symphony has been performed here with the final chorus, and in the present performance the Symphony orchestra will have the assistance of the Apollo club of this

THE BOSTON HERALD, APRIL 5, 1910.

DIRECTOR FIEDLER AT WORK

Air: "Rings on Her Fingers

Chorus:—

Bing go the cymbals and bang goes the drum—
Scherzo in skirtso, nocturne in Te Deum.
And you'll get a thriller that thrills you through and through—
When Fiedler's fiddlers fiddle a tune that's new to you.

DIRECTOR FIEDLER GUEST OF HONOR

Papyrus Club Gives Regular Spring Musical Dinner, Which Is Also Attended by Boston's Other Two Leaders.

Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor of the regular spring musical dinner of the Papyrus Club, held last evening at Young's Hotel. Among the other guests were: Eben D. Jordan and Wallace Goodrich, leader of the New England Conservatory of Music orchestra.

These three men make a trio of peculiar significance in that they represent Boston's three principal musical institutions, the Boston Symphony orchestra, which first gained for Boston its reputation as a musical centre; the Conservatory of Music, widely known as one of the best institutions of its kind; and the Boston Opera, the success of which will mean so much, not only to Boston, but to opera-lovers over the whole of the United States, who realize that by such institutions only can be fostered a national opera of our own.

The evening's entertainment, presided over by Sidney Williams, toastmaster, consisted of speeches from the guests, and songs, both serious and comic, by the members singly, and in a double quartet under the leadership of Dr. John D. Hawes, 2d.

BOSTON JOURNAL—APRIL 9, 1910.

SYMPHONY HALL IS WELL FILLED BY SMART SET MEMBERS

Mrs. Nathan Matthews and Other Prominent Women Seen at Rehearsal.

All society seemed to be in Symphony Hall yesterday. Mrs. Nathan Matthews, who is devoted to these concerts, was early on hand, wearing an especially becoming hat of dark blue with bright flowers. She tells me they go to Nahant in May for six weeks, then to Bar Harbor to remain until quite late in the season. Her daughter Nathalie will remain abroad until the New Year and is greatly enjoying herself.

Seen in the crowd yesterday were Mrs. Bayard Thayer with Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Charles J. Rich, Mrs. Horace Jealous, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss MacNicholl; Katherine Foote, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Lester Leland, Olivia Thorndike, Barbara Higginson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, George Proctor, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. Charles C. Dowse, Mrs. Joseph Gardner Bradley, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody and daughter, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Emma Wethern, Mrs. W. P. Fay, Miss Alison Haughton, Miss Gertrude Sands, Rosamond Fay, Miss Mary Josephine Amory and her brother, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Miss "Betty" Porter, Mrs. Eben S. Draper and daughter Dorothy, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Edward Winslow, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mrs. C. H. Greenleaf and Mrs. J. B. Forsyth.

BOSTON GLOBE APRIL 13, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Apollo Club to Assist This Week in Choral Finale of Liszt's "Faust" Symphonic Work.

The performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the choral ending at the symphony concerts this week will make one of the most interesting musical events of the season that has been unusually rich in such things. It is 11 years since this choral ending has been sung here, although the other parts of the symphony have been played once or twice in that time. Mr Fiedler has enlisted the cooperation of the Apollo club for these concerts and the tenor solo will be sung by Mr James H. Rattigan of that club.

The Apollo club is the premier male singing club of this country and the opportunity to hear it in conjunction with the Symphony orchestra is one that should not be neglected by the musical public. Mr Fiedler is taking unusual pains preparing the work and its performance promises to be one of the red-letter events of his engagement.

[144]

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 9, 1910

MR. KREISLER AND OTHERS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT WITHOUT A SYMPHONY

Mr. Kreisler's Remarkable Performance of Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin—The Transformation of the Music Under His Mind, Temperament and Hand—Elgar's "Enigma" Variations Revived to Pleasure as a Concert Piece—"Endymion's Narrative" for Early, Romantic and Spontaneous Converse

No symphony stood on Mr. Fiedler's programme yesterday afternoon, and at last he fulfilled the promise, made at his first coming, of a performance of Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. He continued, too, his round of American composers that began with Mr. Chadwick, continued with Mr. Loeffler, and now has reached Mr. Converse—the youthful Converse of ten years ago, of "The Festival of Pan," and yesterday of "Endymion's Narrative." At the end the audience twice and thrice called Mr. Converse to his feet and after the Variations it was plentiful in applause, as applause goes at the end of the afternoon concerts. The livelier interest of the listeners, however, was clearly in the reappearance of Mr. Kreisler. He is ending his present visit to America with the concerts of yesterday and today in Boston; he purposes not to return for several years; our public quickly discovered and has long cherished the violinist. His welcome was foreordained, and happily all that he did justified the applause that subsequently heaped it. Mr. Kreisler is more a man of moods than his contained and cheerful external aspect seems to imply. As those who have frequented his concerts know, he can be very much in the vein or as far out of it.

Yesterday the violinist's piece was Tschaikowsky's concerto, which from the vivid and enduring impression that Mr. Elman made with it, seems to have been played here in recent years oftener than it really has. Mr. Elman played it with the fire and the passion of enkindled and achieving youth, with the restless and intense Slav temperament ever uppermost in him. He made the music quite as much of himself as it was of Tschaikowsky or of the violin. Mr. Kreisler, on the other hand, played the concerto as a man and a violinist in the mellowed ripeness of maturity. The technical difficulties of the music are proverbial; Mr. Elman conquered them magnificently and carried the audience with him in his conquest. Mr. Kreisler, by the superlative fineness, elasticity and freedom of his skill, made them seem inconsequent and often non-existent. Mr. Elman in his playing of the concerto sought and gained the utmost largeness, richness, eloquence of tone. Mr. Kreisler, who cherishes his instrument too much ever to force it and who is too intelligently mature to seek bigness, preferred a finer, more supple and more adroit tone that never lost its delicate elasticities, its finesse of varied force and shading, its low and very thrilling intensities. It was a tone of almost perfect artistry, exquisitely and felicitously touched with almost as perfect expression.

Mr. Elman had no purpose to idealize Tschaikowsky's music. He kept it breathlessly tossing, cavorting even, breathlessly losing itself, breathlessly finding itself again through all the final movement. He made it indeed a whirling little tempest of the violin. Similarly, he was minded to the broadest and the deepest of long-drawn intensities in the song of the slow movement. We that listened could hear the two Slavs a-signing. So, equally, with the first movement, which he made a rhapsody of technical conquest and a rhapsody of fitful and, almost hysterical instrumental song. Mr. Kreisler, in his turn, distilled Tschaikowsky's music through the alembic of his own mind and temperament. Invariably, almost, they refine. They transmogrify smoky and blazing passion into clear, white, ethereal flame. They make the rhapsodies of nervous susceptibility and sensation seem the rhapsodies of a finely touched spirit. Mr. Kreisler's intensities are low; but they are exceedingly poignant. The mind as well as the emotions stir to them. So, yesterday, Mr. Kreisler transformed and idealized the concerto, and so he clothed it with a beauty that was out of himself as much as it was the yielding of the music. The rapt and the brooding beauty that he gave to the slow movement made it of a new loveliness. It was like the idealized intoxication of musing. The finale was no riot of folk-tunes, but a poetized revel of the spirit of folk-song, achieving the rhythmic beauty of dancing sound. The first movement was indeed still a rhapsody, not of technique and of impetuous fire, but of the finest and quickest of rapturous emotions that happened to be expressing themselves through the finely puissant, the delicately poignant voice of the violin. Throughout power and passion yielded to the finer power and intensity of an idealizing beauty. The purists in things Russian will say that the concerto, so played, is no longer Tschaikowsky's. It is, and gloriously, Mr. Kreisler's.

Sir Edward Elgar has little occasion nowadays to insist, as he used to do, that his hearers should take his Variations as a symphonic, a concert piece. Now, when the secret of one or another of the initialled variations is beginning to transpire, nobody cares much about whom they are intended to suggest. Sir Edward's intimate circle is his own concern, and we may all wish him joy of some of his rather noisy and rather sentimentalizing friends, if the initialled music truly implies them. Nowadays, too, we are as little curious about the "other, larger theme that 'goes' but is not played through and over the whole set" of Variations.] Sir Edward, being imaginative, may hear his voices of vision and ideal and very properly keep them to himself except as they make the rather rarefied and aspiring atmosphere of some of his music. We that listen are content with the melodious theme that his orchestra recites and upon which with due wideranging and often felicitous ingenuity he makes his variations. Perhaps the truth is that audiences have solved Sir Edward's proposed "Enigma" as an interesting and amusing concert piece. It is persuasively symphonic, full of scholarly and spontaneous, and inventive and imaginative technical resource. Sir Edward is expert in the contrasts and combinations of instrumental timbres; he can make very fine strokes or wax and broaden into swelling sonorities. Some day, the conservatories are sure to be studying the Variations for their instrumentation.

Sir Edward makes the form elastic to imagination or to fancy. Not one is dull and not one is mere pedagogy taking its pretentious exercise along a road that it has worn bare. The light variation of "Dorabella" teems with the piquancy of changeful rhythms and the "pointillage," as the French say, of instrumental timbres. [She, at least, must have added to the gayety of the rather heavy Elgarian circle.] One and another variation has a warmth of spirited imagination that bears the hearer through it almost before it is done. In others, Sir Edward is pleasantly pensive; and in one—the variation of "Nimrod"—he is eloquent, noble, sustaining and intensifying the mood of deep play of feeling between close friends in a rare moment of intimate exaltation. And in the finale he touches the easy sensibilities of those who love the swelling progressions, now stayed and now sped, of a mounting flood of orchestral sound. The answering flood of applause ensues; Sir Edward has made a "successful" piece; but one that is often better token of his finer qualities of imagination and execution than much of his more pretentious and ambitious music. Time, the sifter, is quite as likely to pass the Elgar of the Variations and the overtures through his sieve, as the Elgar of the symphony and what pious Britons call his "sacred works."

The youthful Converse of the end of the ninetier—he was then not yet thirty—seems to have known his Liszt as well as the stimulating Keets that suggested "The Festival of Pen" and the ballad of the merciless lady as well as "Endymion's Narrative" of the concert yesterday. Not that Mr. Converse, who has always gone his own way, borrows from Liszt or repeats tricks of manner. The American chose to call his piece a "Romance for Orchestra," but it is analogous in mood and treatment to the symphonic poems of the Hungarian. The mood, the poetizing and the suggesting purport of the music conditions in form. There is slow, sombre-colored, the indecisive and aspiring introduction—Endymion broods upon the vision and the passion that absorb him. There is the middle and frenetic section of struggle and relief, of frenzy and despair—Endymion at war with himself eager for all things yet restless under all but his passion. There is the exultant and mounting finale, Endymion resolutely fulfilling his progress toward his vision. The piece is indeed a romance, because it is so full of the fitful turbulence of romantic passion—much fuller than it is of the remote, grave and rarefied air of Keats's verse. Yet Mr. Converse contrives, as he always does, to make all this romance intos ymphonic music that develops of itself from himself. Thus, already, he is expert in the essentials of the symphonic poem. His transitional passages limp a little, as they do in almost all his music, but when the moment comes for the translation into tones of the emotion that is stirring in him, he is eloquent and with a youthful and fiery frankness of speech.

In Lisztian fashion, too, Mr. Converse loves his upspringing and broadening orchestral sonorities; he feels the thrill of ample and sustained sweeps of luminous or shadowed tone. He is beginning to know the secrets of restless and interwoven rhythms, the suggestions of harmonic backgrounds, even if they will not quite bring the air of Keats. He loves the excitements of abrupt contrasts and transitions; but in these earlier days Mr. Converse had little subtlety with instrumental timbres, and little mind to isolated and delicately shaded individual voices. He reflects now upon his orchestra; while ten years ago its possibilities intoxicated him. "Endymion" is spontaneous, as none of Mr. Converse's recent music has been. The romantic energy, the youthful fire of it sweeps the hearer onward. He believes and stirs, as Liszt's music makes him believe and stir, because he cannot help it. Does Mr. Converse think too much in these his days of ripening middle age? Does he look too often into the theatre and too little into the eyes of the Romance that held his younger years?

"Who holds by thee hath Heaven in fee
To gild his dross thereby."

H. T. P.

BOSTON HERALD, APRIL 13, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The announcement that the Apollo Club will co-operate with the Symphony orchestra in the performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is atracting unusual interest. The demand for seats is large, and as the number for sale for Saturday evening is very limited, there is no doubt that Symphony Hall will be filled to its capacity. It is 11 years now since the "Faust" Symphony was last given with the choral finale. The opportunity to hear the Apollo Club in conjunction with the Symphony orchestra does not come often. James H. Rattigan of the club will sing the tenor solo.

BOSTON JOURNAL
APRIL 9, 1910.

FRITZ KREISLER IS STAR AT MATINEE

Magnificent Performance Given by Violinist at Symphony Hall.

Fritz Kreisler, the most distinguished violinist who has visited Boston for a good many seasons, was the soloist at the Symphony matinee yesterday, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major, last heard when Elman made his first appearance here, a little more than a year ago. Kreisler's performance was magnificent, not only in its display of technical power, but in its intelligent expression of the deep emotional contents of the work. It was a virtuoso exhibition commanding the admiration of the most critical. The members of the orchestra were as enthusiastic as those in the audience. Great applause followed the first two movements and at the end the brilliant soloist was recalled several times. The playing of the orchestra was also worthy of the heartiest commendation.

Frederick S. Converse, the composer whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was sung at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York a few weeks ago, was another recipient of popular honors after the performance of his romance for orchestra, "Endymion's Narrative," which is the first number on this week's program. It is an interesting composition and it was most sympathetically played. Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme," with Mr. Marshall as organist, was the concluding number.

Next week the program will present another novelty, Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Francaise," which will follow "A Faust Symphony," by Liszt.

It is announced that the engagement of Anton Witek, as first violin, to succeed Professor Willy Hess, is virtually assured. Mr. Witek has been concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin for the last sixteen years. He was born in Saaz, Bohemia in 1872, and studied at Prague, under Bennewitz. He is described as a "serious, solid, thoroughly grounded musician," and not a virtuoso, and as an "excellent interpreter of the classic masters," and yet having a wide acquaintance with the modern orchestral repertory. He has made successful tours as a concert soloist in Scandinavia.

VON UNSCHULD RECITAL

Next Tuesday afternoon a pianist will make her first appearance before a Boston audience, at Steinert Hall, who established her reputation as an artist in Europe while quite young. Mme. Marie von Unschuld has been in America now for some years, but outside of Newport and Washington has been heard but little. She will play a program which will tax all her artistic powers. It is as follows: Beethoven, "Sonata quasi una fantasia," op. 27; Schumann's "Scenes From Childhood;" Polonaise in E minor, MacDowell; Debussy's "Reverie;" Poldini's "Marche Mignonne;" Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Erlking;" "Echostudy." Paganini-Liszt; Prelude "The Tolling Bell," and A-flat-major Study, Chopin; Delibes' "Passpied" from "le Roi s'amuse" and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 13.

BUSONI'S LAST RECITAL

Manager Mudgett announces that the final recital in Boston by Busoni, the pianist, will occur at Jordan Hall next Monday afternoon. On this occasion the program will be as follows: the "Waldstein," sonata, Beethoven; "Variations," Brahms-Paganini; sonata, B minor, Chopin; "Erlking," Schubert-Liszt, and Liszt's "Au Bord d'une Source," and sixth Rhapsody. Seats are on sale at Symphony Hall.

THE "POPS"

The regular season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will begin on Monday evening, May 2. Concerts will be given on every evening, except Sundays, beginning at eight o'clock and lasting until eleven. Mr. Strube will be the first conductor. Tables for the opening night may now be reserved on application at the box office at Symphony Hall.

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 13, 1910

LISZT'S "FAUST" SYMPHONY WITH CHORAL ENDING

Max Fiedler is redeeming all the promises he made at the beginning of the season with regard to the works he intended to perform this year, and on the programme for this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is one of the most interesting of his revivals—the performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the choral ending. Owing to the difficulty of geeting a male chorus for the Friday afternoon rehearsal, the whole of this splendid work has been seldom performed here in Boston. It is 11 years since Mr. Gericke placed it on his programmes, and while the orchestral parts have been played a number of times, the work in its entirety has appeared on symphony programmes only three times since the organization of the orchestra.

This year, however, Mr. Fiedler has been fortunate enough to secure the co-operation of the Apollo club, which is the premier male chorus of this country. The opportunity to hear the Apollo club in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom comes, and this concert is attracting an extraordinary amount of attention. For Friday afternoon there are [illegible] the "rush" seats for sale, but for Saturday evening there are a limited number of seats for sale at the box office. [illegible] will be sung by James H. [illegible] the Apollo club.

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 9, 1910.

CONVERSE WORK AT SYMPHONY

Endymion's Narrative by Orchestra.

Tschaikowsky and Elgar Round Out Rehearsal.

Concerto For Violin Is Played by Kreisler.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: "Endymion's Narrative," romance for orchestra, op 10, by F. S. Converse; Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler, and Elgar's variations on an original theme, op 36, with Mr Marshall as organist.

Mr Converse has written superbly imaginative music. It is fanciful without being grotesque, picturesque without being bizarre. It fathoms seriousness without tedious profundity, and it knows lightness and caprice. It flows unfalteringly. It is ardent and quickening with the glow of youth and of combat. It throbs with the emotions of the heart and plays with the fancies of the brain—it is true romanticism.

The work was "suggested" by certain scenes from Keats' story of Endymion. Mr Converse has professed no desire "to follow the text slavishly and in detail, but merely to give a general reflection of its emotional phases."

While making his romance reflective of the spiritual struggle of the hero between ambition and love, the composer has not omitted episodes of lighter and more playful fancy which are replete with beautiful imagery.

The work is singularly fresh, spontaneous and well sustained. It has fleetness and vitality, the true flavor and the breath of life. It has spun itself into a tonal fabric in which are found melodic beauty, a wealth of contrasting color, effective employment of light and shade, and although a free, yet a consistent invention in pattern. Mr Converse rose from his seat and acknowledged the applause which was generous.

Mr Kreisler, who has of late seasons steeped his soul in the chaste serenity of early Italian classicism, is not now disposed to forsake its hallowed light even for the impassioned melancholy of the Slavic Tschaikowsky. The abandon of Mr Elman's broad and puissant bowing may well be imagined in the two strongly rhythmed, folk-lore flavored themes of the fiery finale.

Yesterday Mr Kreisler's bravura was perhaps less obvious but not inferior in power of suggestion. He kept that admirable poise and equiblibrum which does not lessen the virility and verve of his playing by giving it polish.

Even here, Mr Kreisler was fastidious in keeping the silken gloss and richness in his G string tones where more "temperamental" or "emotional" players might have rasped ravishingly. Mr Kreisler does not forget beauty of tone or of style. This finale was done with superb spirit. It did not possess wild admirable poise and equiblibrium which the bounds of a rhythm which, moved both by its rigor and its plasticity.

Much might be said of the beauty of tone and the finish of phrasing in the first movement, and of the exquisite reading of the Canzonetta.

Mr Kreisler is not immune from questionable intonation in rapid passages, but the supreme art of his playing and interpretation transcends a quibble in technic. Mr Kreisler was repeatedly recalled.

Elgar has written a theme, called "Enigma" in the score, and on it 13 variations and a finale, each indicative of the nature and temperament of a friend, and each inscribed with the friend's initials. Here is more than a mood for every day. Happy is the man who boasts 14 such well-assorted friends.

Elgar wrote some of these variations with a fluency, a spontaneity and a lightness of touch which find but remote kinship in the mediocrity of his profound symphony.

Mr Elgar's fondness for the pompous is discernible in the heavily-scored finale. It may be said at times to be imposing.

The curious and irrelevant might be piqued to know who and what was the academic composer's inspiration for the sprightly, vivacious and kittenish suggestion of femininity inscribed to "Dorabella" in the 10th variation.

The concert was highly enjoyable. Mr Fiedler conducted with spirit, and the orchestra was sensitive both to technical demands and to mood.

Next week Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be given with the assistance of the Apollo club. The Suite-Francaise in D major of Roger-Ducasse will be performed for the first time in America.

BOSTON POST, APRIL 9, 1910

Kreisler and Converse on Symphony Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 21st public rehearsal of the season by the Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Fritz Kreisler played the Tschaikowsky violin concerto. Frederick S. Converse's romance for orchestra, "Endymion's Narrative," after Keats, headed the programme, which was completed by Elgar's "Enigma" variations, op. 36.

It was of more than ordinary interest to hear again an early effort of Mr. Converse, and to the composer himself, who was present, it must have been an exceptionally profitable and instructive experience. No more striking evidence of Mr. Converse's rapid development as a composer could have been offered. It should also be said, it is rarely that a musician in his 30th year conceives a work of such genuine idealism, such artistic perception, and, in certain respects, workmanship of so high an order.

The piece has now little but comparative value. There is lacking the sure hand, but, while this quality is absent to an extent, there is what may be called the sure aim, the complete consciousness of the artistic principles which have worked and are working their effect in placing Frederick Converse so far in the vanguard among his colleagues today.

The last pages, or nearly one-third of the whole of this "romance," could be loped off, and there would then be left music which is fresh with noble striving for the great things. In the introduction are the germinal ideas, which become responsible for almost everything that follows. It is true that these themes in themselves have little real distinction, but it is also true that they are well and consciously shaped for the composer's ends, and that fact is of the utmost importance and significance in a composition which represents a formative phase in an artist's development.

And the mastery of the orchestra is remarkable. Back of the piece is a vital, poetic and dramatic principle. In his conception and his treatment of this principle Mr. Converse has chosen and followed a path not unrelated to others, but essentially his own. Similar motives, in each successive instance more thoroughly and skilfully realized, are to be found in the greater works which have followed "Endymion's Narrative," as the "poems," "Night" and "Day," the fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," the opera, "The Pipe of Desire." "Endymion's Narrative" will not endure, but it is a lofty attempt, full of promise, and potent with an ideal. As such it was felt yesterday, when the composer bowed his acknowledgments.

Hanslick's condemnation of Tschaikowsky's concerto was by no means unjustified. Certainly the music is vulgar, strong with animality and the fumes of vodka. Yet how vital! How far more a living thing than a host of mediocrities which escaped that scathing pen. Mr. Kreisler, himself an elemental though highly differentiated being, gave a superb performance of the work. Superb in its breadth and characteristic vigor; in its virtuosity—for, lacking the spirit of the virtuoso, the playing of this music is a vain and empty thing; and finally, superb by reason of the creative consciousness which expressed all that Tschaikowsky would have desired—then fixed a structure of a proportion and dignity which increased the worth of the thing ten fold. Mr. Kreisler took the finale at a pace which seriously embarrassed the accompanying orchestra. The applause knew no bounds.

Elgar, like too many other composers, wrote variations. The all-knowing programmatist has found the key to more than one of these "enigmas." For those curious in these matters there is sufficient entertainment. It is enough to say that more than once in these little flights of fancy, Elgar has really forgotten that he was a serious minded Englishman, and has written with fluency and charm.

At the concerts of next week Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be performed for the first time in some years.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 11, 1910

The Symphony Concert

The Symphony Concert of Saturday proved the most applausive evening, thus far, of the series. Even Mr. Fiedler's coming to his place did not pass as so much routine, and twice at the end of "Endymion's Narrative," Mr. Converse had to bow a composer's acknowledgment of applause that may have signified not only the pleasure of the audience in the particular piece but its general and just regard for him and his work and in other respects than the writing of music. How much our opera house owes to him; how much it may have need of him in the future, even the audience "in another place," has not forgotten; while it is two years since, as a composer, Mr. Converse has come to the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Kreisler, in turn, was very warmly applauded, before he began Tschaikowsky's concerto, after he finished it, and at each pause that the music yielded. It was his leave-taking and the applause, by its spontaneity and insistence seemed to testify to the accumulated admiration of many years. Elgar's Variations ended the concert, and while the audience was as swift to depart as though the programme had been long, they, too, had their plaudits.

Usually the concerts of Saturday evenings excel those of Friday afternoons, less because of repetition than because the performers are more in the vein and the audiences more nervously alert and sensitive. In Boston, at least, æsthetic responsiveness usually rises with the figures on the clock. This week, however, as it does happen sometimes, the afternoon concert gave the more pleasure of the two. Mr. Kreisler is at the end of a long tour; the fever of two seasons ago still lurks in his body; he is temperamentally and inescapably of changing moods; and he could not carry his performance of Tschaikowsky's concerto for a third time to the heights to which he had borne it at the rehearsal of Thursday and the concert of Friday. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, was in that strenuous mood, which has gained upon him within the last two months, in which he lays on and spares not, and in which he would subordinate many an orchestral virtue to the "big tone" and to the smiting contrast. Thus he made the climaxes of Mr. Converse's tone-poem mighty and sweeping, but who might say what was in them except an orgy of excited sound. Line, color, design and detail were all submerged in the flood of sound. In like fashion, Mr. Fiedler was lightness itself, and to pleasure, in some of Elgar's Variations; but he would not rest until he had made the pompous senorities of the finale almost burst with their own inflation.

H. T. P.

POST, APRIL 10, 19[illegible]

CONCERTS

The last novelty Mr. Fiedler expects to do this year is on the twenty-first programme of the Symphony Orchestra, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It is a "Suite Francaise" in D-major by Roger Ducasse. Ducasse is one of the younger Frenchmen, who has lately sprung into prominence through the performance of orchestral works in Paris. He is a pupil of Faure, but leans rather to the school of d'Indy than to that of the Conservatoire. This suite is regarded by Mr. Fiedler as one of the most interesting things that has come to his notice for several seasons. It is in four movements of conventional form, an overture, a bourree, a recitative and air, and a minuet. While the form is simple and conventional, he has filled it with ultra-modern material.

This and Liszt's Faust Symphony, which will be the first number, comprise the entire programme. It is now 11 years since the Faust Symphony has been performed here with the final chorus, and in the present performance the Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of the Apollo Club of this city and of Mr. James H. Rattigan, tenor. The instrumental movements were last played here in the season of 1904-1905 under Mr. Gericke, and the entire symphony was performed in the spring of 1899 under the same conductor. Dr. Muck did not put the symphony on his programme, though he considered the matter, because he did not care to give it incomplete and there were difficulties in getting a male chorus for the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. These difficulties, fortunately, have been overcome and the patrons of the Symphony concerts will thus have a chance to hear what is unquestionably Liszt's masterpiece.

Pension Fund Concert

With the exception of the names of the songs with which Mme. Sembrich will end the concert, the programme of the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall one week from tonight, April 17, is now complete. Mme. Sembrich will sing one aria, the "Involami," from Verdi's "Ernani," and she will sing four songs at the end of the concert, not to speak of such encores as the audience may persuade her to give.

The first part of the programme will be devoted to Wagner. The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser." In the second part, after the aria and before the songs, will come Martin Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle."

The Pops

The regular season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will begin on Monday evening, May 2, and continue for nine weeks, the last one coming on Saturday, July 2. Concerts, as in the past, will be given on every evening except Sundays, beginning at 8 o'clock and lasting until 11. Mr. Strube will be the first conductor. Tables for the opening night may now be reserved on application at the box office at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Mudgett announces that the final recital in Boston by Busoni, the pianist, will occur at Jordan Hall tomorrow afternoon. On this occasion the programme will be as follows: Opus 53, "Waldstein," Beethoven; "Variations," Brahms-Paganini; sonata, B minor, Chopin; "Erlkonig," "Au Bord d'Une Source" and "Sixth Rhapsodie," Schubert-Liszt.

BOSTON HERALD,
APRIL 9, 1910.

LYRIC 'ENDYMION'S NARRATIVE' GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 21st Public Rehearsal Is Eloquent Production of Converse's Romance.

FRITZ KREISLER'S VIOLIN PLAYING IS REMARKABLE

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"Endymion's Narrative".....Converse
Concerto for violin.....Tschaikowsky
Variations on an original theme....Elgar

Mr. Converse has said that he wished this romance and the other work founded on episodes in Keats' "Endymion"—"The Festival of Pan"—to be judged according to their musical merits or demerits; that he had no desire and did not attempt to follow slavishly the text. His aim was to give a general reflection of emotional phases. He also said that the idea of "Endymion's Narrative" was derived from the scene where Endymion, in melancholy mood, reveals the cause of his sorrow to his sister Peona. The music pictures him despondent, harassed by visions of the ideal, which at last comes out victorious and leaves behind it affection and other confining conditions.

In other words, Mr. Converse wishes this romance to be judged first of all as music without a program. But there is the disturbing title. They that insist on knowing what music "means" will listen to the Romance as though it were an interlinear translation of Keats' text. How many yesterday could have told offhand the nature of Endymion's narrative or the name of the person to whom it was addressed. Is the poem familiar to the younger generation? The first line is now a stale quotation and some may remember the roundelay and the verse which serves as motto to Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native." But how many could tell who Peona was? Mr. Converse wrote this romance in 1901. Today he would probably take any other of the more famous poems of Keats, as later he was moved to composition by "La Belle Dame Sans Merci."

The question comes up, would any hearer find greater depth or finer quality of beauty in this music by being familiar with Keats' poem? Mr. Ernest Newman would probably say "Yes"; and, if Mr. Converse should maintain that the music is not program music, Mr. Newman would reply: "But there's your title. As I associate the story of Coriolanus with one of Beethoven's overtures because Beethoven gave it the name of the hero, so I am forced by you to associate Endymion's outpouring of soul with your music."

To him that cares not for Endymion or Peona, the music itself will give pleasure. He will recognize the expression of moods; he will hear festal music that is, however, secondary; he will hear the struggle of a noble idea with opposing forces and he will find in the jubilant close the triumph of this idea. The music will please him emotionally, for it is first of all emotional. The melodies will appeal to him, and so will rich harmonies and delicately effective or sumptuous instrumentation. This Romance is one of the most spontaneous of Mr. Converse's works.

In these days of young Napoleons of finance, railroads, etc., it is an atrocious crime to be over 40, and the age of 30—Mr. Converse composed "Endymion's Narrative" when he was of that age—is considered one of apathy if not of decrepitude. This music is full of youthful hopes and dreams and aspirations, but the expression is not callow—not so callow as many pages of Keats' poem. On the other hand, the music is not painfully searched after; there is not the too-evident wish to avoid the commonplace; there is no fanatical bowing down to strange harmonic gods. If there is any influence revealed it is that of the composer of "Tristan and Isolde," not of the ultra-modern French and Germans, but this Wagnerian influence is slight and more in an infrequent use of formula than in melodic or harmonic reminiscence.

"Endymion's Narrative" was first played here seven years ago. During these years we have heard strange things in music and listened to strange doctrines. The strangeness in the best of these works is now recognized as beautiful invention. The strangeness in many of them, impotent striving, caused them to disappear and be forgotten. Mr. Converse's romance is still fresh and modern. Its modernity is that of true beauty that abideth, of high thoughts that do not easily die.

The orchestra gave an eloquent performance and Mr. Converse was obliged twice to bow in acknowledgment of the hearty and long continued applause.

The performance of Tschaikowsky's concerto by Mr. Kreisler must be ranked among the most memorable musical events of the recent years in this city. It was memorable not only by reason of technical display, fine taste, brilliance, emotional quality; it was also memorable because the violinist in a certain way recreated the work and gave dignity and charm to pages that heretofore have appeared indifferent, trivial or even vulgar.

Seldom has any performance at a Public Rehearsal aroused as great enthusiasm. It would not be easy to describe Mr. Kreisler's playing to them that were not present. The performance was one to remember, not to analyze; to wonder at as a phenomenon of nature. Conductor and orchestra, as under a spell, gave a most sympathetic accompaniment.

Elgar's variations are the work of a thoughtful and well equipped musician, who is not without fancy, who has facility in expression, who is often fortunate in combinations of timbres. He does not always distinguish between thought and rhetoric; he has a weakness for sonorous platitudes. When he would fain be most impressive his music is often the emptiest. When he does not take himself too seriously his music is pleasing, but without fine flavor. The composer is an excellent example of the middle class in art. The prettiness, for instance, of the "Dorabella" variation is that of the promenade concert. This set of variations with the bombastic finale was well played.

The program next week will include Liszt's "Faust" symphony with male chorus and Ducasse's Suite Francaise.

BOSTON JOURNAL,
APRIL 14, 1910.

APOLLO CLUB TO ASSIST SYMPHONY

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is redeeming all the promises he made at the beginning of the season with regard to the works he intended to perform this year, and on the program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is one of the most interesting of his revivals, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with the choral ending. Owing to the difficulty of getting a male chorus for the Friday afternoon rehearsal, the whole of this splendid work has been seldom performed here in Boston.

Mr. Fiedler has been fortunate enough to secure the co-operation of the Apollo Club, which is the premier male chorus of this country. The opportunity to hear the Apollo Club in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom comes, and this concert is attracting an extraordinary amount of attention. The tenor solo will be sung by James H. Rattigan of the Apollo Club.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 14, 1910

News of Music

Mr. Fiedler has completed his programmes for the three pairs of Symphony Concerts that remain to finish the season, and they go as follows: For the concerts of this week List's "Faust" symphony, with the choral finale sung by a choir of the Apollo Club and a new suite by a new Parisian composer, Roger-Ducasse; for the concerts of next week, Strauss's "Don Quixote," the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and a novel piece for strings by a new composer, August Hahn; for the final concerts of the year on April 29 and 30, Beethoven's first symphony and his choral symphony, with a choir from the Cecilia and Mmes. de Moss and Keyes and Messrs. von Norden and Weld for the quartet.

The songs that Mme. Sembrich will sing at the concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening are Brahms's "Wie Melodien;" Schumann's "Aufträge;" Strauss's "Allerseelen;" Jacques-Dalcroze's "Blue Bird;" La Forge's "To a Messenger" and doubtless an extra piece or two.

[146]

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 9, 1910

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME WITHOUT NOVELTIES

NEVERTHELESS, MODERN TASTE IS GRATIFIED

Superb Playing of Elgar's Variations, With Organ Accompaniment—Mr. Kreisler Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Converse—"Endymion's Narrative."
Tschaikowsky—Violin Concerto in D.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.
Elgar—Variations of an Original Theme.
(Organist, Mr. Marshall.)

It was an agreeable programme for the auditor with modern tastes, although there were no novelties in its numbers. Once in a while it is as well to remember that the search for novelty can be pushed too far. We were very glad to hear Mr. Converse's setting of Keats' "Endymion's Narrative" as an orchestral tone-poem, once again. It is one of Mr. Converse's orchestral successes. The work has caught up that ineffable sylvan charm of Keats and its delicacy and subtleness fit its subject well. In these days of modern bombast and prolixity it was refreshing to come upon a work which is quite intelligible and which does not scorn melody. There is no attempt made to inflate the subject unduly, no thundering out of Keats in "King Cambyses vein," but a poetic and logical work of delicacy and of beauty. The march theme near the end was a good compromise between the classical and the popular veins.

The romantic style is of course predominant, and it is pleasant to note that there is no straining for effect in the composition, the voices are led easily and gracefully, and although the full orchestra is employed the score exhibits an entire mastery over the effects of tone-color. "Endymion's Narrative" is an oasis in the desert of recent orchestral complexities; nevertheless it cannot be easily followed by those who demand tune only, for it has considerable ingenious figure treatment.

Its scheme might almost be summed up in three words—Indecision, Courage, Triumph. Its last portion is clear enough to appeal to musician and layman alike. It evidently did so on this occasion, for Mr. Converse was obliged to bow his thanks repeatedly from his place in the audience.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler is always worthy of attention, even if he were only to play the scale of G major. He is so sure in intonation, so broad and majestic in his bowing, so sympathetic in his tone-quality, that his superior can no longer be found,—he is the equal of any living violinist. But we wished him a better work than Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. This composition does not display the great composer of the B-flat concerto, or of the fifth and sixth symphonies. We find here instead, a man who is parading the technique of the violin, very much as the pyrotechnists of the Franco-Belgian school exhibit their rockets and pin-wheels. This is particularly true of the long, long first movement.

In the second movement matters begin to mend, although it imitates the opening movement as regards length. But it is more poetic and has some graphic and striking touches, among which the horn effects (although somewhat a la Berlioz) may be mentioned. It was also noticeable that Tschaikowsky took a leaf out of Mendelssohn's book and placed the cadenza of the first movement where it did not make a final "Tour de Force." It is a rather weak point in music, although frequently done, this placing a cadenza at the very end of a movement so as to allow the artist to make a personal triumph. But Beethoven and Brahms began to steer away from this in their later works and we hope to see the day when the cadenza will die out of concerto-music.

In the last movement there were folk-song touches and, of course, Tschaikowsky's foot was upon his native heath. Here there was legitimate brilliancy which was not a mere display of technique. There was that constant repetition of figures which forms the picturesque monotony of Russian folk-music, and which might move one to exclaim with Falstaff—" 'Thou hast damnable iteration!' " But the glory of Kreisler's double-stopping and skips in the cadenza, the absolutely perfect G string work and harmonics of the Finale, the sympathetic quality of the Canzonetta, caused the audience to become wildly enthusiastic. Recall followed recall, and for a long time Mr. Kreisler was engaged in a walking tour to and fro, from the Green-room to the platform and back again. He won a great triumph.

Elgar's "Variations" for orchestra are a very different thing from his long-winded and scant-ideaed symphony. They are free variations which are well over the fence in the development field. Such variations as Brahms and Beethoven have paved the way for. That there is a certain element of mystery about the work does not detract from its charm. Each variation pictures the character of one of Elgar's friends, so that the set presents a series of emotional sketches such as Schumann used to depict in his more fanciful moments.

It is said that a hyper-critic once told Elgar that he had never discovered any people like those pictured in the variations. "Certainly you have not," was the crushing reply, "they are ladies and gentlemen!" Nevertheless a drawing-room full of these gentry might seem odd. One went tiptoeing through his movement mysteriously; another had apparently a fit of the ague, judging by his shivering effects; another made mad, impetuous rushes to and fro with drums and brasses; another stalked as pompously as if he had just come from the House of Lords and had vetoed the Budget. But judged apart from any personality these were exquisite tone-poems and in fine contrast to a magnificent climax.

The mastery of orchestral [illegible] the easy grace of the kaleidoscopic changes of the theme, make this work one of the best in the English repertoire. Here there is no straining such as is evident in the symphony with which Sir Edward attempted to astonish the world. Would that the composer might recede from his "advanced" standpoint and come back to such refreshing contrasts of tone-coloring and of figure treatment. The climax is as above intimated, grandly worked up, and the entire work leaves a good taste in the mouth. The reading of these variations was something that should redound to the credit of Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra. It gave a new meaning to the work and made it much more impressive than in any previous performances.

MONITOR,
APRIL 11, 1910.

FRITZ KREISLER.
One of world's greatest violinists, soloist Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

MAX FIEDLER certainly prefers the music of the modern to that of the classic orchestra, but he confines his preferences to time and not to place; he cares not to what country his composers belong, if only they have flourished in recent years. He presented American and English music as his own part of the twenty-first Symphony program; and with his soloist, Fritz Kreisler, he presented a Russian work, as follows: Converse, "Endymion's Narrative," romance for orchestra, op. 10; Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin in D major, op. 35; Elgar, variations on an original theme, op. 36.

Mr. Fiedler conducted "Endymion's Narrative" with the evident intention to reveal its inner spirit and to show the composer's technical mastery of the orchestra. His difficulty was to keep technique from overbalancing spirit. When Mr. Converse wrote this piece of music he made his task harder than he needed to because he felt obliged in order to justify his pretensions as a symphony composer to give a complete account of his talent for orchestration. He chose a simple structural plan and into this he wrought enough detail of color and contrast for three or four orchestral romances. Mr. Converse proved indisputably here that he could handle all the modern combinations; the wonder is that he did not venture on a larger fundamental design on which to use them.

Mr. Kreisler was given better orchestral assistance in the concerto than some soloists before him have had this season. It is a rare thing to hear a concerto performed as though conductor and soloist were of one mind in its interpretation; the best that can be expected is that the conductor will subordinate himself and help carry out the visiting artist's ideas. Fortunately Mr. Kreisler is an interpreter with whom Mr. Fiedler could not essentially disagree, or at least is one whose thoughts he could readily divine; and so the Tschaikowsky work went smoothly. Mr. Kreisler was remarkably reserved in dealing with the difficulties of the concerto; his endeavor was to make it a thing of music rather than a thing of [illegible]. His greatest success, naturally enough, came where the real musical feeling of the [illegible] lies, in the slow movement.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 15, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE CECILIA AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Advantages to Both in an Alliance and the Circumstances That Counsel It—Musical Satiety in New York and Musical Satisfaction in London—The Delights of Operatic Antiques—"Habanera" and the Boston Opera—A Spanish "Ring"—Mr. Newman's Retort Upon Mr. Shaw

Today and tomorrow, a choir from the Apollo Club is singing in the Finale of Liszt's "Faust" with the Symphony Orchestra. A fortnight hence a choir from the Cecilia will assist it in a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. Had Mr. Fiedler found occasion to perform Delius's tone-poem, "Appalachia," he would have had need this season of still another choir. Last year, at the Symphony Concerts, a part of the Choral Club of the Conservatory and a body of singers from the Cecilia were necessary to Debussy's "Sirens" and the Choral Symphony. Dr. Muck in the two years of his conductorship ventured no music that asked an assisting choir; but in Mr. Gericke's time, performances of Schumann's "Manfred," of the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser" and of fragments of "Parsifal"—to cite only casually—required such assistance. The conductors of the Symphony Orchestra have often wished to put on their programmes music that demanded both an orchestra and a chorus; that was interesting, important and sometimes rarely heard, in itself; that had at least an occasional place in the repertories of similar bands and that would have added to the diversity and so to the pleasure of our long series of Symphony Concerts. Oftenest, they have foregone their purpose, because of the embarrassments, artistic, financial and of mere routine, in the securing of assistance from one or another independent choral society.

Many an orchestra in Europe maintains a chorus of its own or helps to maintain one in close alliance with it that it may utilize the singers for music that is both orchestral and choral and that should stand, at intervals, on its programmes. The Symphony Orchestra has long needed such a choral ally, and it is an open secret that at least once in the past, it has made overtures to the Cecilia to that end. They were politely declined; but a single refusal seems no sufficient reason why they should not be renewed. Though only a few years have passed since the proposal was made, musical conditions in this town, and especially the conditions that attend choral concerts, have changed rapidly. Unless they have a peculiar and comparatively isolated public, like that of the Apollo Club or the Händel and Haydn Society, they must contend with the opera, the Symphony Concerts, the ever-increasing swarms of wandering singers and virtuosi in a community that seems to grow more and more indifferent to choral music. Endowed as the Cecilia is, justly distinguished as it is among such bodies, long and honorable as has been its past, interesting as is its present, the public response to its concerts in the last two years has not been encouraging. It is losing its old following; it has not materially gained a new. Its concerts are beginning to come and go in the routine of the musical winter. If half the current reports be true, it is vexed with divided counsels in the ordering of its affairs and its future. It needs to regain its old vitality, prestige, and place in our musical life. Could it better do so than by becoming the allied choir of the Symphony Orchestra? The orchestra needs such a chorus; the Cecilia would share the prestige and the security of the band; and if it lost a little of its individuality, it would not be abating, in association with the first orchestra in America, one whit of its standards. A future would open before it. H. T. P.

Satiety and Satisfaction

Time was when, as soon as the opera season ended, concert givers rushed into the music halls of New York like waters that had been held back by a dam. Nothing of the sort has happened this year; with the exception of Wüllner's farewell on Tuesday night, which closed the musical year 1909-10, no concert of any importance has been given since the Metropolitan Opera Company, which outlasted the Manhattan by a week, closed its doors and departed for the West. Concerts are seldom as popular as operas; and, inasmuch as even the opera had been obliged, during its last few weeks, to rely on Russian dancers for most of its large audiences, the concert-givers wisely concluded that they had better hie them to Europe, where the season lasts four months longer than on this side of the Atlantic.

If the situation shows conclusively that we have had too much music during the last six months, the musicians need not be alarmed, for the conditions were exceptional. For three years New York was able to support two opera houses in addition to the usual number of concerts; trouble came when both the opera companies nearly doubled the number of their performances and the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same time gave considerably more than twice the usual number of concerts. What with the concerts of the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras, the Russian and Volpe bands, the multitudinous Sunday entertainments at the opera houses, the choral performances, and the recitals of singers, pianists, and violinists, there will still be more than enough music next year. But there will be less of a glut in the operatic and orchestral branches, in which we have tried, during the past six months, to surpass all European cities, quantitatively as well as qualitatively, with some [illegible] results.

It should be borne in mind that the consequences of such over-production would have been the same in London or Paris, Berlin or Munich. Tickets for extra concerts are hard to dispose of everywhere. As Mme. Schumann-Heink once remarked: "The music-lovers of the large German cities set aside a certain amount for concerts each season, and they attend the regular subscription series in their own towns, and won't spend a penny more for anything else." For a year or two it seemed as if extra concerts would in this city attract the public in paying numbers on Sunday afternoons; but during the past season three of our orchestras entered this field, with the usual result—supply in excess of demand, and large deficits for the generous guarantors to make up. [The New York Evening Post.

In London there is always a public for music all the year round. The days when there was practically little music in the metropolis during the winter have long since passed away, and as a result the musical events are to all intents and purposes continuous throughout the year. There are brief intervals at Christmas and at Easter, and the first fortnight in August witnesses little concert-giving, and although there are few individual efforts put forward during September the series of Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall supplies a musical feature of considerable interest. The tale is once more taken up by the provincial festivals, and by the time they are finished concerts are in full swing in London. In no place in the world is there so much concert-giving as in London, and the custom of the London press in recording the majority of the events gives the practice a prominence it does not receive in any other country. The fact, however, shows the interest in music. Musical events are treated as news of the day, and this is one of the things that go to prove that we are at least a nation interested in music. [The London Morning Post.

Mr. Strube, for the first month, and Mr. André Maquarre for the second, will divide the conducting at the "Pops" this summer. In departure from the custom of recent years, there will be no third leader.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 16, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the Symphony Concerts for a First Performance in Six Years—Mme. Sembrich's Songs for the Pension Fund Programme Tomorrow Evening — The Boston Orchestral Club Comes with More Unfamiliar Music

It was in the winter of 1904 that Strauss's "Don Quixote" was last played at the Symphony concerts. In the interval two operas from the same composer have come to performance, and another is to follow. "Don Quixote," which is sub-titled Fantastic Variation on a Chivalric Theme, follows the form of an introduction, Theme, with Variations and Finale. In the chronology of Strauss's works it falls between "Also sprach Zarathustra" and "Ein Heldenleben." Its idiom has been described often and in detail; each variation interprets an episode in the romance; the solo violoncello impersonates the knight and the solo viola Sancho Panza.

The novelty of the programme will be a piece for the strings by August Hahn, receiving its first performance in this country. The other numbers will be the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The programme for the pair of concerts two weeks hence will consist of Beethoven's first and ninth (choral) symphony, for the second of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecilia Society and soloists.

For the Pension Fund concert tomorrow evening, for which Mme. Sembrich will contribute her services as soloist, the orchestral numbers will be, with the exception of Mr. Charles Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle," Wagnerian excerpts: the Preludes to the "Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin," the Overture to "Tannhäuser" and the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan und Isolde." Mme. Sembrich's numbers are: "Ernani Suvolami," from Verdi's "Ernani"; Brahms's "Wie Melodien zieht es mir"; Schumann's "Aufträge"; Strauss's "Allerseelen"; Jacques-Dalcroze's "L'oiseau bleu," and F. La Forge's "To a Messenger."

BOSTON POST, APRIL 16 1910

Organ Goes on Rampage at Symphony Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, for the first time in many years with chorus, was the least of the sensations attendant upon the 22d public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The symphony was well under way when the great organ became possessed of the Mephistofelean spirit of denial. The first movement of the symphony—the "Faust" section—had been given a brilliant performance. Mr. Fiedler took up his baton to commence the "Gretchen" movement, when the organ, recollecting the final conflicting tonalities of "Thus Spake Zarathustra," began to vocalize. Two tones, the one a squeak and the other a groan, sounded simultaneously and continuously. There was a wait of some 10 minutes before the refractory instrument was suppressed. The "Mephistofeles" movement went on in good shape, until it was nearly time for the "chorus mysticus" to be heard, and then a chord kept sounding long after Mr. Fiedler had become discouraged in endeavoring to drown or discourage the tone. Mr. Fiedler was obviously at the end of his patience. The audience, pleasantly disposed, applauded for the movement to finish. At last Mr. Fiedler took courage, and the final pages proceeded without mishap. Previous to the performance this evening, the instrument will be carefully gone over. It is not the first time that it has caused some inconvenience, though never in such a glaringly discourteous manner. The exact cause of the trouble is not known. Either a pneumatic valve was responsible for the "ciphering," or there was some complication in the arrangement of the cable which connects the manual with the wind chest and pipes, for the keyboard was placed at one side of the orchestra, instead of at the back of the stage or directly in front of Mr. Fiedler, as usual.

This was not all. The "Faust" symphony is a work of no mean dimensions. Under ordinary circumstances it consumes 50 minutes and upwards in performance. The delays, on this occasion, brought the conclusion at about 3:55. As the concerts usually conclude by a quarter past the hour, the electrician very naturally concluded that the end was come, and, as the audience poured into the corridors for the intermission, the lights commenced to go out, one set after another. The hall was in darkness, save for the lights which hang suspended over the orchestra, before the mistake was corrected. There was more laughter.

These were by far the most diverting moments of the afternoon, for Liszt's symphony, though containing more than one flash of genius, is upon the whole tedious and boresome. Nor can better things be said of the suite by Roger Ducasse, which was given for the first time in this country. Mr. Ducasse, a pupil, we are told, of Gabriel Faure, has an extensive technic, and in the music heard yesterday he brings his tools with him. The music is modern. It is written with design to fill old bottles with new wine. It is ingeniously, though usually obviously, pieced together. The overture is festive and brilliantly orchestrated, as are the other movements. This music is for the most part forced and arid.

Hearing Liszt's symphony the immense debt that modern composers, from Wagner down, owe that composer, was the more apparent. The first movement of this work is interesting. It is impossible to consider it a symphony, for, in spite of pretence to symphonic proportions and principles, the music is seldom or never symphonic, in the true sense. With all his brilliancy, Liszt very rarely displayed any ability to give a theme genuine development. In the Faust movement climaxes build up and lead to nothing.

A climax should be the flowering, the explosion, of what has gone before. Better to take the other point of view, to consider this as a series of musical pictures. There is much striking material. Never mind if the phrases—most significant, believable, Faust-like phrases—which introduce the section, do make us think of Tristan. They are genuinely expressive, and it is not particularly profitable to waste time in speculation as to the real thief, Liszt or Wagner. Both gentlemen were inhabited by a consciousness new born in that period. Wagner was the greatest musician; Liszt, perhaps, the greatest seer—as witness his successors, to name only two, Franck and Strauss. The two artists benefited by each other.

There are some of the very biggest kind of ideas in this symphony. In writing of Faust, the philosopher and sceptic, Liszt knew whereof he spoke. His portrayal of Gretchen is melodious and milky, the Mephistofelean mockery of the last part is potteringly ingenious and quite futile. And the passages for the chorus are still more flat. They do not, indeed, invite comparison with the great setting of the same passage by Schumann. With the exception of the mishaps mentioned this performance was in the highest degree worthy of Mr. Fiedler and his men. The chorus, too, sang with fine body and sonority of tone. This chorus consisted of members of the Apollo Club, and it was James Rattigan, tenor, who sang the difficult solo measures. These gentlemen are to be heartily thanked for their performance, which made possible a hearing of a very important and comparatively unknown work.

MONITOR, APRIL 16, 1910.

NOTES.

Mme. Sembrich's songs on the program of the Symphony pension fund concert Sunday evening are: Brahms, Wie Melodien zieht es mir; Schumann, Auftrage; Strauss, Allerseelen; Jacques-Dalcroze, L'oiseau bleu, and F. La Forge, To a Messenger. Her aria with orchestra is the Involami from Verdi's "Ernani."

Frank La Forge, Mme. Sembrich's accompanist, comes with her to Boston. Mr. Fiedler's orchestral selections from Wagner comprise the prelude to the "Mastersingers," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and love death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The Richard Strauss tone poem "Don Quixote," whchih as not been played in Boston since February, 1904, is the principal number on the Symphony program of Friday afternoon, April 22, and Saturday evening, April 23. "Don Quixote" had its first performance in Germany 12 years ago. It consists of 10 variations on themes denoting the two heroes of Cervantes' novel, the knight Don Quixote and his squire Sancho Panza. The variations describe the incidents in Don Quixote's career of knight errantry in La Mancha of Spain. The encounter with the windmills and with the sheep, the dialogue of knight and squire on the ideal and the real, Don Quixote's vigil, the imagined flight on the wooden horse, the enchanted boat and more things besides are all dealt with in the Strauss program manner. A new work of Augustus Hahn will be produced at these concerts and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will be performed.

The last Cambridge symphony concert of the season will be given in Sanders theater, Cambridge, Thursday evening, April 28, with Willy Hess as soloist. The program includes two of the larger works of the Boston season—Rachmaninoff's "Totesinsel" and Strauss' "Domestic Symphony." Mr. Hess will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E minor.

The twenty-fourth and last pair of Boston concerts will be given in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, April 29, and Saturday evening, April 30, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be presented with the Cecilia Society and Mme. Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Bernard von Norden, tenor, and Frederick We[illegible]ass, assisting in the choral finale.

TRANSCRIPT.
APRIL 16, 1910

N ORGAN AND THE SYMPHONY

n Afternoon of Unusual and Amusing Incident at the Symphony Concert—A Vicious and Untamable Organ That Disturbed Liszt's "Faust" and Sorely Vexed Mr. Fiedler and His Men—Lengths, Lights and Light-Mindedness

An organ, at a symphony concert is a vain thing for safety. Since composers will, on occasion, write parts for it, orchestras, on occasion, must provide it. Time was when they gave their concerts under the shadow of a "noble instrument" fixed in his place, oftenest dependable. Few orchestras sit upon such shadowed stages nowadays, and at Symphony Hall in particular, the actual organ is an ignoble instrument. Externally, it is diminutive and ugly to the eye, a mere thing to be shifted about the stage according to the convenience of the day, with a hose pipe trailing away into what Zarathustra called the rear-world. Its tone oftenest is as ignoble as its aspect—a mere organ in its lower and prosaic estate. Its temper—for organs notoriously have tempers—is ignobler still. Every organist, who to his anxiety has had to do with it, has opened it with suspicion and closed it with relief, weary with careful and mistrustful tendence. Like some children, however, such an organ can be most vicious when it is left to itself and most perilous after a long period of seeming quiescence. Now, the organ at Symphony Hall, has behaved itself unusually well these many months, made a show even of sham virtues, and lulled those in charge of it into a false confidence that grew a little careless of what used to be a periodical and minute examination into the state of its "innards."

Yesterday the organ had its part in the finale of Liszt's "Faust" symphony; once more it had been shifted—this time to the extreme left of the stage, beyond the first violins, but well toward the front, clearly visible, and, as the event was soon to prove, clearly audible. Ignoble but quiescent, it stood in its sheath of virtue through the first movement of the symphony. The ensuing pause was longer than usual and impatience seemingly winged its viciousness. Mr. Fiedler lifted his stick to begin the second movement and simultaneously the organ, of its own motion, lifted its voice. It was a two-fold voice, so to say, half-shrill with petulance, half-gruff with sullenness. Quick-eared persons in the audience who dislike the new music, believed that they were hearing a new dissonance, tried to discover whether Liszt had anticipated Strauss or d'Indy, and wondered just how it characterized Gretchen in an Andante Souave. The mere laity pricked up its ears at an unfamiliar sound that no human hand was drawing forth from wood or string or brass; placed it, guessed it, and smilingly craned its head to see and hear. Mr. Fiedler did not smile; while Mr. Marshall, the organist, disappeared to suppress behind the scenes the fit of temper that had seized his instrument. The restraining process took time.

At length the symphony proceeded, but with the experienced and therefore mistrustful Fiedler casting nervous side glances at the tamed organ, and with his men beginning to be as nervous as he. The second movement—of "Gretchen"—flowed its course; the third movement—of "Mephistopheles"—went its ironic and acrid way. The moment of transition came, the moment dear to the word-painting commentators: "The music ascends in the violins, grows softer and softer; the oboe sings the Gretchen theme. The vision quickly fades. Again an outbreak of despair; and then things grow more and more desperate, till we come to what we may call the transformation scene. It is like the rolling and shifting of clouds, and, indeed, transports us from the abode of mortal man to more ethereal spheres." But the organ would have none of them. The inferno of its own entrails cried out in protest; and lifted its voice in a sustained and mounting wail. A classicist behind us said it "ululated," and presumably the word described the sound. The audience, being human, craned and tittered; Mr. Fiedler rapped the band to silence, tossed his stick on his music-stand and in three strides almost was out of the door seeking the organist. If a passing look could annihilate wood and metal, the organ would have fallen into shreds and splinters as he passed.

A long and excessive pause as Wagner's stage directions say, ensued, in which the murmurings of the organ gradually stilled themselves. Mr. Marshall once more took his place before it—grim; and Mr. Fiedler—grim, too—resumed the finale. Then the choir of the Apollo Club for the chorus and Mr. Rattigan for the tenor passages, bore orchestra and conductor, symphony and audience to the end. There was a hearty burst of applause; over it rose a burst of chattering tongues such as the afternoon concerts have not known in many a day; and then suddenly, to cap the climax, the hall was in the semi-darkness that usually shrouds it. The hour was four; the organ had lengthened the "Faust" symphony by many minutes; an innocent electrician had believed the concert ended. An unusual number of the audience took the hint and departed; Ducasse's new suite went its way between a conductor and a band who were plainly glad to have done and to whom his daring 15-8 and 11-8 and 7-4 and 5-4 time-signatures may plausibly have seemed the final vexation of a freakish day. It was a day for record not for reviewing. That shall come after the concert tonight. Meanwhile the organ is receiving what the policeman who orders traffic was sure it needed—the third

GLOBE-
APRIL 16. 1910.

"FAUST SYMPHONY."

Liszt's Movement Played by Fiedler's Men.

Suite Francaise by Ducasse Given Its Premiere in America.

Two works comprised the program at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon: Liszt's "Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)" with a male chorus from the Apollo club, James H. Rattigan solo tenor and Mr Marshall organist, and a Suite Francaise in D major by Ducasse, for the first time in America

The three divisions of the symphony, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," do not betray symphonic form in their relation to each other, and with the exception of the first, in their structure as individual movements. "Faust" does follow the general plan of the usual divisions of exposition, working out and recapitulation.

The composer's purpose was to write music which should describe or characterize these three individuals, after the fashion in which Goethe wrote of them. One might say that Liszt had written three tone-poems or "character pictures," instead of a symphony. His music, however, is much inferior in vitality, imaginative sweep, coherence and communicating appeal to "The Preludes" or even to his "Hungarian Rhapsodies."

The thematic material of the "Faust" is not itself at fault. The opening theme with its two ascending tritones is not unlike the groping, despairing Faust, nor is the oboe's strained downward skip of the major seventh in the second unbecoming to his laboring mind. There is another theme descending step-wise that breathes of longing, and another which speaks manfully and with resolve in the trumpet, and later with much bombast and pomp in all the brass.

In the use and development of this subject matter there is a lack of completeness, directness or conviction of statement.

The "Gretchen" division has character, but does not fully characterize. It is sweet, mild, inocuous music, with the prettiness of flowing curves of gracious melody as far as Gretchen herself is concerned. In the light of such an atmosphere it is difficult to explain the perturbed and self-absorbed seriousness which beclouds the entrance of Faust, after the version of Goethe.

For his third division, devoted to Mephistopheles, Liszt has evolved a pregnant and subtle psychology. Instead of setting up his arch-fiend in the clouds to declare his colossal impudence by hurling puny threats at Omnipotence as does Boito in his opera "Mefistofele," Liszt makes him the evil spirit of Faust's own life.

His psychology is better than his reduction of it to music. It would be curious and diverting after the innocent and amiable unsophistication of the Gretchen music, to hear a daring and riotous perversion of the Faust themes according to Liszt's plan for this movement, but with the exquisite keen-bladed satire and sardonic malevolence worthy of the prince of negation, and not with merely the lukewarmness of mischievous chatter.

And yet, strange to say, this music raised the devil with the organ. Yesterday afternoon shortly before the chorus was to sing, the noble instrument raised its voice in one prolonged, lusty note of protest. Mr Fiedler was obliged to stop the performance until the speaking tone could be stopped.

The final music of the male chorus lifts the hearer into a hight of quietude, serenity and contemplation far above the stress of the world. The choir from the Apollo club sang in all ways acceptably. Mr Rattigan performed the small solo part smoothly and with good intonation.

Mr Fiedler read the work throughout with care and spirit. He did much to give significance and color to waste places. The orchestra met the terrific difficulties of the work successfully.

Roger Ducasse, about whom the dictionaries are as yet reticent, was a pupil of Faure and, as the program book also says, was winner of the second "grand prize" at the Paris conservatory in 1902.

His new work is full of vivacity and nervous energy. The overture of the first movement is bright piquant and the best sustained in interest. The Bourree of the second movement is dainty, quaint and delicate.

A recitative and air with agreeable melody for clarinet and English horn and a somewhat stilted and pompous Minuet conclude.

BOSTON JOURNAL
APRIL 16, 1910.

CIPHER BLEATS IN MIDDLE OF SYMPHONY

Trouble With Organ Nearly Breaks Up Concert and Causes Titter.

APOLLO CLUB'S WORK PLEASES AUDIENCE

"Suite Francaise," Played for the First Time Here, Proves a Scholarly Composition.

A little cipher is a dangerous thing. It almost broke up the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. This particular "cipher," as organists call it when the organ blows itself, began with a plaintive bit of treble just before the second movement of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, the first number on this week's program. Conductor Fiedler gave an inquisitive look over toward Organist Marshall. A smile ran over the audience; then a titter. Finally Mr. Marshall withdrew, and so did the cipher.

But alas and alack, they both came back for the third and last movement. In the most impressive measures—in the famous tone picture which has been likened to the "rolling and shifting of clouds"—the cipher bleated out once again, and more plaintively than ever. Mr. Fiedler rapped sharply on his desk and the orchestra stopped. Such interruptions do not happen more than once in a dog's age. It sounded scandalous. The audience applauded Mr. Fiedler sympathetically as he hurried to and fro. Mr. Marshall withdrew again, and the symphony was resumed, this time continuing through to the end without more ado. The delay brought this first number to a close at just 4 o'clock—the latest intermission in recent years.

The performance, however, was splendid. The Apollo Club sang the "Alles Vergaengliche," which forms the conclusion of the work, in English—and sang it beautifully, as might have been expected. James T. Rattigan was the tenor soloist.

Roger Ducasse's "Suite Francaise," played for the first time on this side of the ocean, was the concluding number. It proved to be a scholarly and spirited composition.

Next week August Halm's symphony for string orchestra will be performed for the first time in America. Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will be the other numbers.

HERALD,
APRIL 17, 1910—

The Pops.

Gustav Strube will be the first conductor of the Pops, which begin at Symphony Hall on Monday evening, May 2. Mr. Strube says that he has secured some new and attractive music for the concerts, and of course all the latest musical successes will be presented on the programs. Andre Maquarre, who had such great success last year in his first season as conductor, will follow Mr. Strube.

Pension Fund Concert.

The second and last concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund will be given in Symphony Hall tonight. The prospects are that this second concert will show Symphony Hall filled to its utmost capacity, which is a matter of congratulation, for the Pension Fund which has been organized by the members of the orchestra and derives its chief support from the two concerts given each season, is not the least important factor in making the orchestra what it is.

The program is attractive, Mme. Sembrich has generously volunteered her services at great personal inconvenience, for she comes to Boston especially from the West and returns to the West after the concert. She will sing an aria and five songs with piano, bringing the programe to an end with the latter. The aria will be "Ernani Involami" from Verdi's "Ernani". Mr. La Forge accompanist, also gives his services. The songs will be Brahm's "Wie Melodien Zieht es mir"; Schumann's "Auftaege"; Strauss's "Allerseelen"; Jaques-Dalcroze's "L 'oiseau bleu"; and La Forge's "To a Messenger". Between the aria and the songs Mr. Fieldler has placed the "Devil's Villanelle" by Mr. Loeffler,. The first part of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The selections are the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; Prelude to "Parsifal" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser".

ADVERTISER.
APRIL 16, 1910

"FAUST" SYMPHONY AND A ROGER-DUCASSE SUITE

THESE MAKE UP THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Apollo Club Assists in the Liszt Work—A Couple of Mishaps During the Afternoon.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Liszt. "Faust" Symphony.
Roger-Ducasse. Suite Francaise.

The list looks short, but if the reader is at all acquainted with Liszt's "Faust" symphony he will know that this work is a concert in itself. It is not a work, however, that is holding its own. Compared with such a symphonic poem as "Les Preludes" it seems rather faded, but it is brilliant in tone coloring, ingenious in figure treatment and at times attractively melodic, at all events more so than many of the modern works of its size and scope.

The first movement, picturing Faust, is largely occupied with the ambitious and military side of his character, and does not dwell much upon his amatory entanglements. The second movement is the gem of the work, and portrays the simplicity and trustfulness of Marguerite or "Gretchen." Here there is directness of melodic structure and a tone-picture that is not only quite intelligible, but attractive as well. Metaphysics or Ethics enter into the third movement, which is devoted to Mephistopheles.

By a stroke of genius Liszt refrains from giving definite new figures to Satan, but evolves the greater part of the movement from parodies and mockeries of preceding themes of Faust. It is a vivid way of suggesting that Satan cannot construct but can only demolish. The pure and innocent themes of Gretchen are, however, beyond his power. The end brings in a chorus to words of Goethe, a fitting climax poetically, but not as great musically as some preceding portions of the work, being chiefly a "rechauffee" of the "Gretchen" theme.

There are many chromatic passages in the movement and much "obbligato." It is not welded together, but sounds rather heterogeneous. There is neither the Wagnerian beauty of "leit-motiven," nor their exquisite development, in the work.

But it must be borne in mind that Liszt was the pioneer. He was the precursor of many Wagnerian ideas. How much Wagner borrowed from him may easily be studied in this symphony. The Slumber music from "Die Walkure," the "St. John's Day" figure, from "Die Meistersinger," and many other acquaintances may here be met with. Per Contra, Liszt owes considerable to Berlioz. The whiff of purity (the "Gretchen" theme) in the midst of the Satanic atmosphere of the third movement, may have been caught from the religious theme of the monks which Berlioz introduces in the orgie of the Finale of the "Childe Harold" symphony, while the parody of lofty themes by Satan is a replica of the idea which dominates the finale of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The first movement was especially well played in the heroic touches. The "Gretchen" was dawdled a little and had as little backbone as a jelly-fish. Nevertheless its chief theme was beautifully interpreted. The counterpoint of the Finale was clearly defined and everything was going well, when—at the very climax—the organ began "ciphering." Possibly the instrument thought that, in a modern symphony, a few notes more or less made no great difference, and therefore started an improvised organ-point of its own. As a consequence there was a "lunga pausa" before the chorus could enter. A little later "the lights burned blue," or at least they went out, so that the Mephistopheles movement was full of appropriate pranks.

When the chorus did enter (it was a delegation from the Apollo club) after repairs had been made, it sang very steadily and beautifully, and the solo tenor, Mr. James H. Rattigan, gave a very artistic interpretation of his melodious numbers. But the contretemps must have been a terrific strain upon Mr. Fiedler, and it could not have happened at a worse moment. The audience tried to express its sympathy by much applause.

Roger Ducasse is a new name to Boston audiences, so new that it will be sought in vain in the latest Grove and Riemann biographical dictionaries. He is, as the name indicates, a Frenchman, and his composition is in the modern French school. Ducasse is quite a young Parisian and a pupil of Faure. He promises well. He has already won the second "Prix de Rome" and has composed some worthy orchestral pieces. But there is yet considerable difference between Dukas and Ducasse—the French might say that the latter is the feminine of the former.

The overture of the "Suite Francaise" was the best part of the work. It was melodious yet finely developed. We welcome a young Frenchman who does not drag us through the brambles and unfold unsolvable mysteries with each new composition. The Gallic love for the wood-wind instruments was made apparent in the first two movements. Piccolo and flute were especially prominent and especially well-played.

There was a Bourree that no Auvergnat could dance to, but it was bright and capricious music all the same. The Suite tapered off a trifle towards the end. Ducasse showed a mastery of the large orchestra, but every modern composer does that. No one nowadays dreams of writing even a Cradle-song without trombones, tubas, gong, cymbals, half a dozen kettle-drums, etc. The so-called "classical score" seems gone for good.

It may have been the mishaps of the concert, or it may have been the glitter and romance of the Liszt symphony, but the Suite on this occasion seemed something of an anti-climax. It may make a much better impression tonight. It is certainly good music.

[148]

BOSTON HERALD, APRIL 16, 1910.

MUSIC OF DUCASSE HEARD HERE FIRST

Suite Francaise, Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rehearsal, Has Been Given Nowhere Else in America.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Ducasse's Suite Francaise. The orchestra was assisted in Liszt's Symphony by members of the Apollo Club and James H. Rattigan, tenor.

Roger Ducasse's Suite was played for the first time in America. It is said that he is a step-son of Gabriel Faure and some hint at a closer relationship. However this may be, as a pupil of Faure, he took the second "Prix de Rome" in 1902. Small pieces by him have been performed in Paris during the last six years, but he blossomed out in 1909 when his Variations on a Serious Theme for orchestra were performed at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, and this Suite was played twice at a Colonne concert. The Variations will be heard here next Tuesday at Mrs. Hall's concert. Choruses by him were produced last month at a Lamoureux concert. With Faure, Aubert, Caplet, Hure, Koechlin, Ravel, Schmitt and others, he has recently founded the "Societe Musicale Independante," a society that purposes to give five concerts this season, beginning April 20, in which compositions for orchestra and chamber music will be played without regard to style or school. These concerts are especially for the benefit of young composers, but interesting works of the past will not be excluded.

This Suite contains an overture, a bourree, a recitative and air, and a minuet. The music is not pretentious. It seems as though the composer had endeavored to modernize in an extreme degree the archaic suite. The overture, for instance, begins with a pompous theme after the manner of Handel, but in the development of the theme Ducasse is soon ultra-modern in harmonic progressions and general spirit. Nor has the Bourree the rough and stamping character of the old dance. The chief theme is rather delicate and the treatment and the instrumentation are carefully searched out. These two movements are the most distinguished of the four.

The recitative was played without marked expression by the first clarinet. The air, written preferably for an oboe d'amore, but given in the absence of this instrument to the English horn, is suave. The continuation of this air admits of more expressive treatment than it received. The finale, a minuet, has some pleasant pages, but as a whole it is too mannered, and the changes in tempo—15-8, 11-8, 7-4 and 5-4—do not add to the effect. The chief feature of this suite is its instrumentation. In the minuet there are singularly effective passages for trumpet.

The performance of Liszt's Symphony was seriously marred by the unruly behavior of the organ, which ciphered badly, once in the extraordinary passage which Wagner stole with both hands and without remorse. There was added irony in the fact that a workman was at the time in the organ to ensure a perfect performance.

The interruption and delay were annoying to the conductor and the audience, and the effect of the symphony was impaired thereby. Nevertheless the music made a profound impression and the audience was demonstrative in appreciation.

The symphony was an extraordinary work at the time it was written, and it is still extraordinary in structure, in poetic thought, and in charm and brilliance of expression. It led the way to the ultra-modern symphony. It furnished thematic and harmonic material to many now held up as great, especially to Wagner. Not only are there reminiscences of Liszt's music in "The Valkyrie" and in "Parsifal," but the manner of Liszt—manner, not mannerisms—influenced Wagner profoundly, as it influenced Franck and Saint-Saens. The "Faust" symphony, misunderstood and neglected as it was for years, even today not fully appreciated by many and openly flouted by hidebound conservatives, made possible the music of the present that is of real value.

Furthermore, in this "Faust" Symphony there is true characterization without a minute and impertinent program. The movement "Faust" is deeply thoughtful, philosophic, yet restless with the restlessness that cannot find satisfaction in this world. "Gretchen" is not only beautiful and pathetic as music; it typifies the qualities of womanhood that have made Goethe's heroine stand apart enskied from her sisters. In "Mephistopheles" there is no vulgar pantomime music, no music for a devil to appear through a trap door, no shrill whistling on the fingers and no Meyerbeerian pomp of brass as in Boito's "Mefistofele"; but the metamorphoses of Faust's themes are the expression of the Spirit that denies the fiend's archhook. Especially ironical is the transformation of Faust's triumphal motive that is given in its glory to the brass and afterward debased in the dust.

There is perhaps a time in the life of every concert-goer when he judges Liszt by music that has pseudo-grandeur, a species of sentimental religious feeling, and a naivete that is artificial. As years go by the concert-goer learns to differentiate between Liszt the virtuoso and Liszt the artist, as by reading the volumes of Liszt's correspondence that have been published lately he learns to respect and admire the man himself, eager for the welfare of others, unselfish, generous with time, influence and his purse. The years go by and the fame of Liszt grows more and more brilliant. Surely the composer of the "Faust" Symphony must be ranked beyond doubt and peradventure with the immortals.

The members of the Apollo Club gave excellent assistance in the final mystical chorus.

MONITOR,
APRIL 23, 1910.

FIEDLERS TO SAIL EARLY NEXT MAY

Mr. and Mrs. Max Fiedler sail for Germany on Thursday, May 5, from New York. They will go directly to their home in Hamburg, where they expect to be until late in the summer, when they will probably go to some watering place on the seashore to spend a holiday of a month or so.

They plan to sail for this country on Sept. 20, which will bring them to Boston on Sept. 27. Willy Hess and his three daughters sail on May 4 for Hamburg and they go direct to Berlin, for Mr. Hess' duties as the head of the violin department of the Royal Academy of Music begin this spring, and he will spend the greater part of the summer in Berlin teaching.

BOSTON GLOBE—APRIL 17, 1910.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Pension Fund Concert This Evening.

Why Fund Was Formed, What It Has Done for Symphony Men.

"Trovatore" at the Opera House—Current Gossip.

The second and last concert for the benefit of the Boston symphony orchestra pension fund is to be given tonight, and the prospects are that Symphony hall will be filled, which is a matter of congratulation. The pension fund, which has been organized by the members of the orchestra and derives its chief support from the two concerts given each season, is not the least important factor in making the orchestra what it is, one of the best in the world.

The fund, which was started in the season of 1903-04, is derived from three sources, the special Sunday night concerts by the orchestra, quarterly dues paid by the men and gifts from friends. Of the latter between three and four thousand dollars have been contributed.

At the establishment of the fund it was arranged that by paying up the equivalent of 10 years' dues the members of the orchestra at that time could then become entitled to its benefits in the event of disability or other cause to prevent further active service. Elligibility at the present time consists in having served 10 years as a member of the orchestra with no delinquency in the payment of dues.

Pensions are paid only when a man is incapacitated for further service and is honorably retired. The amount of his pension is proportionate in size to the length of his term of active membership. A member having played for 25 years will naturally receive a larger pension when retired than one who has served but 10. There are 15 pensions now being paid from this fund.

The management of the orchestra endeavors to give contracts to the men of from 36 to 40 weeks, and to provide summer engagements in so far as is feasible. This makes possible the longest season of any orchestra in America. In addition to the 24 pairs of concerts played at home, there are the five trips south and one west.

There are "extra" engagements arranged for the men, as for the band of 50 or thereabouts, which, under Mr Strube's direction, accompanies eminent singers or plays incidental music [illegible] as at the Ben Greet performances of "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "The Tempest." There [illegible] Pops"—this year to last [illegible]—which furnish employ-

Perhaps to some orchestral musicians, a chair in the Boston symphony orchestra is the pinnacle of worldly glory and emolument. The honor of membership is gratifying, but man cannot live upon honor alone. While salaries commensurate with the commercial value of such service, are paid, it is difficult for an orchestral player to save any great proportion of his earnings.

Furthermore, an objectionable feature in this career is its short duration. The average length of time in which a man is able to hold and retain his efficiency in this orchestra is from 20 to 25 years. This applies more particularly to the strings.

The tremendous demands of modern music upon the embouchure of the horn player today reduces the period of his practical usefulness to from 15 to 20 years, which is a generous limit.

With a rehearsal four mornings of the week and concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the greater part of the musician's time is consumed by the orchestra and its requirements. There is no restriction placed upon the teaching which the members do privately, but the playing for balls is prohibited and outside playing in general must first gain consent of the manaiement.

Perhaps the most pathetic feature of the life of a man who devotes his best years to aid in upbuilding and maintaining the prestige of such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra is the fact that when his term of usefulness is over he is fitted for little else. He may teach, but there is comparatively little demand for the teacher of the oboe, the bassoon, the horn and other brass, and the more the pity that it be true.

To help solve the problem of caring for the men of the orchestra who have served through the prime of life and are retired, the pension fund has been established. No part of the orchestra's yearly calendar is so deserving of interest and patronage.

The program tonight is very attractive, all the more so since Mme Sembrich has generously volunteered her services at great personal inconvenience, for she comes to Boston especially from the west and returns to the west after the concert.

She will sing an aria and five songs with piano, bringing the program to an end with the latter. The aria will be the famous "Ernani Involami," from Verdi's "Ernani," one of the bravura pieces which she has made quite her own. In her songs she will have as accompanist Mr F. La Forge, who is also giving his services.

The songs will be Brahms' "Wie Melodien zieht es mir," Schumann's "Auftrage," Strauss' "Allerseelen," Jacques-Dalcroze's "L'Oiseau Bleu" and F. La Forge's "To a Messenger."

Between the aria and the songs Mr Fiedler has placed the "Devil's Villanelle," by Mr Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the most admired composers of this city and for many years a member of the orchestra. The first part of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The selections are the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," prelude to "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Symphony Concert Season Closes After Next Week.

For the first time in six years patrons of the Symphony concerts this week will hear Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote." It was played in February, 1904, by Mr Gericke and has not been repeated since. "Don Quixote" was written in 1897, thus falling between "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and "Ein Heldenleben," and it had its first performance in Cologne March 8, 1898, under Franz Wullner. The first performance in the United States was by the Chicago orchestra under Theodore Thomas, Jan 7, 1899.

The first number on the program will be a novelty, not only to Boston but so far as is known to America. It is a symphony in D-minor for string orchestra, a short piece, by August Haln. The second part of the program will be devoted to Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the overture, nocturne, scherzo and "Wedding March."

The last program of the year will bring Mr Fiedler's second performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony, in which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia society and a quartet comprised of Mme Hissem de Moss soprano, Miss Margaret Keyes contralto, Mr Bernard von Norden tenor and Mr Frederick Weld bass.

Symphony Hall "Pops."

Gustav Strube wil be the first conductor of the "pops," which begin in Symphony hall Monday evening, May 2. Mr Strube says that he has secured some new and very attractive music for the concerts and of course, many of the latest musical "successes" will be represented on the programs. Mr Andre Maquarre, who had such great success last year in his first season as conductor, will follow Mr Strube.

BOSTON HERALD,
APRIL 18, 1910.

OVATION TO SEMBRICH.

Audience at Symphony Orchestra Concert Enthusiastic in Applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Symphony Hall last evening in aid of its pension fund. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Mme. Sembrich, who had generously offered her services for the occasion, was the soloist.

The program was as follows: Wagner, Preludes to "The Mastersingers," "Lohengrin," "Parsifal," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," overture to "Tannhaeuser"; Verdi, aria, "Ernani Involami," from "Ernani"; Loeffler, "The Devil's Villanelle" (organist, Mr. Marshall); songs with piano—Brahms, "Wie Melodien"; Schumann, "Auftraege"; Strauss, "Allerseelen"; Jaques-Dalcroze, "L'Oiseau Bleu"; La Forge, "To a Messenger." Mr. La Forge played the piano accompaniments.

The public, always generous in support of these concerts, had responded last evening in such numbers that the hall was crowded; for besides the interest in the orchestra and its pension fund, there was a general eagerness to hear Mme. Sembrich before she made her threatened final departure from our concert stage.

The program was so oddly arranged, beginning with the Wagner preludes and ending with the group of songs, that it gave the impression of two complete concerts of different natures. It was a happy circumstance, however, that Mme. Sembrich should have ended the concert by singing these songs—to which she added others—for her performance of them was wholly delightful and characteristic. Mr. La Forge played admirable accompaniments.

The occasion was not one that calls for critical comment, for it was a scene of enthusiasm that rose steadily to a climax. The greeting accorded the singer was full of grateful cordiality; a personal atmosphere was quickly established, and was intensified by the intimate nature of the group of songs and by the graceful informality of the singer. The scene at the end of the concert was an unusual one, for the final applause, usually perfunctory, was one of tumult and shouting.

Prudent suburban dwellers, in reckless oblivion of the last train, remained in their places and the singer was recalled again and again, and was prevailed upon to add several encore numbers. The orchestra joined its tribute to that of the audience, rising as Mme. Sembrich was recalled. The interchange of courtesy and good will may well have been gratifying to both singer and orchestra.

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 18, 1910

FOR PENSION FU[illegible]

Symphony Orchestra G[illegible] Notable Concert.

Mme Sembrich Given an O[illegible] and Flowers in Profusi[illegible]

An audience which filled Symp[illegible] hall to the last seat and the [illegible] room along the outer aisles [illegible] the last pension fund concert of [illegible] season last night and heartily ap[illegible] plauded Mme Sembrich, [illegible] and the men.

Mme Sembrich was given a re[illegible] tion, not the least sign of wh[illegible] a huge basket of american [illegible] roses too large for her to [illegible] a bouquet of the same flowe[illegible] filled her arms.

Mr Fiedler had arranged [illegible] program close with a group [illegible] by Mme Sembrich as a [illegible] the inevitable demands for [illegible] which would stay all further [illegible] At its conclusion the audi[illegible] mained seated, with no [illegible] thought of anything else t[illegible] clapping of hands. The men [illegible] the orchestra remained in the [illegible] to a man, Mr Fiedler in the c[illegible] leading in the applause.

It was an impressive sight, [illegible] of good-fellowship and eager [illegible] tion of pleasure had been [illegible] the air throughout the evening [illegible] shown itself in the cordial [illegible] tion both to band and conductor, [illegible] it came now to its fullest [illegible]

Mme Sembrich returned to [illegible] form time after time, both wi[illegible] La Forge, her accompanist, and [illegible] him, until finally the audience [illegible] three additional songs and [illegible] no less grateful than the singer [illegible] happy to grant them. They were [illegible] Open Secret," by Huntington Wo[illegible] the waltz "Primavera," by [illegible] Strauss, ever associated with [illegible] Sembrich, and finally "The Year [illegible] the Spring," by Mrs Beach.

Mme Sembrich had made a long [illegible] ney from the west to give her s[illegible] at this pension fund concert, [illegible] tribute paid her both by orchestr[illegible] audience will remain a memorab[illegible] beautiful one.

In this day of haste to declaim [illegible] and moods upon the lyric stage [illegible] even in the recital of songs, to im[illegible] them by the employment of [illegible] which include almost anything [illegible] everything but the knowledge [illegible] to sing—in such a time, it is [illegible] hear an artist who after the [illegible] which Mme Sembrich has enjoyed [illegible] still produce a tone which has [illegible] can measure the curve of a phras[illegible] keep the beauty of its contour, an[illegible] use these means of singing as we[illegible] an ardent temperament and a [illegible] cious personality to interpret a s[illegible]

The orchestra played with an u[illegible] zest and brilliance, while Mr Fi[illegible] conducted with a marked displa[illegible] emotional quality.

The five Wagnerian preludes [illegible] given below, were a thoroughly [illegible] able group. There were templ[illegible] were reason for surprise at time[illegible] the beauty of the tone quality [illegible] orchestra has not recently been [illegible] apparent.

The program may be summar[illegible] follows: The orchestra played the [illegible] ludes to "The Mastersingers of N[illegible] berg," to "Lohengrin," to "Tristan [illegible] Isolda" with the Love Death fro[illegible] same), and to "Parsifal" and the [illegible] ture to "Tannhauser," all by Richard Wagner. The orchestra also played "The Devil's Villanelle," by Mr Loeffler.

Mme Sembrich sang these songs: [illegible] "Ernani involami," from Ernani (with orchestra); Wie Melodien zieht es mir," Brahms; "Ruftraege," Schumann; "Allerseelen," Strauss; "L'oiseau bleu," Jaques-Dalcroze, and the "To a Messenger," by Mme Sembrich's admirable accompanist, Frank La Forge.

Loeffler and Strauss Head Symphony Programs

An Ultra-Modern's Appreciation of Music of Today and Yesterday—Strauss as Seen by Various Contemporaries

This evening at the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Charles M. Loeffler's "Villanelle du Diable" will figure on the programme. This singular piece has caught the public fancy as no other composition of Mr. Loeffler's. In addition to the phantasy and the characteristic subtlety of the composer's style, there are the incisive rhythms, the clear-cut ideas, the bristling instrumentation. The piece, as we now know well, is inspired by verses of Rollinat, and it is a fascinating expression of one side of the composer's mentality.

From that corner of the world known as Medfield, Mass., Mr. Loeffler has put the sharpest of wedges into modern musical progress. There is no more conscious composer of conscious music today. If Mr. Loeffler were accused of taking an attitude in his very ingenious scores, he would in all probability answer, "Of course."

In a recent conversation he made passing mention of his artistic creed: A composer constructs and perfects an individual style only after long and patient research, and assimilation of music of all schools. Original expression comes as the result of the most careful forethought. The fact that such poets as Verlaine and Baudelaire were persecuted for their ultra-sophistication and their fear of the obvious is the strongest possible proof of their supremacy as artists.

Yet Mr. Loeffler does not put Richard Strauss in the highest rank as a composer, and this chiefly because Strauss is not a born creator of beautiful themes. In this Strauss is far behind Wagner, and even Weber. "Weber," said Mr. Loeffler, "who as a composer is not particularly congenial to me, has written some perfectly tremendous melodies—melodies which are as great today as on the day they were written—before Wagner, before Liszt, before Berlioz, before Strauss. And then, when does Strauss attain what may be called the ecstacy of music. Wagner is continually nourished by such inspiration—the ecstasy of passion in 'Tristan,' the ecstasy of humor in 'Die Meistersinger.' The day is not far off when Strauss will be by no means as astonishing as he is today. Think of how we advance. 'Tristan and Isolde'—what young musician of the present generation does not love it and live in it? Yet when that music was first heard it was considered impossible. Berloz said to Wagner, 'We are good friends, but I do not understand you.' Who does not understand 'Tristan' nowadays? Soon Strauss will be quite as great a composer of music."

Then Mr. Loeffler spoke of Debussy. A man, he says, who has surely more acute perceptions of nature than almost anyone living, as well as an amazing faculty for putting such perceptions on paper. "If it were possible to hear the grass growing, I am sure Debussy would have long since set it to music." Unfortunately, perhaps, Debussy's artistic realm is small, though of wondrous beauty within its limits. As for "Pelleas et Melisande," it is Debussy's good fortune that his musical idiom fits so well with Macterlinck's philosophy and prose. You could take, says Mr. Loeffler, any of the good small pieces, such as the piano piece, "Reflets dans L'Eau" and others, stick them into the score of "Pelleas," and the difference would be hardly perceptible.

Where Debussy is impressionistic, D'Indy is constructive. That man is a fanatic, a figure of the 14th century, a Torquemada, whose zeal for the cause is all-consuming, for he will write ugly music in the cause of righteousness. And it is at D'Indy's School, the Schola Cantorum, that the students in compositions are taught to analyze a theme for its possibilities, before setting out on the thorny symphonic path. They examine their themes as they might the spots in a potato under a magnifying glass. But it is chiefly Franck and D'Indy, up to date, who have been successful in writing symphonies in the cyclical form.

"Certainly modern music is amazing," said Mr. Loeffler, "but do you know the music of the fifth or sixth centuries? I question whether any greater music has been written since. Of course, there have been many developments in form and means of expression since then. Bach came, Bach, the great architect. He said 'I must have a beam here, a support here,' etc. He built his marvelous tonal edifices, and happy to say, this greatest of modern musicians did not lose his heart in the process. Mozart and Haydn, great formalists—especially the latter, came on the scene. Then Beethoven, who opened new mental and spiritual windows for the writers of music. Since that day, we all know the remarkable rapidity with which music has progressed.

"I have an advantage over all of the younger men, though, in my schooling. There is too little real knowledge and appreciation of Mozart today. You want to be hurt by the intensity of present-day music. The way will come when a small and perfect work of Mozart will mean more than all of the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Mozart should be studied with the utmost attention. Of course he had his weakness. He was one of the facile composers, and when he was at loss for an idea, simply ran up and down scales. But, on the other hand, his originality is often astounding. You may turn over 20 pages and slam the book together. At that moment I may say, 'but look here. This could have happened yesterday.'" He went to the piano and commenced to play the famous passage which accompanies the appearance of the statue in "Don Giovanni."

"Mozart is greatest in his operas. He is unexcelled as a dramatist." And when it was objected that even in his operas Mozart was the slave of formulas of his period the reply was: "And if Shakspere were writing plays today I suppose you would reproach him for using the word 'and' so many hundred times."

Haydn was perhaps a greater man than is commonly supposed. For one thing he was great enough at one time to break through his environment and see a foreign land—England. Thus he benefited himself enormously. This, no doubt, was also pretty remarkable for the clarifying and the development of Wagner's transcendent genius. There was Schumann, who was the very flower of all that was best in the German spirit, spoiled by a mediocrity—Mendelssohn. "Can you think of it? Schumann was kneeling at Mendelssohn's feet. Mendelssohn was kind enough, and he exerted all his learning and his will to keep his erratic friend in the strait and narrow path of musical righteousness. But how often did he say to himself, 'If I had only thought of that?'"

Mr. Loeffler, who has just recovered from a serious illness, is now composing at Medfield, but he will not tell what.

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," will be played at the Symphony concerts of this week. The work has been heard once in this city, in 1904, under Mr. Gericke. It was then violently discussed and criticised. The piece was first performed at Cologne in 1898. Of all Strauss' tone poems, it is probably the least known and the least generally appreciated. How will it sound to us, now that we know the "Heldenleben," the "Sinfonia Domestica" and the ne plus ultra "Elektra"?

It may here be said that Mr. Loeffler thinks highly of many pages of "Elektra." He believes, moreover, that Strauss, who remained for many years a traditionist at bottom, has in "Elektra" finally thrown off the shackles of previously acquired learning and spoken for himself. The position that "Don Quixote" holds among the symphonic poems is not unparalleled by the place of "Elektra" in music-drama. Both represent the apparent limits of descriptive art in music; both dispense with sensuous beauty without a thought, provided only that the passages be faithful to dramatic or psychological requirements. Both again summon up the dread question of esthetics: How far lie the legitimate boundaries of one art as opposed to those of the kindred arts?

Strauss calls his sublimely audacious composition, "Don Quixote" (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale); Fantastical Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character." His orchestra consists of the customary strings, 1 piccolo, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 1 contra-bassoon, 6 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tenor tuba, bass tuba, harp, tympani, cymbals, large and small drum, triangle, tambourine and the windmachine. Like other composers, notably D'Indy in his "Istar" variations, Boecklin in his Boecklin symphony and Elgar's "Enigma," Strauss has written variations—such variations as had not been heard of before. And like Berlioz, Strauss is old-fashioned enough to use certain instruments for his "fixed ideas." The chief solo instrument, the "cello," personates the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance. The viola, the bass clarinet and the tenor-tuba portray Sancho Panza. Strauss in his introduction consisting of themes symbolizing chivalry, the ideal woman, and so forth, depicts the state of the Knight's mind as he peruses volumes of chivalry. Presently the bizarre harmonies, resolving in unexpected resolutions, reveal the Knight's madness. The Theme, or Themes, are now stated, those of the Knight, the misguided idealist, and his brutish, matter-of-fact associate. In the first variation the thought of Dulcinea del Toboso inspires the Knight to the famous attack on the windmills. Variation II treats of the celebrated battle with the hosts of Alifonfaron, when the Knight charges the sheep amid a chorus of baas from the muted brass. Variation III—Knight and Squire discuss the ethics of chivalry as opposed to those of the fleshpot. Variation IV—The Don Quixote attacks some pilgrims passing with an image of the Virgin, and is beaten senseless. Variation V—The Knight's Vigil—Scorning sleep, Quixote rests on his arms, muses upon chivalry and is finally rewarded by a vision of Dulcinea. Variation VI—The Meeting with Dulcinea. The tambourine is heard as a common country wench comes walking down the road. Sancho persuades the Don that this is indeed Dulcinea, enchanted. Variation VII—The Flight Through the Air. The pair are seated upon two wooden horses, blindfolded. They believe, as a great wind comes up, that they are going very far and very fast. The wind-machine is here employed for the first time in orchestral music. The flutes sail up and down chromatic passages, but the fixed tremolo of the basses means that the travellers are still on the earth. Variation VIII is the adventure of the enchanted bark, which ultimately tips over, drenching the travellers. Variation IX—The Battle With the Two Magicians. Two harmless monks whom the Don attacks and routs. Variation X—The Battle with the Knight of the White Moon. The finale treats of the Knight's return to reason, as he realizes the emptiness of all his former projects, and his death.

"Richard Strauss," said James Huneker, "is a man of genius; perverse, tumultuous, radical, morbid, bitten by wrong-headed theories—yet a genius." And this of "Don Quixote": "The variations on that famous journey are rung out in a fashion that would have set roaring the great Spaniard, and even mystify the most faithful Straussolaters. And now the reign of the characteristic, the veristic, is declared; beauty in an objective sense does not exist. To be beautiful, music must be true. The old decorative pattern, handpainted and glazed, has had its day. It stands yonder in the curio cabinet. Beethoven smashed the classical mould into huge fragments, and since his day men have been breaking these fragments as their individual fancy dictated. The only rule to be observed was the rule of symmetry, or let us call it euphony. Wagner is euphonious; he seldom makes ugly music. Strauss often does. When a situation in his ideal libretto calls for cacaphony, he gives it. Does Till Eulenspiegel ride over the dames—we hear the screams, curses and clattering of things falling. The Strauss scores are full of evil smells. He hesitates at nothing, not even depravity. A very Rabelais among composers; his laughter is gross, but often mirthless. It is a mask: a wonderful miming: cerebral and not truly from the belly. The decadent, as he is now called, decomposes the page into the paragraph, the paragraph into the sentence, the word, the letter. Strauss, whose analytical powers amount to sheer genius, strips, peels and scrapes apart the psychological pulp of Don Quixote and his porcine squire. The 10 variations are astonishing feats of the scalpel. Nothing like Don Quixote has ever been encountered in musical literature; even those breath-catching devices of Brahms in the Paganini variations, Op. 35, seem elemental in phantasy when confronted with Opus 35 of Strauss. Every phrase in the latter has its meaning; perhaps too obvious a meaning for such of us who delight in the more suggestive adumbrations of musical language. But the power, the humor, hellish in its malice at times; the evocation of soul, of landscape, of reality, are all phenomenal. Here music is the slave of a will as strong as Milton's Satan. It is twisted into shapes abhorrent to its inherent genius, and made to speak, eloquently and hideously, in divers tongues. It is new, a more passionately expressive art, but much of its fabled loveliness has been wrung from it in the transformation."

"Was not this said of Beethoven's ninth symphony, 'Tristan and Isolde'? All but the most rabid disciples have left the Strauss banners, and there has been revived in Berlin the old gossip about the delicate adjustment of the composer's mentality. This is foolish. Strauss is sane, none saner; but his sanity is not the sanity of a man in the market place, nor of them that go down to the churches in drab. A brilliant apparition in the firmament of art, a poet, a thinker, an overman—what his significance will be a quarter of a century hence none may say. May he not be the new messiah for a new evangel, of which Liszt, Berlioz, Richard Wagner and Franz Liszt were only the forerunners? Strauss derives from all three, yet is Richard Strauss withal. Or, he may be but the musical analogue of that strange monster in the book mentioned in the fourth book of Rabelais. This monster was of an amazing appearance, with its windmill wings, its crimson plumes, carbuncle eyes, emerald ears, topaz teeth, and wearing on its neck a gold collar with a strange long inscription. Furthermore, as it flew through the air it cried all the while, 'Carnival! Carnival! Carnival!' But whatever is the zoology of this strange Strauss, he cannot be dismissed with the shrug of a Hanslick. He is here, he is making tremendous music, and he must be accorded the historical precedent. Unlike other modern composers, he may be fabricating a new art. Let us endeavor to understand his message, to interpret his tonal hieroglyphics."

Pension Fund Concert

The second and last concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund is to be given in Symphony Hall tonight.

Madame Sembrich, who comes to Boston especially from the West, and returns to the West after the concert, will sing an aria and five songs with piano. The aria will be the famous "Ernani Involami" from Verdi's "Ernani." The songs will be Brahms' "Wie Melodien zieht es mir," Schumann's "Auftraege," Strauss' "Allerseelen," Jacques-Dalcroze's "L'oiseau bleu" and F. La Forge's "To a Messenger". Between the aria and the songs Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Devil's Villanelle," by Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the most admired composers of this city and many years a member of the orchestra. The first part of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The selections are the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," prelude to "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser".

The Pops

Gustav Strube will be the first conductor of the Pops which begin at Symphony Hall on Monday evening, May 2. Mr. Strube says that he has secured some new and very attractive music for the concerts and of course all the latest musical successes will be represented on the programmes. Mr. Andre Maquarre, who had such great success last year in his first season as conductor, will follow Mr. Strube.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 18, 1910

PENSION FUND CONCERT THOROUGHLY ENJOYED

MME. SEMBRICH DELIGHTED THE LARGE AUDIENCE

Orchestra Was Brilliant in a Varied Programme of Wagner Music and Loeffler's Rondo.

By Louis C. Elson.

The Pension Fund of our Symphony Orchestra must have received a considerable accession to its coffers yesterday evening, for Mme. Sembrich cooperated with the orchestra on this occasion and the concert was as much vocal as instrumental. The placing of a group of songs, with piano accompaniment, at the very end of the programme, was a direct incentive for the encore-fiend to do his best—or worst—and the programme was prolonged in saeculn-saeculorum.

On such an occasion it is not etiquette to speak of any shortcomings, or even of any preferences between soloist and orchestra, since everyone, from cymbalist to prima donna and conductor, are working for a beneficent cause. It would be as much out of taste to animadvert as to speak of hemp in a family where a member had been recently hanged.

But, were the ban lifted, one could glow with enthusiasm over this concert. It began with a number of Wagnerian Preludes and an overture. The "Mastersingers," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," (with the "Love Death" thrown in as Lagniappe,) and "Parsifal," were all represented by "Vorspiele," and "Tannhaeuser" by its overture. How these were given by our orchestra under its honored conductor no reader of these columns needs to be told; yet the "Tannhaeuser" overture won an exceptional success, the orchestra being obliged to rise twice to acknowledge frenzied applause.

Besides this there came that Satanic Villanelle that Mr. Loeffler has scored so brilliantly, showing that the devil walks about even on Sunday nights. The remarkable and effective reiteration of this rondo made its usual powerful impression upon the audience.

But the audience was chiefly interested in Sembrich, and this vocalist did not spare herself on this occasion. Her display piece was the time-honored "Ernani Involami," but her later appearance in a group of songs by Brahms, Schumann, Strauss, etc., was the culminating point of her work. Among these was also a charming composition by her excellent accompanist, Mr. Frank La Forge. We have often spoken of the excellent musical attainments of this gentleman and it is pleasant to note that he is as remarkable as a composer as an accompanist. His work was encored and an aftermath of song crowned the concert which was made to extend considerably beyond the limits set down by the printed programme.

It was a very pleasant occasion altogether and here we may alter the proverb and state that Charity covered a multitude of Sings!

The audience was the largest that has recently attended one of these concerts and the enthusiasm fervid and constant. Mme. Sembrich's great reputation was undoubtedly responsible for much of the great throng.

BOSTON JOURNAL, APRIL 18, 1910.

SEMBRICH SINGS TO BIG PENSION FUND

Ovation for Noted Artist at Symphony's Benefit Concert.

Marcella Sembrich and Richard Wagner were the magnets that drew a big audience to Symphony Hall last night. The occasion was the second and last pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra. Financially and artistically it was one of the most successful concerts on record. Every seat was taken and there was a fringe of standees on the floor. The concert was due to end about ten o'clock, but the Sembrich devotees kept their favorite encoring and tripping back and forth until 10.30. It was an extraordinary demonstration of popular esteem, every whit deserved; for, despite little traces of waning physical power, Mme. Sembrich's artistry is still incomparably beautiful.

The concert began with a short Wagnerian festival. Four preludes from "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde" and "Parsifal"—the "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture were in this division of the program. Mr. Fiedler was in one of his most enthusiastic moods, and the playing of the orchestra was stirring indeed. After the "Tannhaeuser" number the audience was not content to applaud Mr. Fiedler. The orchestra had to stand up. This was not the least of the well-merited tributes of the evening.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle," bizarre and dramatic, was the other orchestral selection. Mr. Fiedler, looking around while the applause was volleying down the hall, failed to see the distinguished young composer sitting back in a P. But Mr. Loeffler got his congratulations as he moved to the door after the concert, sharing the late honors with the charming cantatrice.

Mme. Sembrich sang first, with orchestra, an aria from Verdi's "Ernani," the "Ernani involami," and later, accompanied by Frank La Forge, she gave a group of songs with piano—"Wie Melodien zieht es mir," by Brahms; Schumann's "Auftraege," Richard Strauss' "Allerseelen," Jacques Dalcroze's "L'Oiseau bleu" and the admired accompanist's own pretty love song, "To a Messenger." The effect of all this was fairly captivating. In fact, after the La Forge song very few left the hall. It required three encores to lift the spell sufficiently to enable most of the enthusiasts to tear themselves away; and even then some were left applauding hopefully. They did not understand, apparently, that the singer had come all the way from the Middle West to keep the engagement and that she was then pale with fatigue.

The encores were Huntington Woodman's "An Open Secret," then Johann Strauss' "Primavera" waltz song, and last of all another song of spring by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 18, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A SPIRITED CONCERT FOR THE PENSION FUND

With Wagner and Mme. Sembrich for Rivals in It—A Sequence of His Preludes and Her Airs and Songs—The Orchestra and the Conductor "on Edge"—Their Eloquence, the Night Before, in Liszt's "Faust" Symphony—Mr. Loeffler's Opinions of Some of His Celebrated Contemporaries—Resignations from the Symphony Orchestra—Miss Garden's Future—The Omnipresent Russians

Truly our musical ways here in Boston are not as the ways of other cities. In Germany, where audiences are much enduring and love cumbrous musical schemes, a programme that listed five of Wagner's preludes in succession, would seem anomalous and ill-ordered; Mr. Wood in London even in the years of his most zealous propaganda never dared such a sequence; New York from the days of Thomas to the days of Toscanini has never heard such a one. Yet here in Boston, Dr. Muck not only made such a list, but added to it the overtures to "Rienzi" and to "The Flying Dutchman" and twice played it triumphantly to overflowing audiences at concerts for the Pension Fund. Mr. Fiedler forebore the two earliest overtures last night, and ran an irregular course through the preludes to "Die Miestersinger," "Lohengrin," "Tristan" and "Parsifal" to the overture to "Tannhäuser." Again the occasion was a concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, and again Symphony Hall was filled to the last seat. Of course, Mme. Sembrich, the singer of the night helped to fill it; but the five preludes surely did their share. The audience listened to them with a rapt and responsive intentness that they never gain in their proper place in the opera house; and at the end of each, the applause was quick, long and hearty. Twice, when the group was done, Mr. Fiedler had to call his men to their feet; and the contrast was sharp between the response of the audience to these preludes and to Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "The Devil's Round" that stood later on the programme. Mr. Loeffler's music is still caviare to the general; the average hearer only understands and feels it vaguely. The individual idiom, the sincere sophistication of it still baffles him. But Wagner such an audience—and it represented all sorts of musical and social conditions in this town—knows, enjoys, applauds with all its heart. And yet our over-Italian purveyors of opera say there is no public for German pieces in Boston. There is, and the most intelligent public musically that it contains.

The line of eminent singers and virtuosi, who have sung or played for the Pension Fund, often at no little inconvenience to themselves, lengthens—Mme. Melba and Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Elman, and last night, Mme. Sembrich in her new freedom from operatic exactions. As she came upon the stage, she fairly glowed with the pleasure of generous purpose at last realized and with the happy excitement of the occasion. She sang the familiar show-piece from "Ernani" and to an accompaniment that showed that our orchestra is much less versed in old Italian than in German opera. She sang the air to a brilliancy that if it was not effortless, was still conquering. The audience covered her with applause; while a grateful orchestra, for once surveying the house complacently, almost buried her in its basket and bunch of roses. Mme. Sembrich skipped, as she has not skipped since the days in which she used to send her Rosina or her Marie tripping off the stage. She returned in as high spirits for her songs; two or three of them were the playful trifles that her artistry and her own sprightliness and insinuation of mood glorify; another was Strauss's setting of the passionate longing, the wistful recollection of "Allerseelen" and Mme. Sembrich's singing of it still searches the heart; another still was Brahms's "Wie Melodien," and Mme. Sembrich's middle tones are yet soft, sustained and lovely. The rest showed the effort the air from "Ernani" had cost her; but with her extra pieces—for the audience was insistent as ever—she warmed again, and the evening ended as gayly as it had begun. Now, a gay Sunday evening in a public place in Boston is a rarely pleasurable thing.

It is the way of the orchestra to be "on edge" at the concerts for the Pension Fund, and last night, besides, the audience was stimulatingly numerous. Mr. Fiedler is as sensitive as a fine barometer to the receptive atmosphere around him. Last night it was very receptive indeed; he clearly felt it the moment in which he began the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; and he swept his men through it with the briskness of pace, the larger and the larger sonorities, the sinewy counterpoint, the glowing richness of tone that makes the music one of his show pieces. The other day Mr. Toscanini was all for the fineness of strand in the prelude, for its voice of romance, for its sheer abstract tonal beauty. Mr. Fiedler is all for its sinewy Teutonic strength and heartiness and energetic eloquence. The conductor and his men passed to the prelude to "Lohengrin," show-piece these many years for the precision, the luminosity, the songfulness of our strings; the wood-winds were as songful as they last night; and the shimmering path of the descending Grail was so the richer in tonal glow, albeit Mr. Fiedler, in his love for contrast, plunged it into a very tumultuous earth. But from end to end, the music was beautifully sustained, while in the prelude to "Parsifal" Mr. Fiedler fell away into his love for the impassioned phrase. Never was the cry of Amfortas more anguished and more nerve-racking; and never was the brass choir richer with the sonorous harmonies of the Knights; but the whole was episodic and so, perhaps, the more neurotic. Those who will have it that the writing of music ceased with Wagner, taunt Strauss with incessant play upon his hearers' nerves. They forget, therein, the prelude to "Parsifal" and its reiterated anguish.

The violoncellos, now a choir to match the first violins, had their turn in the fragment of "Parsifal"; they became as the dramatizing voice of the music; and a few minutes before they had been so no less as the voices of fate that begin the prelude to "Tristan." Out of their foreboding, Mr. Fiedler, in spite of his rhetorical pauses, wrenched the music of the lovers as with the ache of desire unsated and insatiable. His insistence upon the telling phrase, almost upon the little cry, accented the sensuousness of the music; and if the death-song was too thick of tone to be glamorous, the passion of it was heroic. Heroic, too, was Mr. Fiedler's close to the overture of Tannhäuser. The victory of the Pilgrim's chorus was magnificent in its sonorities; it was "Tannhäuser" made epic of the lusts of the flesh and the passions of the spirit—as some of us even after fifty years still like—no doubt childishly—to believe it. But how the conductor loves sheer bigness, sheer richness of tone for its own sake! Fortunate is he and his audiences in an orchestra that can also keep it mellow, colorful, euphonious.

The night before, the orchestra had been as finely eloquent and the conductor more truly puissant—because he was more discriminating—in the performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. It is intrinsically romantic, delineative, large-fibred, warmly colored, passionate music; it abounds in contrasts; it courts the incisive phrase; it shuns subtleties of thought and of expression; and by all these tokens it asks and it stimulates Mr. Fiedler's best talents. In the "Faust" symphony, he was again the masterful, the revealing, the warmed and warming conductor of "Zarathustra," of "Heldenleben," of Berlioz. Answering to him, his men attained the twofold goal of orchestral playing. The music by Gretchen, for example, came from their hands in a very soft and glamorous tonal beauty; it ran with an exquisite euphony of sustained and gently colored phrase. As the men played it, they and the conductor spiritualized it, till the idealized figure of Gretchen rose out of it to touch and to hold the imagination. And the men of the Apollo Club and Mr. Rattigan, their tenor, were as sensitive to the sublimated music of the final chorus. There was no thought in th hearer of the difficult intervals or the insistently high range of the mere notes; there was impression only of the mounting voice of the music, now shadowed, now ethereal.

This "chorus mysticus," as Liszt called it, is the climax of the symphony after all; the distilling of the ideal toward which all its romantic struggle and romantic passion ascends. In that struggle, through the long half hour of the first movement, the orchestra and the conductor were as graphic and eloquent. Here is a music-drama, more vivid, more engrossing, perhaps, than though it were set upon the stage, because it is the drama of Faust's struggles with himself, with his longings and his despairs, with the world around him and the world of his spirit. With Gretchen, Liszt summons an idealized figure; with Faust he opens a tortured mind; with Mephistopheles he turns the musical means with which he has accomplished both these things into the ironic mockery of them—a feat of technique, but yet more a feat of imagination to which the technique is but the accomplishing means. There is no need to see a Mephistopheles when Liszt can give him mind and voice; and all the changes of the stage are but mechanics beside the transition in tones out of this welter of evil into the ascent of the final chorus. We like to think such delineative and dramatizing music the particular flower of our time. In "Faust" Liszt wrote a masterpiece of it—and in the fifties.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

APRIL 23, 1910.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, performs in Symphony hall tonight August Halm's symphony in D minor for string orchestra, a work new to America; the Richard Strauss "Don Quixote" variations, and the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

At the final concerts of the season, Friday afternoon, April 29, and Saturday evening, April 30, Mr. Fiedler will present a program that has been popular this season in the concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch—the first and ninth symphonies of Beethoven.

"Between the Haydn-like sentences of the first," as writes the Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Musical Leader, "and the Jovian utterances of the ninth, there is a long life of musical and spiritual development."

In the finale of the ninth symphony Mr. Fiedler will have the choral assistance of the Cecilia Society. His soloists will be Mme. Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Frederick Weld, bass.

The eighth and last symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theater, Harvard University, Thursday evening, April 28, when Prof. Willy Hess, the retiring concert master of the orchestra, makes his last appearance as soloist. The program comprises Gustav Strube's new comedy overture, "Puck"; Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" and Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

Professor Hess will sail for Hamburg May 4 on the President Grant. He will go at once to Berlin to take up his duties as head of the violin department of the Royal High School of Music.

Mr. Fiedler's date for sailing is May 5; he plans to return to America late in September.

BOSTON JOURNAL—APRIL 23, 1910.

"DON QUIXOTE" IS SYMPHONY FEATURE

Strauss' Wonderful Tone Story Evokes Much Enthusiasm.

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN SIX YEARS

Halm's Symphony, New to America, Also Makes Profound Impression on Audience.

Richard Strauss' wonderful tone story, "Don Quixote"—which is said by one English critic to have inaugurated "the period of the novel in music"—is the leading feature of the week's Symphony program. Its performance yesterday afternoon evoked some of the warmest enthusiasm of the season.

Conductor Fiedler and Mr. Warnke, the 'cello soloist, were the first to respond to the applause; and finally the entire band stood up. It was altogether a dazzling display of combined virtuosity—a new revelation of the phenomenal power of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke, playing much of the music characteristic of the befuddled knight-errant, has never appeared to better advantage. Mr. Ferir, the violinist, who played some of the Sancho Panzo music with his accustomed skill and taste, modestly declined to come forward at the end. He preferred to sit back and applaud his fellow-soloist. This is the first time in six years that "Don Quixote" has been heard here, so to many it is like a new work.

The novelty of the program is August Holm's symphony for string orchestra, performed this week for the first time in America. It made yesterday a pleasing, if not profound, impression. It is melodious and dignified, with religious touches now and then; in all, a sweet and simple composition, contrasting in a striking manner with the dashing realism of Strauss. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music completes one of the most interesting programs of the year.

Next week, at the final concert, Beethoven's first and ninth symphonies will be performed. The orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecelia Society and of the following soloists: Mrs. Hissem de Moss, soprano; Mrs. Margaret Keyes, contralto; Berrick von Norden, tenor; Frederick Weld, bass.

[151]

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 22, 1910

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS PITCH

A Novel Suggestion About the Resonance and Brilliance of Its Tone—Mr. and Mrs. Gaines in a Song Recital—The Memories and the Confessions of Walter Damrosch—Josef Hoffmann's Return to Boston—Strauss and His Own Music—Other Notes of the Day

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not have played more than two bars of a composition before one recognizes that here is an unusual tone quality, one of particular brilliance and resonance. This cannot be accounted for on the general ground of the supremacy of the Boston orchestra, the length of time the men have played together, the quality of discipline in the past, the quality of the instruments and the like. The quality of precision, which makes itself felt only through the progress of the performance of a work, would not account for the sensation produced by the first few tones given by the Boston orchestra at a concert. It is possible that the average of the quality of the instruments themselves may be slightly higher than in New York, at least in the case of stringed instruments, which, in the long process of special selection and concentration may have been brought, as a collection, to an exceptionally high point. But it is not to be supposed that Boston is in possession of a higher quality in the average of wind instruments than is New York.

Now it appears that the pitch of the Boston orchestra is higher than that of any other orchestra in America by an interval approximating a quarter tone. This would readily account for a difference in the whole orchestral tone that would be instantly noticeable. While the difference in pitch might not be so greatly felt in the case of a single stringed instrument, when this difference is multiplied some thirty to fifty times, and when to the tonal gain is added the increased tonal intensity of a similar number of wind instruments, the difference must be such as would readily account for the remarkable phenomenon of brilliance and sonority noticed in the Boston orchestra. If this circumstance accounts in large measure, as it would seem to, for the tonal advantage of the Boston orchestra, why should New Yorkers be denied a similar advantage in the tone of their own orchestras? [Musical America.

News of Music

Josef Hoffmann, the pianist, has long believed that Boston is one of the few cities in the world in which there is no public for him. He was a curiosity here, as he was elsewhere, in the distant days in which he was exploited as a prodigy. When he became a pianist by right of his own talents, Boston yielded him no audiences, and in his more recent tours, he has refused to try his fortunes here. Next autumn he will return to America, as the ripened pianist that he has now become, and at last he has agreed to play in Boston, both at the Symphony Concerts and in a recital of his own.

Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, is making slow but steady progress through a long convalescence that seems quite as much the result of years of incessant work as of her recent illness. She is now able on occasion to go out of doors; she will have a summer of rest; and it is likely to be midwinter before she returns to concert

BOSTON TRAVELER, APRIL 23, 1910.

Mr. Gustav Strube, who will conduct the first half of the season of the pops in Symphony Hall, will begin his programme on the opening night, Monday, May 2, with a new march which he calls "The Comet." In past years no more popular pieces have appeared on the pop programmes than his marches, "Black Bess" and "The Cruiser Harvard," and it is expected that his new march, "The Comet," will become as popular as its predecessors. A number of improvements will have been made in the service in Symphony Hall.

The closing concerts for this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, will be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, April 29, at 2:30, and Saturday evening, April 30, at 8 o'clock. The programme will include a Mozart symphony and Beethoven's first symphony. As last year, the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia Society, and a quartet has been engaged of first-class quality. Mme. Hissem de Moss, who sang here with the orchestra five years ago and made a favorable impression, will be the soprano. The contralto will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who is not well known in Boston, but is said to be a singer of more than ordinary ability

MONITOR, APRIL 18, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

LISZT'S "Faust" symphony, in three character pictures, was performed in Symphony hall Saturday evening at the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Singers from the Apollo Club, including James H. Rattigan, tenor, assisted in the choral finale and tenor solo. There was but one other number on the program, Ducasse's Suite Francaise in D major, which had its first performance in America. The new suite was in four short movements: Overture, Bourree, Recitatif et Air, Menuet vif.

There have probably never been audiences in Boston more competent to judge of the merits of Liszt's musical analysis of Goethe's great "Faust" poem than the audiences of the symphony rehearsal and concert of last week. For the three characters of "Faust," Marguerite and Mephistopheles have been presented so often this winter in opera that they have become a part of the musical consciousness of the city. There has been exposition of them. It was left to Mr. Fielder to give a moment near the close of the season for a contemplative review of them.

Those who went to the Symphony concert prepared to hear a dramatic presentation of the "Faust" legend were certainly disappointed, for Liszt's purpose in writing his symphonic poem was to separate Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles from the action of the drama and to picture them in their intrinsic character. There are no scenes in this music of Liszt. The composer did not seek to to reproduce the work of the poet, but to give musical, sentimental—some like to say philosophical—definition to his three leading ideas.

Liszt risked much in thus resolving Goethe's poem to its elements, for Faust, Marguerite and Mephistopheles, apart from their relations with one another, cannot be interesting to everybody; can be interesting, indeed, only to those who know their Goethe well. But Liszt was not afraid to take a musical risk. He could have written a symphonic poem narrating circumstantially the events of Gretchen's life, had he chosen to do so; his intention, however, was to portray character apart from circumstance. Some have thought the composer more successful in the "Gretchen" division of the symphonic poem than in either of the other two; and here undoubtedly he kept his music freest from everything theatrical.

The symphony subscribers of the Saturday evenings are liberal to new music, but they do not applaud a piece just because it puzzles them. They understood the Liszt tone poem and applauded both music and performers; but they withheld judgment on the Ducasse suite. There is no doubt that Ducasse in this work has a French composer's success of fitting his matter to his form. He chose to write a suite containing a bourree and a minuet because he had ideas that expressed themselves best through the medium of these old dances. Like Ravel, Ducasse seems to have taken Berlioz as his starting point instead of the generation of French composers immediately preceding his own. He is restrained in the use of color effects; perhaps he has little genius for them. He is brilliant almost to the point of impudence in rhythmic invention.

Another work of his is to be presented in Boston Tuesday night at the concert of the Boston Orchestral Club—his Variations plaisantes.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in aid of its pension fund Sunday evening before an audience that filled Symphony hall. The program on the orchestral side was in the main Wagnerian and Mr. Fiedler won enthusisatic applause for himself and his men for the performance of the following pieces: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," prelude to "Parsifal," overture to "Tannhauser." The only orchestral number not by Wagner was Loeffler's "The Devil's Villanelle."

Soloist Mme. Marcella Sembrich came from the West, where she is on a concert tour, to give the Symphony men the assistance of her voice. She sang, with the accompaniment of the orchestra, Verdi's aria, Ernani, involami, from "Ernani," and with the assistance of Frank La Forge, pianist, she performed the following songs with piano: Brahms, Wie Melodien zieht es mir; Schumann, Auftrage; R. Strauss, Allerseelen; Jacques-Dalcroze, L'oiseau bleu; La Forge, To a Messenger.

Those of the audience who have not heard the regular Symphony concerts this season were given an excellent idea of the conductor's methods of interpretation. They heard a different symphony orchestra from that which played in Boston before Mr. Fiedler came and a somewhat different one from that of his first year. They heard effects that have been developed in the orchestra only in recent months, effects that depend on Mr. Fiedler's gift for tone massing. They heard the conductor interpret Wagner in a manner that is new with him, because he has but just now succeeded in bringing the Symphony artists out of their traditional Wagnerian habits and in making their ideas conform with his own.

Some listeners of Sunday evening who remembered the recent Boston performance of the "Meistersinger" may have thought that Mr. Toscanini, the opera conductor, had a better dramatic idea of Wagner than Mr. Fiedler, the concert conductor. But who had the better idea of the German life and thought that underlie the music? Who brought to light things that are deeper rooted than the motives of the drama and more important than any of its incidents? So could sides be taken on a question of art. Wagner always makes us ask ourselves where musical satisfaction is to be found, in opera or in concert; and Wagner himself gives us our answer; for the preludes to his music dramas offer just as broad opportunities for interpretation in one place as in the other; they give scope for the genius both of Mr. Toscanini in the opera house and of Mr. Fiedler in the concert hall.

Mme. Sembrich knows how to put herself on pleasant terms with her audience; success was hers on Sunday evening before she sang a note. Her work was on the same order as that of her appearance this season in the regular series of symphony concerts. Outside of her performance of the "Ernani" aria she was at her best in point of vocal style and in quality of expression in the song by Brahms.

There are probably few soloists to whom Mr. Fiedler would entrust an audience after the heavy Wagnerian list of pieces with which he began the evening. But everybody was glad to stay past the usual concert hour to hear Mme. Sembrich; and after the program was concluded, there were enthusiasts who gathered near the platform and recalled the singer.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 23, 1910

GOOD PROGRAMME, WHOLLY ORCHESTRAL

FIRST HEARING OF HALM'S SYMPHONY

Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Selections From "The Midsummer Night's Dream."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

August Halm. Symphony in D minor, for string orchestra.
Strauss. "Don Quixote."
Mendelssohn. Selections from "Midsummer-night's Dream."

An entirely orchestral programme, and a very good one. August Halm was a newcomer and his work received its first performance in America on this occasion. The work is short, which is in itself a great merit. Halm, in spite of being ignored by the musical biographical dictionaries, is of some importance in Austria and Germany. This symphony is of only three movements. We like the first movement much the best, for it is good, straightforward music, which possesses clear and attractive themes sanely expressed and developed. The chief theme is original and its figures are striking and well suited to development. The figures of it are much used throughout the movement. The subordinate subject has a quaint interrupting figure that makes it impressive. The whole movement is as orthodox as a Presbyterian hymn.

The Andante is less striking and seems conventional and unimpressive. The finale is a fugue with a strong subject. Mr. Halm does not allow the working-out to run away with him, but here also is brief and to the point, but we fear that audiences who care for these contrapuntal finales without sensational tone-color are hard to find in the 20th century. If not very thrilling, the symphony was at least good, comprehensible music, which is unfortunately becoming rare just at present, when people prefer to be mystified and only applaud what they cannot understand. The contrabasses deserve a word of especial praise for their work in the fugue.

Strauss's "Don Quixote" variations are interesting and wonderfully colored music, only in the introduction of a "wind-machine" does the composer betray his love for the unusual which has led him so far afield in his later works. "Variations" may mean almost anything in modern music. Once upon a time it meant that a certain theme was to be embroidered in various ways, but its shape kept intact, but even Beethoven began to pull the house down and build over with the same material, calling the result—"Variations."

Last week we had some variations which represented a rather startling room-ful of Sir Edward Elgar's friends. Huber gave a Boecklin picture-gallery of so-called variations. But Strauss is bigger, bolder and better, in his serving up Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in variation-sauce. It was an odd thought to use the melancholy and brooding viola to picture Sancho Panza. One would have imagined that a contrabass would have given the burly esquire better, but the dialogues between the violoncello (Don Quixote) and the viola (Sancho) are very striking. We can at once compliment the two soloists. Mr. Warnke is an artist who would make his mark anywhere, even in this city where we have had some of the greatest violoncellists of the world. He gave dignity and expression to the character of the fantastic Don, while Mr. Ferir was not less successful with the viola responses.

Mr. Fiedler gave the work as good a reading as any that we have yet had in Boston, in spite of the fact that Strauss himself has led it. Technically Mr. Gericke's reading was a very great one, but here we had superadded the element of humor. Not that Strauss wishes humor entirely; he deals sympathetically with the figure of the old knight, and there are touches that show that the composer has a very keen intelligence as regards some of the subtlest points. He catches the meaning of Cervantes even in the subtlest points, and translates it into fitting music.

Note, for example, the contrapuntal distortion of the chief theme, showing Don Quixote's false reasoning even when starting with a correct premise. Observe the theme returning to a normal shape and to logical sequence as sanity returns to the poor knight. One could mention many points that show that Strauss has read his Cervantes with intelligence and sympathy.

But one may disagree with many points of ugliness and of extreme complexity in the composition. After all, Music was intended to give pleasure rather than problems. The introduction of Strauss' wind-machine, or Berlioz's platoon of musketry, or Paderewski's "tonitruone" into music we regard as mistaken attempts at realism. The wind-machine sounds like a demented piccolo. The duet of bassoons was exquisitely played. But the dialogues of violoncello and viola were memorable. The violoncello is made as prominent in this work as the viola in Berlioz's "Childe Harold"; its obbligato is practically a solo. Mr. Warnke certainly deserved the enthusiasm with which he was greeted at the end of the work. Mr. Ferir joined in this triumph. So, of coure, did Mr. Fiedler, and finally the whole orchestra. The unbounded enthusiasm was quite unusual for a cold storage, hats on, matinee, such as the Friday rehearsals often are.

The second crop of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer night's Dream" music, is not as great as the first. As a youth he wrote the overture, which is a work of Genius. As a man (at the command of the King of Prussia) he wrote the other pieces, which are the work of a skilful musician who is thoroughly used to orchestral routine.

The overture towered over the other three selections, and is probably the best humorous overture in existence. The dancing fairies (violins), the braying Bottom (bassoon) the awkward actors of "Pyramus and Thisbe," were finely drawn in the performance. We always regret that one cannot have an ophicleide, as Mendelssohn wrote it, for the snoring of Bottom among the fairies; the bass tuba is but a poor substitute for the raucous tone of the obsolete instrument. The theme of the fairies (first theme) was taken a little too softly and too rapidly, but this was a fault that "leaned to Virtue's side."

The Scherzo is the best of the aftermath in this Shakespearian field. Mendelssohn was the best Scherzo composer of them all. Beethoven was often grotesque, Schumann, too earnest, in his Scherzos, but Mendelssohn caught the perfect humor and playfulness that fits to this movement. It was splendidly read and played and awakened much enthusiasm, as much even as the weightier "Don Quixote" had done. The Nocturne gave a good opportunity to the horn to display its capabilities. The tempo was a trifle quick for this movement, which is the most conventional of the set.

The Wedding March has led about as many into battle as the Marseillaise itself. Its blare of trumpets and glitter of festivity are too well known to require much mention, but the contrasts of its two trios and the showiness of its Coda were finely brought out and led the concert to a triumphant close. Again the speed was rather hurried, as if the conductor said to the entering party—as other conductors often do—"Step lively, please!"

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 23, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Beethoven's First and Last Symphonies to Conclude the Season of Orchestral Concerts—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" for the Concert of the People's Choral Union

The Symphony Orchestra ends its regular concerts for the present season with the rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme will be Beethoven's first symphony and his last, the ninth (choral), for the performance of which the band will have the assistance of the Cecilia Society and a quartet of soloists, Mme. de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keys, contralto; Mr. Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Mr. Frederick Weld, bass.

The eighth and last symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. At this concert Mr. Willy Hess, the retiring concert-master of the orchestra, will make his last appearance as soloist. Mr. Hess will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Mr. Gustav Strube's new "Comedy Overture Puck;" Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall the People's Choral Union, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Wodell, will give Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and "Spring" from Haydn's "Seasons." The chorus will be assisted by forty players from the Symphony Orchestra and a quartet of soloists, Miss Caroline Hudson, soprano; Mr. Edward Barron, tenor; Miss Adelaide Griggs, contralto, and Mr. Everett B. Merrill, bass.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 23, 1910

STRAUSS'S "DON QUIXOTE"

A RARE MASTERPIECE, RARELY PERFORMED

The Understanding and Imagination of Mr. Fiedler, Mr. Warnke and the Orchestra—The Humor, the Humanity, the Pity and the Fantasy of Strauss's Music—Its Form and Substance—The Objective and Subjective Sides—The Pictorial and the Spiritual Variations—The Beauty of the End

"Don Quixote" was applauded at the Symphony Concert yesterday as the ratner niute public of Friday afternoons has not within memory applauded the music of Strauss. Almost always it listens intently to the tone-poems, but oftenest with a clear suggestion of bewilderment, as though it knew that it ought to understand, but was not quite sure that it did. Yesterday, seemingly, it escaped such uncertainties, and the mood of the listeners swayed quickly to the moods of the music —now to the rapt exaltation of the knight's discourse of his ideal; now to the tonal humors of his adventures; now to the pathos of his disillusion and the shadowed calm of his death. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the music was luminously clear. He never forgot that Strauss had willed to write a theme with introduction, variations, and finale. He hid not a strand in the closely woven web of the music; and let not one break or sag. He was luminous with the instrumental parts; every group of instruments, almost every instrument, seemed to have and to keep its individuality. Design, development, color and expression marched in unity, and as clearly as Mr. Fiedler had done with "Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben," he revealed and enforced the mingled technical and imaginative power in Strauss that fuses the purely musical treatment of form and melodic thoughts with their delineative, characterizing and emotional purpose. Not once did Mr. Fiedler's tendency to over-slow or over-fast pace trouble the course of the music; not once did he fall upon the over-emphasized phrase to the disjointure of the whole; while through all the music, be it as fantastic as the knight's descent into madness, as grotesque as some of his combats, as gravely beautiful as that of the night vigil, ran the pulse of characterizing and communicating rhythm.

Mr. Fiedler did these things, partly because the piece so absorbed him that he forgot his own idiosyncrasies, and partly because he appreciated the true nature of the music as deeply, sympathetically and imaginatively as he has all of Strauss's tone-poems outside the "Domestica." For "Don Quixote" is no congeries of tonal grotesquerie and tonal diablerie. It is fantastic, as the title says, and as aught that has its source in Cervantes's knight must be. It has its humors in the adventures of the sheep, the penitents, the ride through the air and the journey in the enchanted barque, and Strauss is almost the only humorist in tones that does more than clever technical and instrumental tricks. Yet the vein of the fantasy is gentle; the vein of the humors wistful, almost pitying. Above all else in "Don Quixote," Strauss would characterize the knight as a pathetic figure, the unknowing victim of the intensities of his own chimeras, the puppet—and to a kind of grave mirth in those that see and hear—of his own ideals, saddened by the outcome of them, yet in the end ennobled by all that he had dreamed and done and endured. It is as though Strauss had read long in Cervantes's romance and read with our modern sense, which is more of the pity that smiles wistfully than of the hard humor that chuckles loudly—of all that it records. He has laid aside the book and out of his musings upon it rises tahe pathetically sincere, the pathetically noble, the pathetically human figure of the knight. And Strauss, being composer, is minded so to characterize him in tones, so to picture his descent into madness, so to dream his dreams and record his adventures, and so to glorify him in his death. If behind, and here again is the modern spirit, we may feel the chimera that most men's ideals turn in middle age and the pathos of it, if thereby we may make "the better end" as the old theologians used to say, so much the better. The mood of "Don Quixote" is not the mood of vivid grotesquerie and ironic humor; it is the mood of gentle, reticent, imaginative musing. It is full of human wistfulness and human sympathy; but it has its reliefs and contrasts in human smiles. To this mood and these purposes Mr. Fiedler, with his keen insight and imagination into Strauss's thoughts and ends, kept the music and held his men at one with him.

Strauss begins in characterization—his own particular note and, perhaps, the note of music in general in our time—the characterization by the substance and the contours of a musical thought and then by the modification and the varied coloring of it to the particular circumstance. It is easy to object that the chivalric music of the introduction lacks large opulence, rich glow. But Strauss has willed to etch rather than to paint; he is busy with a sublimated fantasy of chivalric vision and not with a tonal panorama of the days of knighthood. Moreover, all Strauss's germinative ideas exist less for themselves than for the uses to which he would put them. He makes his chivalric music wax with ardor and finally glow with its intoxication of Don Quixote. The ideal that is the spring of the intoxication stirs in the music. The din of combat for it comes in a kind of fantastic echo. The musical material, the instrumental color, the delineative end are inextricably joined. Then Strauss passes to a feat of imaginative technique that even the "Electra" of the years to come hardly excels—the [illegible] of all this chivalric music into a [illegible]dism. Given the title of "Don [illegible] madness of the knight [illegible] not write it more

All this, in Strauss's strict adherence to a dried and academic form—unless and until new imagination touch it—foreshadows the knight. He emerges now in the characterizing voice of the violoncello, and Mr. Warnke was virtuoso in his skill with the relentless music and actor, almost poet, in his sense and revelation of its delineative and imaginative purpose. The knight does live in the characterizing theme, as he lives in such illustrations as those that Vierge made for the novel. It has his long gaunt contours, his dryness of middle-aged aspect; and it bears its suggestion of the high-hearted visionary of the pathos of him, and, a little, of the fate that awaits him. Like most of "Don Quixote," it is at once objective music in its substance and subjective music in its emotional appeal. Strauss is too much the skilful and the imaginative architect not to know the necessity of contrast. The characterizing theme of Sancho affords it; but the musical idea is not so well-imagined. It is homely, prosaic, a little dull—as it should be; but it is less revealing and individual of Sancho than it is of the necessity of a foil to the music of the knight. It is distinctly a theme to be manipulated, and it asks less than Don Quixote of the instrument and the player—the viola and Mr. Férir—who assume it. Strauss makes the characterization and its contrasts unmistakeable, lingers a little over them, and he is ready for the adventures.

The adventures make the ten variations, as scrupulously developed from the preceding material as though Strauss was doing an academic exercise, but yet as unfailingly bent to his delineative and imaginative purpose. The adventures are of two sorts, so to say—of the bodies of the knight and the squire, and of their spirits. Into the first category fall the assaults upon the windmills and the sheep, the encounter with the penitents, the ride in the air and on the barque; the meeting with the monks whom Don Quixote would have evil magicians. Strauss's sense of his music as music, of its design and contrasts and color, shine in the choice of these episodes. A fantastic barcarolle, a queer chromatic gulping await him in the adventure of the boat. He can set all his orchestra a-whistling over the fir[illegible]placed double basses in the adventure of the air that is really earth. The penitents and the monks give him his "ecclesiastical harmonies"; the sheep can bleat in his brass and the windmills fall to his drum-beats. Musical variety, musical ingenuity, and always musical characterization. Brief as are some of these variations, they become—granted the spurring title that Strauss surely intended the listener should have before him—as nearly narrative as music may be. They not only picture, they progress. Thus they are half-realistic—and curious; but their truer and finer hold upon the imagination lies in the atmosphere of fantasy with which Strauss clothes them. He intended them only in part as bare tonal humors, as bald tonal grotesquerie. He intended them quite as much as the wistful delusions of Don Quixote's brain. As he smiled at them, he knew, too, the pity of them. Like all the rest of the piece they are at once subjective and objective, humorous and human. They touch as much as they amuse. They have their glamors of sympathetic and musing fantasy. So, as happily, Mr. Fiedler took them, keeping them clear of bald prose, softening freakish details, emphasizing the mood not the means, weaving and maintaining the glamor.

The other—the spiritual—variations are of a beauty and of an emotional power that Strauss has attained only in such moments as the recognition of Orestes in "Electra," in the rhapsody of "Salome," in the close of "Heldenleben" and in the night music of passion and creation in the "Domestica." Here in "Don Quixote," the beauty is lower-pitched and more reticent; the emotion more still and tense. The knight discourses of his ideals to the doubting Sancho longing for the flesh-pots of earth, and the music, and especially that of the singing violoncello, becomes exalted, noble, with the purest and the deepest emotion. It is music of ideals, of aspiration, of secret impulses and upbearing visions. It gives them body, power, emotion as only music can do. It is Strauss when he wills to turn poet. Akin, though less deeply charged with its own intensities, is the music of the vigil of the knight by his arms. It reveals him almost as a pictured figure; it opens his spirit; it sets him gaunt and brooding against the pale sky of fantasy. There is underlying pathos in the light variation of Dulcinea, of the country wench whom Don Quixote believes his lady foully enchanted. In it the prose and the poetry of the variations, the humor and the pathos join quick hands. They meet for an instant in the final variation of the combat with the Knight of the Moon; then, and for the rest of the piece, the poetry and the pathos come uppermost. Strauss is yet more graphic than he was in the vigil. Down the long, empty, road through the bleak air goes the knight, and his mind is as empty with its disillusions and his spirit as bleak with its defeats. The woe and the pity of disillusion are in this two-fold music. Yet it is a variation still; the just climax of them.

The imagination of the conductor and of the orchestra had answered to the imagination of Strauss in each of these spiritual variations. Mr. Fiedler had seemed to divine them in all their aspects, found the just means to reveal his divination and kept to it. The tone of the orchestra had been now as the lighting of the picture and now as the voice of its emotion—of the idealism, the aspiration, the disillusion, the sorrow of the knight. The death of Don Quixote remained: technically the well-wrought finale out of all that had gone before; imaginatively and emotionally the crowning of the whole. They say that Massenet in his new opera of "Don Quixote" has the knight droop and die beside his horse, in his armor, alone and in a waste place, as one who stands in isolated vigil over his ideals. Massenet would thus have the end a kind of gaunt and visible apothesis. Strauss prefers another and a subtler way. The listener hears the music with thought of a homely deathbed. Sancho and the country folk are surely standing by. The lean contours of the wasted knight ridge the sheets. These are Strauss's merely graphic externals; the rest, and the body and the soul of the music, is of the knight's departing spirit. The violoncello—and again Mr. Warnke fell not a whit short—becomes the voice once more of his visions. Wistfully it marshals the distant phantoms of his delusions; pathetically it recalls the ghosts of those chivalric dreams and fancied glories; but they are soothing now; at least he was faithful . . . and perhaps that faith has made him tranquil. Long before, as it seems, Strauss's sharp chords had snapped him into madness; now soft, clear harmonies bear him gently out of the world. If it mocked once, it pities now; and believes, or tries to believe, the finer things of the faith that made the delusions. No such music of death, except in the final scene of "Pelléas," has been written in our time. Nowhere else in all his music is Strauss so gentle as when he closes this book of pity. The orchestra, the conductor, the audience, came back to themselves. In the applause spoke the common thought of all that the music and the performance had been.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

APRIL 25, 1910.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra presented at the twenty-third concert in Symphony hall Saturday evening the following program: August Halm, symphony in D minor for string orchestra (first time in America); R. Strauss, "Don Quixote," variations, op. 35; Mendelssohn, overture, notturno, scherzo and wedding march from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61.

The Symphony audience was put in its best humor by the "Don Quixote" variation of Richard Strauss. Nothing arouses the amiability of the Saturday subscriber like a piece of program music in which the intellectual appeal is a little stronger than the pictorial, music in which thought dominates scene, action and color. They are glad to have Strauss show them Don Quixote couching his lance at the sails of a windmill, or charging into a flock of sheep, or pursuing any other of his familiar adventures; but they want the idea which prompts the knight of La Mancha to his strange doings to be made the important thing and the actual representation of it to be secondary.

Mr. Fiedler knows the mood of his listeners; he knows how to interpret Strauss to their liking. If they do not wish Don Quixote's overthrow by the wings of the windmill to be realistically portrayed, he can lighten the Knight's fall; if they think an instrumental combination which represents the bleating of sheep is too trivial a thing for a great composer to descend to, he can conduct the music so that nobody without a program book to guide him would ever guess sheep.

Mr. Fiedler seems always glad to gain the approval of the Saturday subscribers, for they never applaud gratuitously. They applauded the performance of the Don Quixote variations; and did they applaud because the conductor read the score to please them, or because after two years of musical endeavor in Boston he has brought his listeners around to his views of modern symphonic interpretation?

BOSTON GLOBE—APRIL 23, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Program of Contrast is Given at Rehearsal.

Halm's Work for String Orchestra Played for First Time.

The program for the 23d rehearsal at the Symphony yesterday afternoon was as follows: Symphony in D minor for string orchestra, by August Halm (first time in America); "Don Quixote," Fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, op 35, by Richard Strauss; solo violoncello, Mr Warnke; viola, Mr Ferir, and the Overture, Scherzo, Nocture and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

There was contrast in this program. Mr Fiedler chose for the middle number "Don Quixote," league-striding in its humanism, baldly, trenchantly analytical and characterizing, broadly sympathetic as a commentary on the life of man, but inexorably self-assertive and independent of precedent in structure.

Prefacing it and beginning the program was a work placidly amenable to musical tradition, law and order. Its opening allegro grew from two clear-cut themes stated frankly and with candor, and developed in quite the Handelian fashion. Its andante was a song-form of unadorned, unpretentious simplicity and quiet beauty. Its finale was a crisp and logical fugue upon a terse fugal subject, not unmindful of Bach's inventions.

This well-ordered, law-abiding music was the novelty, the "first-time-in-America" of the afternoon. It is, indeed, a new thing under the sun to find a modern who is not eager rather than reluctant to build out of broken rules "idiom," or a "style," or some other aspiring mode of speech.

Halm, whom Mr Fiedler knows to be an unpretentious school teacher in Thuringia, "inclined to be a hermit, though not morose, an idealist, and something of a dreamer," has developed the two subjects of his first movement with a cheerful alacrity and skill, and with a fertile and nimble-witted invention. Reiterations of the initial themes in the disguise of new figuration, but always to be recognized, flow with graceful spontaneity through the working out passage. The coda is again reminiscent of the original idea.

The second movement is reposeful, melodious, lyric. For the time, the strings of the orchestra become the many voiced expression of a piece of four-part writing. In the very simplicity of this music there was the charm of quaintness and sincerity. It was cordially applauded.

James Huneker and Ernest Newman have written appreciatively of the human element in Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which they deem its greatness lies. The work employs the piquancy and point of humor to tell of the variable and capricious incentives which prompted Cervantes' volatile, hallucinatory, but unfalteringly chivalrous and valiant knight Don Quixote to his catalog of feats, and his worthy, more mundane, if less romantic esquire, Sancho Panza, to frequent remonstrance against them

It would have been a pungent task to have satirized the ethereal follies of this visionary who could not reduce his chivalry to a practical proposition of every day, but Strauss has made the work an epic upon the imaginings of an aspiring soul which would break the bonds of materialism and in the hopeless struggle for freedom wear out body and spirit.

It is a tale as old as the world. Strauss has crystallized it with a larger sympathy, a deeper, broader understanding, into a more universal story of mankind than even Cervantes had done.

The sweep and power of the work makes possible technical feats which are an element conducive to rather than detracting from its chief purpose of psychological exposition. It is not an unrestricted tone poem in form, but a set of 10 variations upon a theme prefaced by introduction and concluding in a finale.

In the reproduction of the bleating sheep, Strauss has for the moment amused himself by setting muted brass to tricks of the veriest realism. It is to be heard and marveled at in such vein. It is a sign of sanity when now and then a composer does not take himself too seriously.

There is, too, the "wind machine," which for the moment transports us to the theatre, but there is music besides which creates, illumines and enforces moods.

The final narrative of the 'cello, impersonating the Don, who thus recounts his defeat and his petition for death rather than life with dishonor, is all touched by a noble sympathy. The conclusion which precedes his death is deeply and touchingly pathetic. Despite intonation which often appeared insecure, Mr Warnke sensed the spirit of the music in no slight degree, and was called upon to acknowledge applause.

Mr Fiedler conducted a brilliant performance. The Mendelssohn music was entrancingly played and warmly applauded.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON POST, APRIL 23, 1910

trauss' "Don Quixote" Given Masterly Reading

BY OLIN DOWNES

e 23d public rehearsal of the Sym- ny orchestra yesterday afternoon in mphony Hall. The programme: Sym- ny for strings, August Halm (first in America); tone poem, "Don ixote;" Richard Strauss; overture, cherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, m incidental music to "A Midsummer ght's Dream," Mendelssohn.

his symphony for strings alone—the work of such a description that we heard—Halm aims at simple, sober ty, and though his scoring is inclined hickness, he often attains this. But, ight be expected, the symphony suf- on the one hand from lack of the of the full orchestra, and on the r by lack of the tonal transparency good string quartet.

here are a number of good ideas in work, ideas which are most likely to e when the composer stumbles upon n in the course of his journey—"find- s," as the French put it—but the sym- ony is too long and monotonous in its racter. Halm may well be praised for continence of his harmonic style in e days of ear-splitting dissonance, this was not a little, for the drab sic served admirably to set off the ming masterpiece of Strauss.

A Magnificent Picture

Don Quixote" has been given once ore in this city. It is perhaps the et popular and well-known of the eat symphonic poems. It is also, per- ps, the most remarkable and individual them all—a quintessence of the Strauss at has sprawled all over the musical orizon for the time being. The per- rmance yesterday afternoon had much do with the exceptional appreciation nd enthusiasm of the audience. In 1904 r. Gericke gave a most musicianly, and in many respects a highly poetical read- ing of the monumental work. But we be- lieve that Mr. Fiedler made the music heard more nearly as it passed from the composer's brain. It was notable, too, that in contradistinction to too many re- cent concerts, the performance was re- markable for its clarity, its balance and its suggestion; its avoidance of the ultra- realism which has been read into this music. The bleating of the sheep, for instance, was by no means as prominent as on the former occasion—it was merely a small detail, one of many, in a magni- ficent picture.

And how differently we looked at things yesterday, after an interval of only six years! We even wasted breath then over the poor wind machine. The varia- tion in which that instrument is employed —the flight through the air—is one of the most superb flights of phantasy in one of the most vivid and imaginative com- positions in existence. Then recall the variation wherein the Don orates upon chivalry, and the crazy rapture intro- duced by the harp. The opening pages, it has been well said, are absolutely un- canny in their psychology—the knight going mad. There is another page—where Don Quixote in a passage of sweeping glory, silences his commonplace squire's objections to chivalry. This is so truly noble, so ardent in the cause of all that is most high, that it may well bring tears to the eyes of those who cherish the truth. The final passages are not less uplifting. They could come from only one man who created the apotheosis in "Tod und Verklarung."

This performance was one of the great- est that Mr. Fiedler has given in this city. Mr. Warnke gave an exceedingly eloquent interpretation of the very dif- ficult 'cello part, and one would go far to find the equal of Mr. Ferir, the violist. But why was not the name of the tenor tuba, also, preserved to fame?

BOSTON HERALD, APRIL 23, 1910.

HALM'S PROVES SINGULAR MUSIC

Symphony Orchestra Performs Composition at 23d Public Rehearsal for First Time in America.

STRAUSS' "DON QUIXOTE" GIVES AUDIENCE PLEASURE

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yes- terday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor, for strings..Halm
"Don Quixote".....Strauss
Overture, Notturno, Scherzo and Wedding March from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn

August Halm is apparently un- known to compilers of music lexi- cons. Born in Wuertemberg, he was a theological student, music critic, and he became interested in new the- ories of pedagogy. He now lives in a little village, Wickersdorf, in Thurin- gia, where he teaches in a boys' school conducted on modern princi- ples. He is said to be a singular per- son, who wishes to live away from the bustle and the strife of the city, contented with nature and his own thoughts, eager to teach the young idea how to shoot, not morose, but something of a hermit, a broadly ed- ucated man, one worth talking with; and he is demented with the mania of composing.

Mr. Fiedler states that Halm's gods are Bach, Bruckner and Wagner; that he has composed several re- markable works, among them a sym- phony and a concerto in the style of Bach for orchestra and piano.

This symphony was first performed at Stuttgart in 1907. The perform- ance yesterday was the first in Amer- ica.

The symphony is noteworthy chief- ly for its extreme naivete. It would seem as though Halm had not even heard of modern harmonies, whole tone scales and anxiously sought out devices. He may in his Thuringian village indulge himself in pious orgies with Wagner and Bruckner, but there is nothing in this symphony to con- firm the report that they lived and wrote.

The first movement is the most in- teresting of the three, but it suffers from too much development of the simple material. The development shows a certain contrapuntal facility and there are pages of an archaic flavor that is not displeasing. The second movement is exceedingly sim- ple, childishly naive, and it must be confessed that it is uninteresting. Not because it is simple. Nothing could be simpler melodically and har- monically than the Adagietto, for in- stance, in Bizet's first suite from the music to "L'Arlesienne," but how tender, how beautiful this music is! Halm's andante might have been written by some forgotten contempo- rary of Mozart. The third and last movement is a fugue without special distinction.

This is singular music for a man to write in the 20th century. It is the music of one belated. It is innocent music, and this is a sophisticated, neurotic age. A return to artistic simplicity would now be admired as, in the artificial life under Marie An- toinette, noble dames and free-living gallants prattled about returning to nature, were influenced by Jean Jacques and sported as shepherds and shepherdesses. But the simplicity of Hahn has not the requisite vitality. Now and then the music has the serenity of Gluck, but the moments are few, and for the most part the hearer is aware of notes, only notes.

It was a great pleasure to hear "Don Quixote" again after a lapse of six years. Ernest Newman, one of the few men living who write with fine appreciation about music, is enraptured with "the wise and tender humanity" of Strauss' humor in this work. "Strauss' Sancho is very humorous, but your laughter at him is always softened with tears." How would the hearer distinguish Sancho, if he were not assured that Sancho is associated with a solo viola? And why should one weep over Sancho? As far as the world goes, he fared much better than his master. Here, if ever, is there need of a detailed program. It would be still better if the scenes on which Strauss comments musically were thrown on a screen while the music was played.

It is easy to identify the fight with the sheep. The wind machine is un- mistakable. But these eccentricities do not make the composition great. The theme that is typical of Don Quixote and knightly gallantry in gen- eral has a noble, a superb sweep, and it is treated in a masterly manner. The theme of the "Ideal Woman" is one of matchless beauty. There are few finer and more sustained out- bursts of music than the one in which "Don Quixote speaks nobly of the ideal." This and the wonderful mu- sic that portrays the disillusionment and death of Don Quixote put the composer by the side of the greatest masters.

Yet it may be questioned whether, as a complete and rounded work of art, "Don Quixote," with all the ap- palling cleverness displayed, does not fall below "Death and Apotheosis," "Don Juan" and the incomparable "Till." It is true that there is nothing nobler in these works than the dis- course on the ideal and the death mu- sic. To match them we must go to the music of recognition in "Electra." But what a master this man is! Verily a superman!

The performance was an engrossing one for the most part, and Mr. Warnke played the solo 'cello with marked skill and in a highly poetic spirit. He richly deserved the ap- plause given him by his colleagues and the audience. The performance made a profound impression, and ap- plause for the music and the perform- ance was hearty and long continued.

And then with the music of Men- delssohn the audience entered another world, where it found amiability and grace, and the smooth expression of a minor poet.

The program of the last concert next week will include Beethoven's symphonies, Nos. 1 and 9.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 25, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE CONCERTS OF SATURDAY AND SUNDAY

Mendelssohn and His Wind Choir—Simplicity and Dulness—The Spring Concert of the People's Choral Union—Mr. Foote's Reflections—Strauss and Mahler at the Symphony Concerts—Operatic News—The Novel Pieces and the Revivals for Next Season at the Metropolitan Depreciate Mendelssohn as we may—and in the reaction of our generation from the over-praise of our fathers we probably underestimate him—the best and the most characteristic of his music still brings its pleasure to the particular and the general ear. Average hearers, as they did at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Satur- day when Mr. Fiedler revived the Overture, the Scherzo, the Night-Piece, and the Wed- ding March from the music to "A Mid- summer Night's Dream," find easy and plentiful pleasure in its suave melody, its clear rhythms, its fluency and transpar- ency, its air of elegant fancy and assured grace. They and the connoisseurs may take equal delight in its aptness to the play it would illustrate, diversify and clothe; in its suggestion alike of Shak- speare's fairy, romantic and "rude me- chanical" folk; in its glamor of gossamer fancy, of romping humor, or of young po- etic mood. "Incidental music" that so completely gains its end and yet has such right to be for its own lovely sake, is as rare now as it was in the forties when Mendelssohn wrote it. More to them- selves, the connoisseurs have pleasure in the adroit felicity of his instrumental color- ing in this music and in his curiously "modern feeling" for the wind choir. We like to fancy the possibilities of the wind instruments as rather a discovery of our own time; and for them our particular generation of composers seems often a little to neglect the strings. From Brahms with his "dusky" horns through Strauss and d'Indy with their endless exactions of song, of background and of color from flutes and oboes, horns and bassoons and all the rest, our composers have developed the expressive range of the wind choir. But as Beethoven before them knew the voice of his bassoons, for example, so Men- delssohn in much of this music to "A Mid- summer Night's Dream," knows, feels and utilizes the loveliness of tone that dwells intrinsically in flute and clarinet and oboe and horn. All of them from the overture own to the smallest fragment of "inci- ental music" are the revealing voices of fairies and their moonlit woodlands and the romance and the fantasy of the y. The Nocturne, especially with such first horn as Mr. Wendler, becomes al- st a piece for the wind choir; while the erzo, with similar reliance upon the es, is like to it. And this feeling, as say nowadays for the wind instruments, only a part of Mendelssohn's felicity oughout this music, in the use of his en orchestra. At every turn imagina- and precision are at one; while ele- nce never stifles fancy. The very nar- ness of his resources, as orchestral re- rces now are, only makes his supple- s and variety within them the clearer. his colors are relatively few, the blend- s and the shadings are exquisite.

"Sancta simplicitas" sang the recluse. "Silly simplicity" retorted the worldling, and it is easy to believe that the worldling would have the better of it with August Halm's symphony for string orchestra that Mr. Fiedler projected out of nowhere upon the audiences of Friday and Saturday. Halm is rather a recluse, affirmed the pro- gramme book, for once groping; he lives and teaches in self-imposed isolation in a German school; his music seldom gains per- formance or publication; he courts a re- turn to simplicity in life, in the arts, in all things. So far as the little symphony goes, he is prone, like most apostles of his creed, to mistake himself and his quest—to be merely tepid, naive, a little dull, a little silly, where he intended only to be persuasively simple. It is a very little symphony, barely twenty or twenty-five minutes long, written for strings only and running in three move- ments—a beginning, a slow intervening song and a fugued finale. The melodic ideas are indeed simple to tameness; while the devel- opment and the manipulation of them, in spite of occasional touches of fancy and in- genuity, run much too often to innocent in- sipidity. It is good to hear a composer relying once more upon the manifold voices that the string choir can yield; but Halm is very far from Bach in the fertility with which he contrasts or blends their tones or brightens or shadows their endless tints. Oftenest his instrumental coloring is pallid prettiness. His is "sweet music," and it is a pity that the little company of women in lavender mitts that once tried to give con- certs of such music in London did not know Halm. No doubt our generation is overmuch wedded to the acrid, the bitter, the puissant and the sophisticated in music; but we still have ears that are thrilled by the noble simplicities of Gluck and fascinated by the beautiful simplicities of Mozart. Rightly, in life and the arts, we refuse to be beguiled by the marshmal- low, because therein lie only prettiness and sweetness. Simplicity may be honest and may be affectation, but it must not be silly and it must not be dull. Even Matthew Arnold recoiled at some of Wordsworth's "simplicity," with an "unutterable sense of lamentation and mourning and woe." The audiences of Friday and Saturday politely endured Mr. Halm's.

H. T. P.

Boston Transcript, April 25, 1910

News of Music

In the two years during which Mr. Fied- ler has been the conductor of the Sym- phony Orchestra, he has put on his pro- grammes all of Strauss's tone-poems, ex- cept the seldom played "Macbeth." In the season of 1908-1909 he undertook "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration," "Hel- denleben" and "Zarathustra," and in the season that is just ending he added "Til Eulenspiegel," the "Symphonia Domesti- ca" and, last week, "Don Quixote." He announced "Macbeth" as well, but cir- cumstances have compelled him to defer performance of it until next winter, when he will, doubtless, repeat "Don Quixote" and other of the tone-poems. Little else indeed remains for him and for the orchestra in the music of Strauss. No part of "Electra," seemingly, can be shifted effectually from the theatre to the concert-room; the dance in "Salome" goes none too well without the visible action; and the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," played by Mr. Fiedler at his first concert here, is the merest fragment. Last winter, he clipped the "Sorrento" episode from Strauss's early symphony, "In Italy," and in time, prob- ably, he will revive the whole piece.

While alike under Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler, Strauss's music has had its just place in the Symphony Concerts, Mahler's has been curiously neglected here. Mr. Mahler has now written seven sym- phonies, any and all of which by their in- trinsic interest as well as by the com- poser's place in the world, deserve such performance. Yet only ont of them has ever been heard here—the fifth played with notable success at two pairs of concerts in the final year of Mr. Gericke's conduc- torship. It is true that some of Mr. Mah- ler's symphonies ask a chorus and solo voices as well as an orchestra; but not all or the least interesting of them demand these exceptional forces. It is one of the duties—as well as the glories—of the Sym- phony Orchestra to keep its public in- formed as to the music of our time. Yet except Mr. Gericke and on a single occa- sion, its conductors have uniformly over- looked Mr. Mahler's symphonies. And this very spring Paris, and even Rome, are hearing "festival performances" of the sec- ond—the most eloquent and the hugest of them all.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, APRIL 24, 1910

Don Quixote and His Squire the Modern Moral of the Tale

We understand that the enthusiasm at the conclusion of the performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote" last night in Symphony Hall was yet greater than that displayed on Friday afternoon at the public rehearsal. This enthusiasm is not to be wondered at. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the work was in every respect a masterly achievement. There were not only the big lines and climaxes, but the continuity of the thought which is in the score, but which a conductor may easily loose in treating—or "displaying" might be a better word—"fantastic variations," was never lost. Insensibly one was realizing with more delight the astounding art of the composer, not only in the execution, but in the planning of his enormous canvass. The sequence of the variations, in the first place, is the work of an artist. Moreover, there was not only a rare perfection and clearness in the ensemble, but this proceeded from solo performances which were admirably finished in themselves.

In his 'Zarathustra," Strauss, with his boundless mental capacity, took a course in music which was without precedent save for certain singular pages by Liszt. In "Don Quixote" he has with his thrilling audacity overlapped the boundaries of another art. This is music visualized. To those who heard the performance, and who read in the programme book the masterly comment of Earnest Newman, these paragraphs may be superfluous. To hear the transcendant variations is to have limned in the mind's eye the two figures of the idealist and his "porcine squire." Strauss art is here disclosed in its essence. We do not need to decide whether "Don Quixote" is or is not his greatest orchestral work, whether it will live 10 years or a thousand. It is only important that now the music sounds to us at once a marvellously vivid portrayal of scenery and characteristics, at once a hugely diverting narrative and an all-comprehending critique of the life that we live. It may be replied that these are already characteristics o. Cervantes' book, which deals with such questions with a comprehensiveness impossible in music. But, for this year and this moment, at least, Strauss has made us feel otherwise. Where the words stop, the music may begin. But Strauss does not believe it at all necessary to restrict himself to this formula to reserve for himself merely the pointing of a moral. He describes in detail the personalities of the knight and his servant, and their adventures along life's highway. But when he comes to the great poetic principles of the tale, what lavishness and adequacy of inspiration he displays! To hear this score may well constitute, as it did to the writer, the first real appreciation of the significance of Cervantes' allegory.

There is another important respect in which Strauss surpasses himself. This is in the remarkable economy and condensation of his style. He has long been reproached for the accumulation of means that he employs to reach his ends. We remember, in the much regretted days of our youth, the distrust with which a certain farmer in the State of Maine regarded a modern reaping machine when he beheld it for the first time in a neighbor's field. The fact that this wonderful machine, drawn by four horses, would cut a "swath" eight feet wide, tie the grass into neat bundles, clip the cord and deposit at regular intervals along the way a given number of sheaves in readiness to be stacked, did not move him. He was convinced that such a complicated piece of machinery was going to be destructive in the end to all good farming, although he could not easily explain why. This is the attitude of many anti-Straussites. They do not believe it in reason to employ a stupendous orchestra in depicting the joys of a home, for our fathers did with less. "Even Beethoven in his Pastoral symphony," etc. Well, there are pros and cons, but Don Quixote silences all such objections. There, again, is the enormous orchestra, but it is employed with what is the very highest degree of concentration. Not a note is wasted, not an instrument fails to add a significant tint to the glowing palette. This principle is still further enforced in the melodic and harmonic texture of the tone poem. Strauss' style is nowhere more terse and more graphic—the fewest possible words. He often expresses more in a phrase or a harmonic resolution than a majority of respected composers say in a page. The employment of the prodigious orchestra is the height of daring, but there is never a suspicion of virtuosity for its own sake, and the apt details of "realism" are the finishing, fulfilling touches in a great picture. It is a pity that this performance came so late in the season, for it should be repeated.

It was not possible yesterday to speak of the final part of the programme, the Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," music which embodies as little or no other music does the poetry of Shakespeare, and which remains today as great as the day on which it was written. In the performance of the Overture, which was taken at a very rapid pace, and of the Scherzo, Mr. Fiedler was more fortunate than with the other movements. The Nocturne was taken at a tempo which made it impossible for the hornist to give his long solo the half of its beauty, and in the march the brass was too brassy.

THE ORCHESTRAL CLUB

There was more than ordinary enthusiasm last Tuesday night in Jordan Hall, when Georges Longy conducted the second concert of the season by the Orchestral Club, Mrs. R. J. Hall, president. The programme offered an overture on Russian Themes, by Balakireff; four short organ pieces, by Franck, orchestrated by Henri Busser, one of the conductors at the Paris Opera; "Pleasant Variations on a Serious Theme," Paul Ducasse; a pastorale for saxophone and orchestra, in three movements, by Leon Moreau; "Effet de Nuit," after Verlaine, Silvio Lazzari; Norwegian Rhapsody, Lalo. In the performance of Moreau's piece Mrs. Hall was the solo saxophonist. With the exception of Lalo's Rhapsody, all of the music was heard for the first time in this country, and for her enterprise in this respect alone Mrs. Hall deserves the heartiest thanks of the musical community.

Yet it must be said that Balakireff has written music much worthier of performance than the overture. There is, for instance, the second symphony in D minor, which was published last year, and which should be heard in this country. In his first symphony, played under Dr. Muck during his last season at Symphony Hall, Balakireff showed himself to be far from a born symphonist, yet his score, noisy and the thin as it was here and there, contained much color as well as thematic and rhythmic vitality. The material, mostly of a folkstune nature, was by no means fit for the noble symphonic mould, but, whether as a suite or something more coherent, one could enjoy and even admire many of the skilful details of craftsmanship in the music. As for the overture heard last Tuesday the melodies themselves—there are three—are of a character that is lush and rather commonplace to occidental ears, and as for the score as a whole it is admirable music for the ash-barrel.

Moreau's piece is prettily and fluently written. It employs all of the registers of the solo instrument, the highest as well as the lowest, and one wonders whether on this account some of the passages are as grateful as the player would desire. However this may be, Mrs. Hall's performance was highly artistic, and there was much cordial applause.

Even in Franck's short pieces, some of them unpretentious enough, there is quickly established the sense of his beautiful and exceptional personality. In the midst of passages that breathe only a devout spirit of orthodoxy, there are sudden harmonic shifts which are the inescapable trademark of the great Belgian, and in the melodic lines there is the true simplicity for which so many of Franck's followers have striven, as vainly as they have striven after his serene mastery of his medium. Two of the pieces are so obviously organ music that it seems distasteful to have transcribed them for other instruments. The others lend themselves far more brilliantly to orchestral treatment, and Busser has done a creditable piece of work in his arrangement.

Lazzari's "Effet de Nuit" is effective panorama music, a la Meyerbeer. Verlaine's poem, we are informed on good authority, was attached after the composition of the piece, and this was not a fair thing. Lazzari's music is obvious. After a few measures we soon understand where to expect the crows who feed upon the twisted hanging figures, the tread of the guard, and all the rest of it. Where is the creeping strangeness, the beauty and the rarity of Verlaine's text? Thus do artists insult one another. The orchestral writing is, of course, that of an accomplished musician. But as the Schubert marches lack gunpowder, so does this bugaboo of a nocturne lack the virus of terrible phantasy. And Lalo's Rhapsody is for the casino.

The variations of Ducasse made this concert exceedingly worth while. The week before last Ducasse's suite in the old style was played at the Symphony Concerts, and this was the first music of the composer to be heard in America. Making allowance for an inferior performance of the suite we consider the Variations the most important composition. Whether Ducasse will ever pen a great piece of music is doubtful, but his technical and intellectual equipment are something extraordinary. He is now a young man in the neighborhood of 30. It is appalling to consider the youth of the age. When the composer arrives so great that he can successfully outlive such accomplishments of his young days as Ducasse's, he will surely become a great composer. A cerebral, hard-shelled cerebral, at 20! That's what happens to them today.

Ducasse takes a theme in E-flat minor, a stiff-necked theme, with many an ultra-modern sourness in its harmonic understructure. He examines this theme and then proceeds to vivisect it with his scalpel, a full modern orchestra. He expounds as he goes on: "Now, you see this theme. It is composed, we will say, of 100 harmonious particles. Strange, is it not, to observe that a number of these particles are in their essence very antagonistic to each other? For instance, these—" He holds up two of them and they jangle together. "But you must not think that the union of these two is impossible. Under certain conditions, which are these—now watch!" He goes on. One is astonished, then simply amazed. In an 8-8 plus 1-8 passage he gives us a hint of what might be done rhythmically if he cared this morning to spend his time on that topic. Immediately preceding the last pages of the score is a very remarkable yet prefect logical progression that could only come from a man well acquainted with the methods of Vincent D'Indy. There is beauty in this score, but it is as arid as the Sahara Desert, cold as an icicle, devoid of real vitality as an Egyptian sarcophagus. These variations are in a way the production of genius—the genius of an advanced school that is admiringly dubbed "ultra-modern" by devotees, but which, if it exists at all in the future, will bear the abhorred adjective "academic." The old Netherland masters did the same sort of thing in their day to the same purpose, paving the way for men with real ideas. We were exceedingly interested in these variations. We would like to hear them again, but we wouldn't care to live with them.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 27, 1910

Hear the Other Side

For amusement and also for instruction as to a certain sort of mind—here follows, spelling and all, a letter that purports to have been written last Saturday night, immediately after the Symphony Concert at which Strauss's "Don Quixote" was played. If it was so written, the post office was very tardy with the letter, since it was not delivered until Tuesday morning. The screed runs: "I have heard tonight Don Quixote by Strauss. The Boston Symphony played it. I am home safe again and have just waked my three boys—2—5—8 years old—have given them a glass of jam near by the piano and have set them all three on the piano bench to play to their heart's content— They have always been forbidden to play the piano as their fingers might soil the keys—and they made discords, but now all three are pounding away in different keys the loud pedal is strapped down to the floor and we are all as happy as can be. God bless Strauss for this happy home coming

"They shall play all night I hope to be nearer normal by morning. Of all the accursed sounds I ever heard this Don Quixote was the worst the description says it was intended for a joke—possibly for Strauss "A lamb's ba-a-a is scratched into space by tortured players and instruments Later every instrument rattles as if every joint were loose (I have notified the blacksmith near by that I think many of the instruments needed tightening up and he goes to see the players tomorrow—he should have a busy week—possibly longer) Then the wind blew and beautifully too, as I have heard it many times across the hilltop—the one sane part of the whole performance

"The audience as usual willing to be led seemed rapped up thru the performance—I saw only one honest man there, he sat on the aisle inveigled there by his wife who wore a dog collar—when the convulsion was worst he laughed.

"The audience were delighted and applauded loudly at the end—the sound of the applause was pleasant to the ear and all joined happily in it. A MUSIC LOVER

News of Music

Mr. Fiedler's success with Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in both the quality of the performance and the approval of the audience, ought to encourage him to undertake next year Liszt's other and much less familiar symphony—the symphony upon Dante's "Divine Comedy" for orchestra and women's chorus. It runs in two long movements, an "Inferno" and a "Purgatorio," with a third, the "Magnificat," for climax in which the female voices enter. The "Dante" symphony is often as interesting as the "Faust," and it has not been performed here since the eighties.

The Boston Opera announces that such seats as are not taken by the stockholders in the allotment, on Thursday, of pla... next season, will be available ... publi... general

BOSTON JOURNAL-

APRIL 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEASON DRAWS TO A CLOSE

All-Beethoven Program Is Enjoyed by Large Audience.

CECILIA SOCIETY AIDS ORCHESTRA

Extra Applause Is Given Conductor Fiedler for His Skilful Leadership.

An all-Beethoven program, the first and last of the immortal nine symphonies, is closing the Symphony season. Yesterday afternoon's concert was attended by one of the largest audiences of the season. There was extra applause for Conductor Fiedler before and after the concert. On the whole, through his breadth of view, and his skilful, enthusiastic leadership, he has made this twenty-ninth season interesting to all sorts and conditions of music-lovers.

The reading of the first Beethoven symphony, which had not been performed since Dr. Muck's regime, was greatly enjoyed. All the beauties of the work were revealed sparkling clear in the sunshine of one of Beethoven's happiest moods. The greater Beethoven, however, loomed forth in the ninth symphony.

In the performance of this majestic composition the orchestra had the assistance of the Cecilia Society and of the following soloists: Soprano, Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss; contralto, Miss Margaret Keyes; tenor, Berrick von Norden; bass, Frederick Weld. The singers did remarkably well with music that, a century ago, must have seemed as far-fetched as anything Strauss has written seems today.

The thirteenth Symphony season will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, with Mr. Fiedler beginning the first half of his new two-year engagement.

Pop Concerts to Open on Monda...

Next Monday night Symphony Hall performs its annual descent from the mountain peaks of Strauss, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner to what for many people are the more genial climes populated by the lesser masters of music who have been content to write catchy tunes and stop at that. In other words, on Monday evening, the Pops begin with Gustav Strube as conductor.

By Monday night the formal seats on the floor of Symphony Hall will have been taken away and put in storage and their places will be taken by tables and chairs. The big refrigerator which has lain idle since last July will be filled with ice and other things and then in truth Boston will realize that summer is at hand.

As has been the rule in recent years, the orchestra, chosen, of course, from members of the Symphony Orchestra, will consist of fifty-five musicians.

The program will not differ radically from those of past years. Old favorites will be played and there will be the usual amount of new music. Concerts will be given every evening except Sunday, from Monday evening, May 2, until Saturday evening, July 2, and they will begin at 8 o'clock and end in the neighborhood of 10. As in past years refreshments may be secured and

THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, APRIL 24, 1910

Don Quixote and His Squire the Modern Moral of the Tale

We understand that the enthusiasm at the conclusion of the performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote" last night in Symphony Hall was yet greater than that displayed on Friday afternoon at the public rehearsal. This enthusiasm is not to be wondered at. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the work was in every respect a masterly achievement. There were not only the big lines and climaxes, but the continuity of the thought which is in the score, but which a conductor may easily loose in treating—or "displaying" might be a better word—"fantastic variations," was never lost. Insensibly one was realizing with more delight the astounding art of the composer, not only in the execution,—but in the planning of his enormous canvass. The sequence of the variations, in the first place, is the work of an artist. Moreover, there was not only a rare perfection and clearness in the ensemble, but this proceeded from solo performances which were admirably finished in themselves.

In his "Zarathustra," Strauss, with his boundless mental capacity, took a course in music which was without precedent save for certain singular pages by Liszt. In "Don Quixote" he has with his thrilling audacity overlapped the boundaries of another art. This is music visualized. To those who heard the performance, and who read in the programme book the masterly comment of Earnest Newman, these paragraphs may be superfluous. To hear the transcendant variations is to have limned in the mind's eye the two figures of the idealist and his "porcine squire." Strauss art is here disclosed in its essence. We do not need to decide whether "Don Quixote" is or is not his greatest orchestral work, whether it will live 10 years or a thousand. It is only important that now the music sounds to us at once a marvellously vivid portrayal of scenery and characteristics, at once a hugely diverting narrative and an all-comprehending critique of the life that we live. It may be replied that these are already characteristics of Cervantes' book, which deals with such questions with a comprehensiveness impossible in music. But, for this year and this moment, at least, Strauss has made us feel otherwise. Where the words stop, the music may begin. But Strauss does not believe it at all necessary to restrict himself to this formula to reserve for himself merely the pointing of a moral. He describes in detail the personalities of the knight and his servant, and their adventures along life's highway. But when he comes to the great poetic principles of the tale, what lavishness and adequacy of inspiration he displays! To hear this score may well constitute, as it did to the writer, the first real appreciation of the significance of Cervantes' allegory.

There is another important respect in which Strauss surpasses himself. This is in the remarkable economy and condensation of his style. He has long been reproached for the accumulation of means that he employs to reach his ends. We remember, in the much regretted days of our youth, the distrust with which a certain farmer in the State of Maine regarded a modern reaping machine when he beheld it for the first time in a neighbor's field. The fact that this wonderful machine, drawn by four horses, would cut a "swath" eight feet wide, tie the grass into neat bundles, clip the cord and deposit at regular intervals along the way a given number of sheaves in readiness to be stacked, did not move him. He was convinced that such a complicated piece of machinery was going to be destructive in the end to all good farming, although he could not easily explain why. This is the attitude of many anti-Straussites. They do not believe it in reason to employ a stupendous orchestra in depicting the joys of a home, for our fathers did with less. "Even Beethoven in his Pastoral symphony," etc. Well, there are pros and cons, but Don Quixote silences all such objections. There, again, is the enormous orchestra, but it is employed with what is the very highest degree of concentration. Not a note is wasted, not an instrument fails to add a significant tint to the glowing palette. This principle is still further enforced in the melodic and harmonic texture of the tone poem. Strauss' style is nowhere more terse and more graphic—the fewest possible words. He often expresses more in a phrase or a harmonic resolution than a majority of respected composers say in a page. The employment of the prodigious orchestra is the height of daring, but there is never a suspicion of virtuosity for its own sake, and the apt details of "realism" are the finishing, fulfilling touches in a great picture. It is a pity that this performance came so late in the season, for it should be repeated.

It was not possible yesterday to speak of the final part of the programme, the Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," music which embodies as little or no other music does the poetry of Shakespeare, and which remains today as great as the day on which it was written. In the performance of the Overture, which was taken at a very rapid pace, and of the Scherzo, Mr. Fiedler was more fortunate than with the other movements. The Nocturne was taken at a tempo which made it impossible for the hornist to give his long solo the half of its beauty, and in the march the brass was too brassy.

THE ORCHESTRAL CLUB

There was more than ordinary enthusiasm last Tuesday night in Jordan Hall, when Georges Longy conducted the second concert of the season by the Orchestral Club, Mrs. R. J. Hall, president. The programme offered an overture on Russian Themes, by Balakireff; four short organ pieces, by Franck, orchestrated by Henri Busser, one of the conductors at the Paris Opera; "Pleasant Variations on a Serious Theme," Paul Ducasse; a pastorale for saxophone and orchestra, in three movements, by Leon Moreau; "Effet de Nuit," after Verlaine, Silvio Lazzari; Norwegian Rhapsody, Lalo. In the performance of Moreau's piece Mrs. Hall was the solo saxophonist. With the exception of Lalo's Rhapsody, all of the music was heard for the first time in this country, and for her enterprise in this respect alone Mrs. Hall deserves the heartiest thanks of the musical community.

Yet it must be said that Balakireff has written music much worthier of performance than the overture. There is, for instance, the second symphony in D minor, which was published last year, and which should be heard in this country. In his first symphony, played under Dr. Muck during his last season at Symphony Hall, Balakireff showed himself to be far from a born symphonist, yet his score, noisy and the thin as it was here and there, contained much color as well as thematic and rhythmic vitality. The material, mostly of a folkstune nature, was by no means fit for the noble symphonic mould, but, whether as a suite or something more coherent, one could enjoy and even admire many of the skilful details of craftsmanship in the music. As for the overture heard last Tuesday the melodies themselves—there are three—are of a character that is lush and rather commonplace to occidental ears, and as for the score as a whole it is admirable music for the ash-barrel.

Moreau's piece is prettily and fluently written. It employs all of the registers of the solo instrument, the highest as well as the lowest, and one wonders whether on this account some of the passages are as grateful as the player would desire. However this may be, Mrs. Hall's performance was highly artistic, and there was much cordial applause.

Even in Franck's short pieces, some of them unpretentious enough, there is quickly established the sense of his beautiful and exceptional personality. In the midst of passages that breathe only a devout spirit of orthodoxy, there are sudden harmonic shifts which are the inescapable trademark of the great Belgian, and in the melodic lines there is the true simplicity for which so many of Franck's followers have striven, as vainly as they have striven after his serene mastery of his medium. Two of the pieces are so obviously organ music that it seems distasteful to have transcribed them for other instruments. The others lend themselves far more brilliantly to orchestral treatment, and Busser has done a creditable piece of work in his arrangement.

Lazzari's "Effet de Nuit" is effective panorama music, a la Meyerbeer. Verlaine's poem, we are informed on good authority, was attached after the composition of the piece, and this was not a fair thing. Lazzari's music is obvious. After a few measures we soon understand where to expect the crows who feed upon the twisted hanging figures, the tread of the guard, and all the rest of it. Where is the creeping strangeness, the beauty and the rarity of Verlaine's text? Thus do artists insult one another. The orchestral writing is, of course, that of an accomplished musician. But as the Schubert marches lack gunpowder, so does this bugaboo of a nocturne lack the virus of terrible phantasy. And Lalo's Rhapsody is for the casino.

The variations of Ducasse made this concert exceedingly worth while. The week before last Ducasse's suite in the old style was played at the Symphony Concerts, and this was the first music of the composer to be heard in America. Making allowance for an inferior performance of the suite we consider the Variations the most important composition. Whether Ducasse will ever pen a great piece of music is doubtful, but his technical and intellectual equipment are something extraordinary. He is now a young man, in the neighborhood of 30. It is appalling to consider the youth of the age. When the composer arrives so great that he can successfully outlive such accomplishments of his young days as Ducasse's, he will surely become a great composer. A cerebral, hard-shelled cerebral, at 80! That's what happens to them today.

Ducasse takes a theme in E-flat minor, a stiff-necked theme, with many an ultra-modern sourness in its harmonic understructure. He examines this theme and then proceeds to vivisect it with his scalpel, a full modern orchestra. He expounds as he goes on: "Now, you see this theme. It is composed, we will say, of 100 harmonious particles. Strange, is it not, to observe that a number of these particles are in their essence very antagonistic to each other? For instance, these—" He holds up two of them and they jangle together. "But you must not think that the union of these two is impossible. Under certain conditions, which are these—now watch!" He goes on. One is astonished, then simply amazed. In an 8-8 plus 1-8 passage he gives us a hint of what might be done rhythmically if he cared this morning to spend his time on that topic. Immediately preceding the last pages of the score is a very remarkabley yet prefect logical progression that could only come from a man well acquainted with the methods of Vincent D'Indy. There is beauty in this score, but it is as arid as the Sahara Desert, cold as an icicle, devoid of real vitality as an Egyptian sarcophagus. These variations are in a way the production of genius—the genius of an advanced school that is admiringly dubbed "ultra-modern" by devotees, but which, if it exists at all in the future, will bear the abhorred adjective "academic." The old Netherland masters did the same sort of thing in their day to the same purpose, paving the way for men with real ideas. We were exceedingly interested in these variations. We would like to hear them again, but we wouldn't care to live with them.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

APRIL 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEASON DRAWS TO A CLOSE

All-Beethoven Program Is Enjoyed by Large Audience.

CECILIA SOCIETY AIDS ORCHESTRA

Extra Applause Is Given Conductor Fiedler for His Skilful Leadership.

An all-Beethoven program, the first and last of the immortal nine symphonies, is closing the Symphony season. Yesterday afternoon's concert was attended by one of the largest audiences of the season. There was extra applause for Conductor Fiedler before and after the concert. On the whole, through his breadth of view, and his skilful, enthusiastic leadership, he has made this twenty-ninth season interesting to all sorts and conditions of music-lovers.

The reading of the first Beethoven symphony, which had not been performed since Dr. Muck's regime, was greatly enjoyed. All the beauties of the work were revealed sparkling clear in the sunshine of one of Beethoven's happiest moods. The greater Beethoven, however, loomed forth in the ninth symphony.

In the performance of this majestic composition the orchestra had the assistance of the Cecilia Society and of the following soloists: Soprano, Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss; contralto, Miss Margaret Keyes; tenor, Berrick von Norden; bass, Frederick Weld. The singers did remarkably well with music that, a century ago, must have seemed as far-fetched as anything Strauss has written seems today.

The thirteenth Symphony season will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, with Mr. Fiedler beginning the first half of his new two-year engagement.

Pop Concerts to Open on Monda

Next Monday night Symphony Hall performs its annual descent from the mountain peaks of Strauss, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner to what for many people are the more genial climes populated by the lesser masters of music who have been content to write catchy tunes and stop at that. In other words, on Monday evening, the Pops begin with Gustav Strube as conductor.

By Monday night the formal seats on the floor of Symphony Hall will have been taken away and put in storage and their places will be taken by tables and chairs. The big refrigerator which has lain idle since last July will be filled with ice and other things and then in truth Boston will realize that summer is at hand.

As has been the rule in recent years, the orchestra, chosen, of course, from members of the Symphony Orchestra, will consist of fifty-five musicians.

The program will not differ radically from those of past years. Old favorites will be played and there will be the usual amount of new music. Concerts will be given every evening except Sunday, from Monday evening, May 2, until Saturday evening, July 2, and they will begin at 8 o'clock and end in the neighborhood of 2. As in past years light refreshments may be secured and smoking is allowed.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 27, 1910

Hear the Other Side

For amusement and also for instruction - as to a certain sort of mind—here follows, spelling and all, a letter that purports to have been written last Saturday night, immediately after the Symphony Concert at which Strauss's "Don Quixote" was played. If it was so written, the post office was very tardy with the letter, since it was not delivered until Tuesday morning. The screed runs: "I have heard tonight Don Quixote by Strauss. The Boston Symphony played it. I am home safe again and have just waked my three boys—2—5—8 years old—have given them a glass of jam near by the piano and have set them all three on the piano bench to play to their heart's content— They have always been forbidden to play the piano as their fingers might soil the keys—and they made discords, but now all three are pounding away in different keys the loud pedal is strapped down to the floor and we are all as happy as can be. God bless Strauss for this happy home coming

"They shall play all night I hope to be nearer normal by morning. Of all the accursed sounds I ever heard this Don Quixote was the worst the description says it was intended for a joke—possibly for Strauss "A lamb's ba-a-a is scratched into space by tortured players and instruments Later every instrument rattles as if every joint were loose (I have notified the blacksmith near by that I think many of the instruments needed tightening up and he goes to see the players tomorrow—he should have a busy week—possibly longer) Then the wind blew and beautifully too, as I have heard it many times across the hilltop—the one sane part of the whole performance

"The audience as usual willing to be led seemed rapped up thru the performance—I saw only one honest man there, he sat on the aisle inveigled there by his wife who wore a dog collar—when the convulsion was worst he laughed.

"The audience were delighted and applauded loudly at the end—the sound of the applause was pleasant to the ear and all joined happily in it. A Music Lover

News of Music

Mr. Fiedler's success with Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in both the quality of the performance and the approval of the audience, ought to encourage him to undertake next year Liszt's other and much less familiar symphony—the symphony upon Dante's "Divine Comedy" for orchestra and women's chorus. It runs in two long movements, an "Inferno" and a "Purgatorio," with a third, the "Magnificat," for climax in which the female voices enter. The "Dante" symphony is often as interesting as the "Faust," and it has not been performed here since the eighties.

The Boston Opera announces that such seats as are not taken by the stockholders in the allotment, on Thursday, of pla... next season, will be available ... ard" for subscri... general public.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 29, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CECILIA

New and Old Officers Elected, and a Discussion of the Proposed Co-operation with the Symphony Orchestra—The General Favor with Which It Was Received, and the Likelihood That It Will Be Accomplished — Mr. Hess Begins His Leave-Taking—The Editors' Garland for Mr. Hammerstein—Wagner and Debussy —Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" to Be Played in Germany—Mr. Gatti's Guarded Opinion of Mr. Converse's Opera — The Programme of the Strauss Festival at Munich

The annual meeting of the Cecilia Society was held last night, and while no decisive action was taken as to coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra next year, there were many signs that a substantial and influential body of the members favor such a change of policy and that it is likely to prevail. The society first proceeded to the election of officers and chose them as follows: President, Reginald C. Robbins; vice president, Francis A. Shove; clerk, Charles S. Norris; treasurer, Henry S. Grew, 2d; librarian, George H. Rose; directors, Arthur Foote, George O. G. Coale, J. Russell Abbott, and Malcolm Lang; trustee of Permanent Fund, George P. Gardner. The society was fortunate, especially when it seems likely to embark upon a new policy, in the election of so able and energetic a man as Mr. Robbins to the presidency, and in the willingness of Mr. Foote, who has long served the Cecilia wisely and wholeheartedly to continue as a member of the executive committee; while Mr. Lang links the promising present to the honorable past of the society.

The meeting then proceeded to an informal discussion of the actual situation of the Society and its choir, and of the course that they might most wisely and advantageously follow in the future. In the course of the discussion, it appeared that the management and the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra would welcome the coöperation of the Cecilia; and that it would be a truly mutual coöperation. That is to say, while the Cecilia would join the Symphony Orchestra when it had need of a choir in music that exacted both a band and a chorus, the Symphony Orchestra in its turn would join the Cecilia for its choral concerts. Thus, it was suggested that three such concerts should be undertaken next year with the full forces of the Symphony Orchestra aiding and probably with the assistance of much more eminent singers than the Cecilia has employed in recent years. It was further proposed to increase the number of the choir to 200 voices, and to give due time and labor to the study of part-songs and choral music à capella. Finally, the decision as to coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra was left to the officers of the society, after further examination of the actualities of the situation, further conferences with the management of the orchestra and with the members of the chorus. It was evident, however, that the weight of opinion was on the side of coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra; and that as soon as various minor matters can be adjusted, decisive action will be taken to that end.

It is much to be hoped that these anticipations will be fulfilled, since the coöperation of the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra promises advantage to both, to their publics, and to the musical life, pleasures and profit of Boston. Oftener and oftener the Symphony Orchestra has need of a coöperating choir for music that the conductor would bring to performance; and such a choir must be at hand and of like quality in its kind with the Symphony Orchestra in its. The Cecilia fulfils this need and upholds a similar standard. On the other hand, the Cecilia, in the present mood of our public toward choral concerts and after its own vicissitudes in recent years, needs the prestige that the coöperation of the Symphony Orchestra and of eminent singers would bring to its choral concerts; the eager audience that such an alliance would attract; and the high standard of mutual endeavor and performance that such affiliation would exact. The management of the Symphony Orchestra is counted the world over a model of efficient wisdom and freedom from self-interest, and thus, again, coöperation with it would profit the Cecilia. The Symphony Orchestra has gradually set and insistently maintained the standards of orchestral music in Boston and now it enjoys the fruits of such righteousness and persistence. The Cecilia, in its time, has done as much for the standards of choral music; but its recent years have been years of vicissitude and it has sometimes missed its just reward. Unmistakably it was beginning to decline from its just and high place in our musical life. The coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra, by most signs that discreet foresight can read, promises to restore these rewards and this place. A few weeks at the utmost bid fair to consummate the change.

H. T. P.

Mr. Hess's Final Appearances

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra today and tomorrow, Mr. Hess will sit for the last times in his place as the concert-master of the band, and yesterday at Cambridge, he appeared with it for the last time—at least for some years to come—as a virtuoso in his own right. He will give no "farewell concert" of his own, though personal friends and an admiring public have urged him to it; and he will depart next week to his work and his new life in Berlin. For a time, since the cares of the Hoch-Schule and the concerts of the Halir Quartet are exacting, Mr. Hess is likely to have no opportunity to revisit America. Succession to Joachim's work, in and out of the school, is indeed exacting. With the years, however, Mr. Hess will earn his right to brief absences and in one or more of these he intends to revisit America as a virtuoso of the violin. Thus, and wisely and modestly, he has been shy of formal leave-takings.

Yet the sense of impending departure was clearly upon the violinist and his audience last night in Sanders Theatre. It was filled, as it always is for the concerts of the orchestra, to its last place, and Mr. Hess's particular circle in Boston had eagerly sought what seats the subscribers left untaken. The audience warmly applauded him as he came to the stage to perform Mendelssohn's concerto; the clapping waxed with each pause in the piece; and at the close he was thrice and ardently recalled, while his colleagues of the string choir and of the whole orchestra were as eager with their plaudits as were the mere listeners. As the "soloist" of the evening, Mr. Hess had been absent from his usual place through the first part of the concert; he resumed it for Strauss's "Domestica" which filled the second part, and again hearty applause welcomed him. Finally, in the ante-room, after the concert was done, his more intimate acquaintance in Cambridge had their leave-takings.

As ungracious fate will sometimes have it on such occasions, Mr. Hess has played Mendelssohn's concerto more equably than he did last night—and notably when he revived the piece at a concert for the Pension Fund last autumn. He was plainly nervous yesterday; he paid the penalty in a tendency to play a little sharp; and he was not wholly within himself throughout the first movement. He commanded his usual elasticity and elegance of technical resource and accomplishment, but he had not quite his usual sureness. His tone had its familiar brilliancy, suppleness and felicity of shading, but not quite, again, its usual suavity and rich transparency. He summoned the fine and intimate emotion of Menedelssohn's music, as so much ordered, beautiful and a little rhapsodic sound, but he summoned it with effort. With the Andante and the long and gentle curve of its song, Mr. Hess was altogether himself again, and he played it with a beauty of sustained and flowing tone, with a fineness of melodic line, a delicacy of incidental ornament, a justness of feeling for Mendelssohn's gentle lyric voice, and an elegance and unobtrusive perfection of style that once more made him seem the virtuoso who if he had chosen, could have gone up and down the world side by side with some of his more renowned brethren. And in the finale, he regained altogether his characteristic brillance and vitality. The music is rhapsody—the elation of brilliant play with sound for its own sake—and Mr. Hess made it yet more rhapsodical, while effort never once seamed brilliance or clouded style. The Hess who played these two movements of the concerto was indeed the Hess who is worthily to succeed to Joachim's work, because he, too, is an affectionate master of the secrets of the violin and of the style that caresses or compels them to speech. He is the worthier, for these days, because he adds to this mastery and this style the sensitiveness of imagination and the warmth of feeling that are their spiritually animating force.

H. T. P.

Wagner and Debussy

Then came Wagner, just at the time when harmony was beginning to exhaust its purely diatonic resources—at least on the basis of the ordinary scale of Europe, and to show that there was an unexplored ocean of chromatic possibility. Into this ocean Wagner plunged and brought out with him a treasure trove of chromatic harmony which staggered the world. Chromatic harmony lent itself to the expression of emotions that the older diatonic harmony could not touch. Wagner was like the fisherman in the "Arabian Nights," who uncorked the bottle—he let loose upon the world the genie of emotional chromatic possibility in music, which would not suffer itself to be squeezed back into its narrow prison again. The bottle proved also to be something of a Pandora's box, for in opening it certainly a horde of ills was let loose upon the world.

The result is that the world has been going through a most peculiar and dangerous period in the art of music. Enthusiasm for color and emotion brought a recklessness and a disregard for the old art of melodic line. An erotic musical age came upon the world, an age threatening the very existence of music. From that age we are just beginning to emerge. After Wagner came the chromatic deluge, and composers were so utterly lost in its rainbow mists that they could not see or conceive any tangible shape whatsoever. There came to be a great alternative. Either music must vanish in the fiery mists of eroticism, or somebody must strike out some bold lines. But what lines? The world could not turn back to the old and usual lines suggested by the old diatonic scale.

And then came Debussy—with a line. This life-line was the line of the old Gregorian scales, an outcome of the Catholic influence in France. And when Debussy began blowing his rainbow-hued soap bubbles out of his Gregorian pipe he had something for the world to wonder at. He was the first one to come out of the post-Wagnerian mists with a new and wholly lucid personality. He comes too freshly out of the erotic mists. There is too much of that about him. But, on the other hand, he is a hero for coming out at all. [Musical

BOSTON POST, APRIL 30, 1910

Great Ninth Symphony as Season's Farewell

BY OLIN DOWNES

Max Fiedler was greeted with cordial applause when he took his stand yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall to direct the last public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this season. After the concert the audience was slow to take its leave, remaining to applaud once more, to signify its appreciation of the season past, and its anticipation of the one to come, and to take leave of Mr. Hess, the departing concertmeister, who will now hie him to Berlin.

These soloists, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society, assisted in the performance of the great symphony: Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Margaret Keyes, contralto; Berrick van Norden, tenor; Frederic Weld, bass. All in all, the playing of the first symphony was admirable for its clearness and continence, for the justness with which Mr. Fiedler adhered to the style of its period. They did not use tubas in those days, but it only required the lifetime of one man to stretch from the biggest orchestra of Haydn to the magnificent tonal orgies of the romanticists. That man was Ludwig van Beethoven.

But it is a pity that in his last days the greatest romanticist of them all did not make as revoluionary innovations in his orchestra as he did in his scores. The first movement of the ninth symphony cries out for the sonority of today. This movement is cosmic, as is the scherzo. One stirs the memory in vain to discover the equal of its immensity in musical literature. It seems, after all, that there were giants in other days, whose memories would be myths, if it were not for notes and paper. No one has made such records of the infinite that presses upon us as Beethoven. The gods were young when his first movement was conceived. There is hardly anything so thrilling as its climaxes, unless, indeed, it is the wonderful entrance of the second theme or phrase—the ideal—and the stupendous conclusion.

Finally Beethoven places man in the midst of his cosmos. The performance of the chorus was continually remarkable. The words, "Before God," and certain measures towards the end of the choral fugue, were especially memorable. The whole performnace gave evidence of unusually careful preparation, and of Mr. Fiedler's devotion to the music. His conception was of the highest, and enforced by a fine enthusiasm. He made himself felt. The music for the quartet is not grateful for the executants, and it requires singers of unusual skill. These measures were conscientiously interpreted.

After the concert, when Mr. Fiedler had acknowledged a warm farewell, there were calls for Mr. Hess, whom the conductor led by the arm to the front of the stage.

BOSTON GLOBE, APRIL 30, 1910

FINAL REHEARSAL.

Fiedler's Men Bring Their Season to Close.

First and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven Are Played.

Under Mr Henschel's regime it was customary to close the orchestral season of concerts with Beethoven's ninth (choral) symphony. Yesterday afternoon, at the 24th and last rehearsal of the present year, Mr Fiedler returned to the former custom. Preceding the last of the master's symphonies he placed the first. The afternoon thus became an exposition in the development of the symphony.

The choral portions of the ninth were sung yesterday by the Cecilia society. The quartet of solo singers was as follows: Mrs Mary Hissem de Moss soprano, Miss Margaret Keyes contralto, Berrick von Norden tenor and Frederick Weld bass.

Beethoven wrote his first symphony when he was 30 years old. He wrote the ninth 23 years later. In the first are evidences of originality and to a purpose. Beethoven communed more with nature and with his own spirit than with men. His writing was largely autobiographical.

Compare the introductions of the two works. In that of the first, he is at once daring for his time. The symphony is in C (major). He begins with a dominant chord of the seventh in F and immediately resolves it. He has a deceptive cadence in the second measure and another modulation in the third.

Once over this short opening adagio—an observance of the old tradition which Haydn rarely broke—the allegro follows with its clearly defined, well contrasted themes, the first brisk, nervous and impetuous, the second of graceful, plaintive character and appropriately found in the woodwind.

The three parts of the movement are now of the clearest possible structure. The terse, summarizing coda is pointedly reminiscent of the first theme. The movement is a lucid example of sonata form.

The first movement of the ninth appears too charged with unrest, turbulence and even rebellion to submit to the boundaries, relationship or laws of form. Phrases and figures follow with a seemingly chaotic independence of each other. Themes and melodic passages flow one into the other untrammeled by the demands of a customary form, but glowing with the vitalizing power of a masterful individuality.

The opportunity yesterday for a study of the two works in contrast made it the easier to note how intolerant of the restraint or dictate of precedent the older Beethoven had grown, how more imperiously independent in his ways and means of speech, and necessarily, because of the bonds of his deafness, how more inwardly impelled to expression by the broadening vision and deepening experience of his own life.

Whether or not he intensified or detracted from the sublimity of the latter symphony by adding voices to his orchestra and by causing them to give vocal and verbal utterance to Schiller's "Ode to Joy," may be debatable. Certain it is that neither the writing for chorus nor for quartet is vocal in any ordinary acceptation of the term.

The exacting hight of the soprano part, both for solo and chorus, were no impediment yesterday. The chorus sang throughout with spirit, intelligence and a splendid body of tone.

The quartet executed the 10 exacting bars of adagio before the final allegro with precision and clarity of instruments and the less conspicuous passages with commendable surety.

The performance by Mr Fiedler and the orchestra was beyond reproach. The perfection of ensemble was realized.

RECORD, MAY 3, 1910

THE POPS BEGIN THE SEASON

By Louis C. Elson.

Last night, in Symphony hall, the Popular Concerts for this season began with much eclat. The King is dead, Long Live the Crown Prince! The Symphonies are ended, the moistened music has begun. Judging by the welcome given to Mr. Strube and his band the old Latin saying can be altered into "Nox Populi, Nox Dei"—that is, "the 'Pop' nights are divine." The programme last night was:—

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Du und Du".....Strauss
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
"Meditation" from "Thais".....Massenet
(Solo, Violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann)
Humoresque.....Dvorak
Selection, "Samson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Selection, "The Midnight Sons".....Hubbell
Waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier"....Strauss
March "Kaiser Friedrich".....Friedemann

As usual, Part II contained the nub of the concert. In this the melodious "Rienzi" overture proved that tuneful music will continue to exist in the teeth of all "theories" whatsoever, and Wagner is here a strong proof against himself. He may discard the overture all that he wishes to, the public will not follow suit.

For a sensuous and languishing foil to this there was the Massenet "Meditation" with the obbligato played by Mr. Jaques Hoffman, and very finely played. Then the graceful but not humorous "Humoresque" by Dvorak. Encores were in evidence and the audience was evidently "en rapport" with Mr. Strube's good reading of the well-contrasted numbers. But detailed criticism is scarcely in place here. People came for enjoyment and got what they came for. Therefore the Muse comes forward for a "farewell appearance," and chants thus:—

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Boston came with whetted appetite.

There were no puzzles by some modern Sphinx,
But pleasant melodies combined with drinks.

The old complexities were past and gone,
Though Strauss was there, not Richard now, but John.

And people soared upon celestial wings,
Refreshed by Music and by other things.

'Tis sometimes pleasant, all, we think, agree,
To take your "Tannhauser" without the "T".

To hear, while sipping produce of the Vat,
The horse's tail scrape bowels of the Cat.

Such programmes do not overtax the brain
And all are glad the Pops have come again.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEASON ENDS WITH BEETHOVEN

ITS FIRST AND HIS LAST SYMPHONIES PRESENTED

Warm Appreciation of Mr. Fiedler Shown by the Audience All the Afternoon.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. First Symphony.
Beethoven. Ninth Symphony.

These constitute, as Mrs. Malaprop would say, the Albany and the Omaha of symphonic composition. It does not matter if Elgar, Paderewski and others have made symphonies that last as long as Beethoven's ninth, they may equal it in length but never in breadth. It was a good idea to put Beethoven's first in juxta-position with his last, showing the growth of symphonic form in a nutshell. The first shows a giant in embryo, while the ninth reveals him in all his strength.

It is interesting, in the first symphony, to note how coming events threw their shadows before. The very first notes are like a gauntlet thrown down to the critics. A symphony in C that begins with a cadence in the key of F! That was a hard nut to crack in the first year of the nineteenth century, when the new symphonic dispensation began.

Then the Minuet has a freedom that Haydn never dreamed of when he admitted this elegant dance as a regular symphonic movement. It was not until two years later, in the second symphony, that Beethoven threw the Minuet out of the symphonic ark and replaced it with the Scherzo, but this Minuet of the first symphony is a Minuet only in name; it is more of a Scherzo than the Scherzo of the second symphony.

Only in the genial but conventional Finale is the spirit of the old symphony carried out. The Finale, although a sonata-allegro in shape, is a Rondo in spirit, and even leans to that form by the final reappearance of the chief theme in the Coda. The tentative scales with which it begins are also very different from the Beethoven of later times and were actually cut out by some of the early conductors as being too trivial. But it is only in the finale that Beethoven becomes a copy of his teacher—Haydn.

The symphony is an easy affair technically for our orchestra, and was played with a straightforward style that had its especial attraction and charm. Only we found the introduction to the first and also that of the last movement a trifle too slow. The kettle-drum had enough to do both in the first and last symphonies. In the first symphony its important passages were innovations in 1800, at the first performance.

The Ninth Symphony brought out a good chorus, which was furnished by the Cecilia Society and a fine quartette of soloists, consisting of Mrs. Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Mr. Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Mr. Frederick Weld, bass. The impression of unsingability of the final movement remained, in spite of the excellence of the vocal forces. Beethoven treated his voices as if they had been oboes, flutes or clarinettes, forgetting that a human voice does not, like an instrument, remain the same after the strain of a high passage, or a set of difficult phrases.

Mr. Fiedler loves his Beethoven and there was evidence of this in the care with which the details of the work were given. The Coda of the opening Allegro, with its great wave of tone, crescendo and diminuendo, was grandly caught up, the deep strings being especially majestic.

The Scherzo with its ever present Dactyl in development was given with hearty power. It is rather grotesque than playful. The kettle-drum here gave its unusual octave figure with appropriate vigor. A slightly slower pace would not have harmed this movement.

The beautiful slow movement, with its two themes in contrasted variation, is to us the most poetic movement, and when one thinks of this tender composition as the work of a man totally deaf one is lost in wonder. The horn had some moments of difficulty in this, but Beethoven was frequently merciless to this instrument.

The finale opens with the greatest dialogue that ever was given in Music. The puny dialogues of the "William Tell" overture, or the "Symphonie Fantastique," shrivel up before this dialogue of the suffering world with its Redeemer. And what a bridge to the voices is made by the wonderful phrases of the contrabasses! These heavy instruments were played with a delicacy that deserves cordial recognition.

It may be borne in mind also that the transference of figures from preceding movements into the Finale, which is a frequent device nowadays, was first introduced in this symphony. But the theme itself, which Beethoven chose for his variations here, is after all but a street-song—a "Gassenhauer"—and bears a close relationship to "Yankee Doodle." It is scarcely the melody one would have chosen to celebrate the millennium with.

But the frantic joy which permeates it at the last is your true Beethoven. He was singing of the era of universal brotherhood, and nothing in the world moved him more than such a topic.

To work up this climax as Beethoven thought it was well nigh impossible, yet, on this occasion the impossible was accomplished. The very trying skips were accomplished without apparent effort, and even the high phrases of the sopranos of the chorus were accomplished with the minimum of screaming.

The quartette was in the main very well balanced. The cadenza work was taken rather slower than we have heard it, but this at least made it the more clear and free from blur. But it is an ungrateful work for all the vocalists concerned. We may remember that it is now sung about a semi-tone above the pitch in which Beethoven wrote it, but even if it were lowered a semitone we would still think Beethoven a vocal barbarian.

His idea of Joy is always a combination of Frenzy and Fourth of July, as witness the delirious end of "Fidelio," and of the "Egmont" overture, and of this symphony. His musical happiness was generally at the highest pressure. But to find these technical flaws is not to condemn the work. It is, was, and will ever remain the grandest of symphonies, and this performance of it may rank with the greatest. Mr. Fiedler was cordially greeted at the beginning of the concert, but yet more so after he had completed his herculean task.

MUSIC NOTE.

Alwyn Schroeder, the eminent violoncellist, has rejoined the Boston symphony orchestra as first 'cellist beginning with the next season.

HERALD,

MAY 1, 1910—

THE POPS.

The season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow evening, (Monday, May 2) with the usual orchestra of 55 Symphony players and with Gustav Strube as conductor. With the exception of one year, 1890, when the Pops were omitted owing to the failure of the management to secure a license, these concerts have been a unique feature of the spring in Boston since 1885. In that year, at the end of the regular Symphony season, a series of popular concerts modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, was given in the old Music Hall three times a week, first on Wednesday and Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and then on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings, with the late Adolph Neuendorff as conductor. These first popular concerts did not introduce the features of tables with smoking and refreshments, but they were so successful that at the end of June it was decided to take out the seats of the old Music Hall, put in tables and greenery and have what were then known as "Promenade" concerts. These promenade concerts were successful from the beginning and ran through from the end of June to the latter part of September. The next year there were no popular concerts in the sense of those given the year before by Mr. Neuendorff, but the promenade concerts began in May and continued throughout the whole summer under the conductorship of John Mullaly, who is still one of the valued first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is a rather curious fact that Boston has been the only city able to support such concerts for anything like such a term of years.

During the season of 1910 the conductorship will be divided between Gustav Strube, who has been conductor off and on for over 10 years and continuously conductor for parts of the season during the last six years, and Andre Maquarre, who made his debut as conductor last season with such satisfaction to the Pop audiences. Mr. Strube will conduct until June 1, and then will be succeeded by Mr. Maquarre, who will be conductor until Saturday night, July 2, when the season comes to an end. At the opening of the season the concert master will be Jacques Hoffmann, and he will be followed by Willy Krafft.

There will also be the usual "special" nights. The first will be next Thursday, May 5, when Tufts will celebrate. Tufts songs will be sung by the glee club.

On Wednesday, May 11, will come the first Amherst night, details of which will be announced later. In June there will be the regular Tech, Dartmouth and Harvard nights, and there will probably be some other special nights.

The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Du und Du".....Strauss
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
"Meditation," from "Thais".....Massenet
(Solo violin, J. Hoffmann.)
Humoresque.....Dvorak
Selection, "Samson and Delila".....
Saint-Saens
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"..
Ponchielli
Selection, "The Midnight Sons"....Hubbell
Waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier"
Strauss
March, "Kaiser Friedrich"...Friedemann

SYMPHONY'S LAST PUBLIC REHEARSAL

Preparatory to Close of Season Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies Are Performed; Cecilia Society Chorus Assists

NEW SOLOIST IS HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This was the last public rehearsal of the 29th season. The program consisted of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia Society and these solo singers: Mrs. Hissem de Moss, Miss Margaret Keyes, Berrick von Norden and Frederick Weld.

The Ninth Symphony is in itself enough for any concert, but it is the custom to preface the performance of it by some classic work. An overture by Beethoven is not out of place, and the addition of Mozart's exquisite quintet from "Cosi fan Tuttle" has been welcomed in past years. Mr. Fiedler no doubt thought it would be interesting to put Beethoven's first symphony with its suggestions of Haydn in the first two movements, and its suggestion in the finale of the Mozart of the "Nozze di Figaro" in juxtaposition with the colossal Ninth.

The performance of the two symphonies was unusually good. The first was played with delicacy and without the desire to give it undue importance. Some time ago a symphony supposed to be of Beethoven's Bonn period was found and a performance of it in Germany persuaded many that the symphony really was composed by Beethoven.

As is well known, the performance of the Ninth presents peculiar difficulties. If only the first three movements are performed, there is a sense of incompleteness. The recklessness with which Beethoven wrote for the human voice makes an ideal performance of the finale almost impossible. Some conductors have not hesitated to transpose the finale a whole tone lower. Theodore Thomas advocated this transposition. The effect, however, is said to be far less brilliant and impressive.

The Cecilia chorus sang yesterday with marked precision in attack, accuracy and purity of intonation. There was no faltering in the sustained measures, which tax any chorus, however carefully selected it may be, and the members of the Cecilia were able to sing these measures with varied expression at the command of the conductor. On the whole, it was the finest choral performance of this finale that has been heard here for many years.

The solo singers have a thankless as well as a trying task. They acquitted themselves creditably. Mrs. Hissem De Moss was already known here as an accomplished soprano with a high, pure voice of most agreeable quality. Mr. Von Norden has sung here before. Miss Keyes, a newcomer, has a rich voice of liberal compass, and although yesterday she had little opportunity to show her art, she succeeded in awakening a desire to hear her again. The same may be said of Mr. Weld, who declaimed the opening recitative with dignity.

The performance of the whole symphony was one of unusual merit. And what a superhuman work this symphony is! It is too great for frequent hearing. It should be reserved for a ceremonial occasion. (How "The Messiah" has suffered from constant and indifferent repetitions!)

The Ninth symphony is not for a stupendous orchestra with unaccustomed instruments and imitations of natural phenomena; it is a work abounding in stupendous ideas. There is the absence of personality; there is never a suspicion of mere cleverness, amazing ingenuity. It is not so much the expression of a man as of humanity. In this work Beethoven the seer is revealed, and there is the thought of the composer who, when dying, shook his clenched fist at the thunder storm that raged above him.

A few words about the season may not be impertinent. Mr. Fiedler was as a rule fortunate in program-making. Only one new symphony was produced, the little one by Halm, and it was not worthy of a place on the program. Of the other pieces heard here for the first time, Sibelius' "Saga," Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" and Strube's "Comedy" overture made the most marked impression.

The Symphony audience became acquainted with the names of Bantock, Delius and Ducasse, and one of Berlioz's earliest overtures, "Rob Roy," was heard here for the first time.

Miss Farrar and Miss Koenen sang for the first time at these concerts. The other soloists heard at these concerts for the first time were Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist, and Messrs. Noack and Longy of the orchestra. Mr. Rachmaninoff commanded respect and admiration as a conductor.

The choice of compositions was catholic. Beethoven and Strauss were each represented eight times. Wagner and Brahms followed each with seven works. Tschaikowsky came next with six. American composers were represented by Chadwick, Converse, Loeffler and Strube, for the latter two surely would not resent being called Americans. Four compositions by Sibelius, the Finn, were played.

MONITOR,

MAY 2, 1910.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

BEETHOVEN'S first and ninth symphonies constituted the program of the twenty-fourth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The singing of the finale of the ninth symphony was in English. The quartet was performed by Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Frederick Weld, bass. The choruses were sung by the Cecilia society.

Prof. Willy Hess, who has been concertmaster of the orchestra for the past six seasons save one, when he had leave of absence, was greeted with applause by the audience and by his associates in the orchestra and by the members of the chorus when he took his place at the first desk of the first violins. Thus the Symphony men, the Cecilia society and the Saturday subscribers joined in wishing good fortune to Mr. Hess on the eve of his leaving Boston and going to Berlin to take up his old profession of conservatory teacher.

The ninth symphony is not a great undertaking for Mr. Fiedler. He is primarily a conductor of great modern symphonies; and in his catalogue the era of the modern symphony begins with Beethoven's ninth. As he has made his views known through his two years of musical leadership in Boston, the choral symphony is the first in point of time of a succession of works vast in structure or pregnant in idea, or both, which give the modern orchestra full scope for expressing itself. The choral symphony of Beethoven is first in a succession of works of which the Domestic symphony of Strauss is the last. Between these come Berlioz' Fantastic symphony, Schumann's Spring symphony, Brahm's first, Bruckner's seventh and eighth, the Strauss tone poems, d'Indy's second symphony, Elgar's first, and other works which in resign or in content venture beyond conventional symphonic bounds.

When conducting such works Mr. Fiedler finds himself at home. For the performance of such works he drills this orchestra to those contrasts in tone massing, to that balancing of climax with climax, to that larger rhythm of orchestral expression which have brought his two seasons of conductorship their praise. When Mr. Fiedler undertakes the ninth symphony after having trained his men to the interpretation of Bruckner's symphony in E major and of Strauss' "Don Quixote" variations, he is not straying out of his routine but is keeping well within it. It is when he performs Beethoven's first symphony, a work requiring for its successful presentation lightness of hand and sensitiveness to the smaller rhythm of musical measure and phrase, that he becomes venturesome. It is when a work like this is given at the symphony concerts that a listener's thoughts go back to Mr. Fiedler's predecessors.

---

[157]

ADVERTISER, APRIL 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEASON ENDS WITH BEETHOVEN

HIS FIRST AND HIS LAST SYMPHONIES PRESENTED

Warm Appreciation of Mr. Fiedler Shown by the Audience All the Afternoon.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. First Symphony.
Beethoven. Ninth Symphony.

These constitute, as Mrs. Malaprop would say, the Albany and the Omaha of symphonic composition. It does not matter if Elgar, Paderewski and others have made symphonies that last as long as Beethoven's ninth, they may equal it in length but never in breadth. It was a good idea to put Beethoven's first in juxta-position with his last, showing the growth of symphonic form in a nutshell. The first shows a giant in embryo, while the ninth reveals him in all his strength.

It is interesting, in the first symphony, to note how coming events threw their shadows before. The very first notes are like a gauntlet thrown down to the critics. A symphony in C that begins with a cadence in the key of F! That was a hard nut to crack in the first year of the nineteenth century, when the new symphonic dispensation began.

Then the Minuet has a freedom that Haydn never dreamed of when he admitted this elegant dance as a regular symphonic movement. It was not until two years later, in the second symphony, that Beethoven threw the Minuet out of the symphonic ark and replaced it with the Scherzo, but this Minuet of the first symphony is a Minuet only in name; it is more of a Scherzo than the Scherzo of the second symphony.

Only in the genial but conventional Finale is the spirit of the old symphony carried out. The Finale, although a sonata-allegro in shape, is a Rondo in spirit, and even leans to that form by the final reappearance of the chief theme in the Coda. The tentative scales with which it begins are also very different from the Beethoven of later times and were actually cut out by some of the early conductors as being too trivial. But it is only in the finale that Beethoven becomes a copy of his teacher—Haydn.

The symphony is an easy affair technically for our orchestra, and was played with a straightforward style that had its especial attraction and charm. Only we found the introduction to the first and also that of the last movement a trifle too slow. The kettle-drum had enough to do both in the first and last symphonies. In the first symphony its important passages were innovations in 1800, at the first performance.

The Ninth Symphony brought out a good chorus, which was furnished by the Cecilia Society and a fine quartette of soloists, consisting of Mrs. Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Mr. Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Mr. Frederick Weld, bass. The impression of the unsingability of the final movement remained, in spite of the excellence of the vocal forces. Beethoven treated his voices as if they had been oboes, flutes or clarinettes, forgetting that a human voice does not, like an instrument, remain the same after the strain of a high passage, or a set of difficult phrases.

Mr. Fiedler loves his Beethoven and there was evidence of this in the care with which the details of the work were given. The Coda of the opening Allegro, with its great wave of tone, crescendo and diminuendo, was grandly caught up, the deep strings being especially majestic.

The Scherzo with its ever present Dactyl in development was given with hearty power. It is rather grotesque than playful. The kettle-drum here gave its unusual octave figure with appropriate vigor. A slightly slower pace would not have harmed this movement.

The beautiful slow movement, with its two themes in contrasted variation, is to us the most poetic movement, and when one thinks of this tender composition as the work of a man totally deaf one is lost in wonder. The horn had some moments of difficulty in this, but Beethoven was frequently merciless to this instrument.

The finale opens with the greatest dialogue that ever was given in Music. The puny dialogues of the "William Tell" overture, or the "Symphonie Fantastique," shrivel up before this dialogue of the suffering world with its Redeemer. And what a bridge to the voices is made by the wonderful phrases of the contrabasses! These heavy instruments were played with a delicacy that deserves cordial recognition.

It may be borne in mind also that the transference of figures from preceding movements into the Finale, which is a frequent device nowadays, was first introduced in this symphony. But the theme itself, which Beethoven chose for his variations here, is after all but a street-song—a "Gassenhauer"—and bears a close relationship to "Yankee Doodle." It is scarcely the melody one would have chosen to celebrate the millennium with.

But the frantic joy which permeates it at the last is your true Beethoven. He was singing of the era of universal brotherhood, and nothing in the world moved him more than such a topic.

To work up this climax as Beethoven thought it is wellnigh impossible, yet, on this occasion the impossible was accomplished. The very trying skips were accomplished without apparent effort, and even the high phrases of the sopranos of the chorus were accomplished with the minimum of screaming.

The quartette was in the main very well balanced. The cadenza work was taken rather slower than we have heard it, but this at least made it the more clear and free from blur. But it is an ungrateful work for all the vocalists concerned. We may remember that it is now sung about a semi-tone above the pitch in which Beethoven wrote it, but even if it were lowered a semitone we would still think Beethoven a vocal barbarian.

His idea of Joy is always a combination of Frenzy and Fourth of July, as witness the delirious end of "Fidelio," and of the "Egmont" overture, and of this symphony. His musical happiness was generally at the highest pressure. But to find these technical flaws is not to condemn the work. It is, was, and will ever remain the grandest of symphonies, and this performance of it may rank with the greatest. Mr. Fiedler was cordially greeted at the beginning of the concert, but yet more so after he had completed his herculean task.

MUSIC NOTE.

Alwyn Schroeder, the eminent violoncellist, has rejoined the Boston symphony orchestra as first 'cellist beginning with the next season.

HERALD,

MAY 1, 1910—

THE POPS.

The season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow evening, (Monday, May 2) with the usual orchestra of 55 Symphony players and with Gustav Strube as conductor. With the exception of one year, 1890, when the Pops were omitted owing to the failure of the management to secure a license, these concerts have been a unique feature of the spring in Boston since 1885. In that year, at the end of the regular Symphony season, a series of popular concerts modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, was given in the old Music Hall three times a week, first on Wednesday and Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and then on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings, with the late Adolph Neuendorff as conductor. These first popular concerts did not introduce the features of tables with smoking and refreshments, but they were so successful that at the end of June it was decided to take out the seats of the old Music Hall, put in tables and greenery and have what were then known as "Promenade" concerts. These promenade concerts were successful from the beginning and ran through from the end of June to the latter part of September. The next year there were no popular concerts in the sense of those given the year before by Mr. Neuendorff, but the promenade concerts began in May and continued throughout the whole summer under the conductorship of John Mullaly, who is still one of the valued first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is a rather curious fact that Boston has been the only city able to support such concerts for anything like such a term of years.

During the season of 1910 the conductorship will be divided between Gustav Strube, who has been conductor off and on for over 10 years and continuously conductor for parts of the season during the last six years, and Andre Maquarre, who made his debut as conductor last season with such satisfaction to the Pop audiences. Mr. Strube will conduct until June 1, and then will be succeeded by Mr. Maquarre, who will be conductor until Saturday night, July 2, when the season comes to an end. At the opening of the season the concert master will be Jacques Hoffmann, and he will be followed by Willy Krafft.

There will also be the usual "special" nights. The first will be next Thursday, May 5, when Tufts will celebrate. Tufts songs will be sung by the glee club.

On Wednesday, May 11, will come the first Amherst night, details of which will be announced later. In June there will be the regular Tech, Dartmouth and Harvard nights, and there will probably be some other special nights.

The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Du und Du".....Strauss
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
"Meditation," from "Thais".....Massenet
(Solo violin, J. Hoffmann.)
Humoresque ..... Dvorak
Selection, "Samson and Delila".....
Saint-Saens
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"..
Ponchielli
Selection, "The Midnight Sons"....Hubbell
Waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier"
Strauss
March, "Kaiser Friedrich"...Friedemann

BOSTON HERALD, APRIL 30, 1910.

SYMPHONY'S LAST PUBLIC REHEARSAL

Preparatory to Close of Season Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies Are Performed; Cecilia Society Chorus Assists

NEW SOLOIST IS HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This was the last public rehearsal of the 29th season. The program consisted of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia Society and these solo singers: Mrs. Hissem de Moss, Miss Margaret Keyes, Berrick von Norden and Frederick Weld.

The Ninth Symphony is in itself enough for any concert, but it is the custom to preface the performance of it by some classic work. An overture by Beethoven is not out of place, and the addition of Mozart's exquisite quintet from "Cosi fan Tuttle" has been welcomed in past years. Mr. Fiedler no doubt thought it would be interesting to put Beethoven's first symphony with its suggestions of Haydn in the first two movements, and its suggestion in the finale of the Mozart of the "Nozze di Figaro" in juxtaposition with the colossal Ninth.

The performance of the two symphonies was unusually good. The first was played with delicacy and without the desire to give it undue importance. Some time ago a symphony supposed to be of Beethoven's Bonn period was found and a performance of it in Germany persuaded many that the symphony really was composed by Beethoven.

As is well known, the performance of the Ninth presents peculiar difficulties. If only the first three movements are performed, there is a sense of incompleteness. The recklessness with which Beethoven wrote for the human voice makes an ideal performance of the finale almost impossible. Some conductors have not hesitated to transpose the finale a whole tone lower. Theodore Thomas advocated this transposition. The effect, however, is said to be far less brilliant and impressive.

The Cecilia chorus sang yesterday with marked precision in attack, accuracy and purity of intonation. There was no faltering in the sustained measures, which tax any chorus, however carefully selected it may be, and the members of the Cecilia were able to sing these measures with varied expression at the command of the conductor. On the whole, it was the finest choral performance of this finale that has been heard here for many years.

The solo singers have a thankless as well as a trying task. They acquitted themselves creditably. Mrs. Hissem De Moss was already known here as an accomplished soprano with a high, pure voice of most agreeable quality. Mr. Von Norden has sung here before. Miss Keyes, a newcomer, has a rich voice of liberal compass, and although yesterday she had little opportunity to show her art, she succeeded in awakening a desire to hear her again. The same may be said of Mr. Weld, who declaimed the opening recitative with dignity.

The performance of the whole symphony was one of unusual merit. And what a superhuman work this symphony is! It is too great for frequent hearing. It should be reserved for a ceremonial occasion. (How "The Messiah" has suffered from constant and indifferent repetitions!)

The Ninth symphony is not for a stupendous orchestra with unaccustomed instruments and imitations of natural phenomena; it is a work abounding in stupendous ideas. There is the absence of personality; there is never a suspicion of mere cleverness, amazing ingenuity. It is not so much the expression of a man as of humanity. In this work Beethoven the seer is revealed, and there is the thought of the composer who, when dying, shook his clenched fist at the thunder storm that raged above him.

A few words about the season may not be impertinent. Mr. Fiedler was as a rule fortunate in program-making. Only one new symphony was produced, the little one by Halm, and it was not worthy of a place on the program. Of the other pieces heard here for the first time, Sibelius' "Saga," Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" and Strube's "Comedy" overture made the most marked impression.

The Symphony audience became acquainted with the names of Bantock, Delius and Ducasse, and one of Berlioz's earliest overtures, "Rob Roy," was heard here for the first time.

Miss Farrar and Miss Koenen sang for the first time at these concerts. The other soloists heard at these concerts for the first time were Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist, and Messrs. Noack and Longy of the orchestra. Mr. Rachmaninoff commanded respect and admiration as a conductor.

The choice of compositions was catholic. Beethoven and Strauss were each represented eight times. Wagner and Brahms followed each with seven works. Tschaikowsky came next with six. American composers were represented by Chadwick, Converse, Loeffler and Strube, for the latter two surely would not resent being called Americans. Four compositions by Sibelius, the Finn, were played.

MONITOR,

, MAY 2, 1910.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

BEETHOVEN'S first and ninth symphonies constituted the program of the twenty-fourth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The singing of the finale of the ninth symphony was in English. The quartet was performed by Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Berrick von Norden, tenor, and Frederick Weld, bass. The choruses were sung by the Cecilia society.

Prof. Willy Hess, who has been concertmaster of the orchestra for the past six seasons save one, when he had leave of absence, was greeted with applause by the audience and by his associates in the orchestra and by the members of the chorus when he took his place at the first desk of the first violins. Thus the Symphony men, the Cecilia society and the Saturday subscribers joined in wishing good fortune to Mr. Hess on the eve of his leaving Boston and going to Berlin to take up his old profession of conservatory teacher.

The ninth symphony is not a great undertaking for Mr. Fiedler. He is primarily a conductor of great modern symphonies; and in his catalogue the era of the modern symphony begins with Beethoven's ninth. As he has made his views known through his two years of musical leadership in Boston, the choral symphony is the first in point of time of a succession of works vast in structure or pregnant in idea, or both, which give the modern orchestra full scope for expressing itself. The choral symphony of Beethoven is first in a succession of works of which the Domestic symphony of Strauss is the last. Between these come Berlioz' Fantastic symphony, Schumann's Spring symphony, Brahm's first, Bruckner's seventh and eighth, the Strauss tone poems, d'Indy's second symphony, Elgar's first, and other works which in resign or in content venture beyond conventional symphonic bounds.

When conducting such works Mr. Fiedler finds himself at home. For the performance of such works he drills this orchestra to those contrasts in tone massing, to that balancing of climax with climax, to that larger rhythm of orchestral expression which have brought his two seasons of conductorship their praise. When Mr. Fiedler undertakes the ninth symphony after having trained his men to the interpretation of Bruckner's symphony in E major and of Strauss' "Don Quixote" variations, he is not straying out of his routine but is keeping well within it. It is when he performs Beethoven's first symphony, a work requiring for its successful presentation lightness of hand and sensitiveness to the smaller rhythm of musical measure and phrase, that he becomes venturesome. It is when a work like this is given at the symphony concerts that a listener's thoughts go back to Mr. Fiedler's predecessors.

---

[157]

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 30, 1910

"THE CHORAL SYMPHONY"

BEETHOVEN IN A REMARKABLE PERFORMANCE

Mr. Fiedler, the Symphony Orchestra, the Cecilia and the Quartet Carry the Symphony to Thrilling Eloquence—The Justness of an Ultra-Modern Treatment of It—The Notable Qualities and Achievements of All Concerned—The Record of the Final Concert of Friday Afternoons

The quality of the performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, at the final Symphony Concert of the afternoon series, yesterday, measurably dispelled the lurking doubts of the wisdom of the repetition of such a piece within a year. Until Mr. Fiedler revived it last spring, it had not been performed in Boston for five years, or at regular Symphony Concerts for nine. In the earlier years of the orchestra, in Mr. Henschel's and Mr. Gericke's eighties, performances were relatively frequent; then the symphony gradually became an occasional and exceptional piece; and the three purely orchestral movements were oftenest played apart from the choral finale. Berlin and other German capitals, it is true, hear the Choral Symphony annually, and sometimes twice and thrice in Holy Week, while New York of late, in the rivalry of its orchestras, has listened to plenuful performances. Oftenest, however, in America, and in Boston in particular, performances of the symphony—chorus, solo quartet and all—have been kept exceptional occasions and made "events" in their kind. Thus, the Choral Symphony has never become, like Beethoven's other eight, and especially the third and the fifth, an incident to orchestra routine. It has remained, as it is, a thing apart and exalted.

On the other hand, if the Ninth Symphony has never become conventionalized, no more has it become as familiar as it should be. However numerous the repetitions of the third, the fifth or the seventh symphonies, there are still new details in them for each of us eagerly to discover, side by side with the old and the anticipated of familiar thrill. Most of us, unless we have added private study to the hearing of public performances of the Choral Symphony, have never become thus intimate with it. Perhaps, indeed, its very magnitude of conception and execution repels such intimacy. To a few details in the larger sense every audience stirs—to the puissant drumbeats of the first movement; to the rhythmical changes of the scherzo; to the comings and goings of the song of the slow movement; to the passionate and almost scornful recapitulations of the beginning of the finale; to a transition here, to a group of instrumental voices there. Oftenest, however, the whole impression remains general and a little confused, as of superhuman power of imagination and creation in endless variation. Only musical Titans—or very voracious Germans—could ever become used to the Choral Symphony.

Perhaps, then, Mr. Fiedler was wise in the venturing of another repetition so soon, and perhaps, and reasonably, he may have wished to bring to fulfilment the remarkable promise of the performance of last spring. Then, the ending of the concerts for the year with the Choral Symphony was a belated and rather hasty decision. There was little time to choose an efficient quartet, and none too much for the rehearsal of the chorus of the Cecilia. Yet when the days of actual performance came, it disclosed the power, the sweep, the might and the magnitude of the music, as Boston within recollection had not heard it. The qualities that distinguish Mr. Fiedler in puissant and passionate music of our own time, he could bring with like ample and kindling result to the Choral Symphony, since it is more truly modern music in the characteristic sense of the word than all that Brahms, for example, wrote in an intervening half century. Beethoven far outstripped the musical understanding, appreciations, emotions and criteria of his time with this Ninth Symphony. The audiences of the twenties, the thirties, and for a full half century beyond, indeed heard it with an overwhelming sense of its power and passion and majesty. Yet they had naught with which to compare and to assimilate it except the great mass and the final quartets of Beethoven himself. It is our high fortune to live musically in a time when the whole race, almost, of contemporary composers would go forward in the directions, by the means and to the ends that Beethoven sought in the Choral Symphony, and, more than most of them, gained. Not for nothing, when our audiences now hear the Choral Symphony, have they sat for recent years under d'Indy and Strauss and their following. Not for nothing have conductors like Mr. Fiedler "toiled terribly" with such music. Both have learned that the Ninth Symphony, though it was written in the distant twenties, is akin to it; that it asks a like mood in the hearer and that by like means and methods, conductor and band may summon its eloquence.

This year, the performance of the Choral Symphony was predestined from the beginning of the season. The solo quartet—Mmes. de Moss and Keyes and Messrs. van Norden and Weld—was picked early and careful; there was ample time to rehearse the Cecilia in music from which the first impression of appalling and implacable difficulty had a little waned; the orchestra knew better Mr. Fiedler's desires and ways with the symphony; and he himself, encouraged by the appreciation of last year felt his hand the freer and the firmer. Moreover, though no man could foresee, as mood and circumstance willed yesterday afternoon, conductor and chorus, orchestra and solo singers were all on edge. The result was the most elequent and sustained, the most understanding and puissant, the most absorbing and thrilling performance of the Ninth Symphony that Boston, or indeed any other American city—not to forget Mr. Mahler's and Mr. Weingartner's with the New York Philharmonic—has heard in years. Mr. Fiedler held the symphony to a sustained power that matched the unflagging force of his "Heldenleben" or his "Zarathustra." He conceived it as a whole with the same largeness and magnificence of proportion and cumulative design with which, a fortnight ago, he imagined Liszt's "Faust" symphony. He filled it with a like exaltation of voice and spirit to that which he poured into d'Indy's symphony last autumn. The magnitude of his eloquence never coarsened the music; the passionate utterance that he would gain never became shrill. Clarity and intensity, melodic line and incisive accent went in hand.

In the heat of the moment, the symphony and the performance seemed to burn away the shortcomings that oftenest beset Mr. Fiedler. If his pace in the two impassioned orchestral songs of the adagio were slower that that which some conductors elect, it did not drag or cloud. He carried the choral finale to its heights of frenetic ecstacy; but he remembered that it is a noble as well as a frenetic song; and undue speed did not turn its exaltation into turmoil or lay upon singers and orchestra tasks beyond efficient human power. His and Beethoven's delirium so to say, was puissant even in its wildest vocal furies. Nowhere, unless it be in the drumbeats of the first movement, did Mr. Fiedler overemphasize details, and it is the fashion of the hour with conductors to have the drums in the Ninth Symphony so smitten. Thus, the panorama of impassioned sound that is the first movement, unrolled its sequence in thrillingly eloquent and varied progress; the scherzo ran to rhythms that were as the sound of the many feet of Beethoven's visions; while the two songs of the slow movement were surcharged with a diverse but equally deep and luminous beauty. The transition into the finale had almost apocalyptic voice: the finale itself brought the emotions and the excitements of music-drama.

At every turn the orchestra was at one with the conductor and as eager with all its resources of technic, tone and spirit as was he. The tone of the instruments, and especially of the wind choir, in the slow movement, was of entrancing beauty; the rythmic elasticity of the scherzo matched it;eloquence of tone made passion eloquent in the first; and in the finale the orchestra enhanced everyone of Mr. Fiedler's gradations and progressions toward the cumulative puissance of the climax. The choir of the Cecilia, secure now in the music (or as secure as mortals may be) and stirring perhaps to the new animation of prospective fortunes, caught and heated in their turn, the fire of the performance. They sang their music as though its intervals were not relentless, and its range unsparing. Precision went side by side with energy. The volume of their tone has never seemed more resonant or the texture of it finer. The women's voices attained the transparent richness, the soaring passion of Beethoven's music; the men's gave it body and opulence, and a kind of stern, if elated nobility. For once a chorus had conquered the difficulties of the music in time to impart its passion; could heed shadings of emotion and imagination as well as intricacies of interval and tessitura. It was a new, a prophetic Cecilia. The solo singers, fired, too, by the pervading mood, were sufficient to their unsparing tasks. Mme. de Moss's tones have the soaring transparency, the clear carrying quality that is essential to the soprano's music against the choral and the orchestral mass; Mr. Weld, the bass, had eloquent breadth of style and clarity of musical speech; Mr. van Norden and Miss Keyes filled their parts. But throughout the finale came little thought of individual elements in the performance of it. Mr. Fiedler had wrought them all, wrought himself, wrought the audience into the sublime frenzy of Beethoven exulting for a world, almost for a universe.

The rest is record. After such a performance of the Choral Symphony, the first symphony of Beethoven, with which the concert began, seemed but dimly remembered prettiness. And with the emotions of that performance still stirring he would be prig and pedant indeed who contrasted to his own glory of scholarship—and stupidity—the pleasantly youthful and the epically mature Beethoven. It was the final concert of the afternoon series, and thus there was more than the usual applause for Mr. Fiedler when he first took his place. Though the concert was lengthy, still more insistent applause at the end held him long in it and twice recalled him. At the last call he came leading Mr. Hess with him, and then the lingering audience showed that it knew, too, that the justly admired concert master had played to it for the last time.

H. T. P.

GLOBE—MAY 1, 1910.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Tomorrow Night the "Pops" Begin.

Something About the History of These Enjoyable Concerts.

"Faust" the Week's Opera —Current Gossip.

The 25th season of "Pop" concerts by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin tomorrow night in Symphony hall with Gustave Strube as conductor. The arrangements of the hall and table service will be practically the same as in former years, the concerts beginning at 8 and closing at 11 o'clock. Mr Jacques Hoffmann will be the solo violinist in the selection from Massenet's "Thais," and the evening will open with a new march by Mr Strube.

The program will be as follows: March, "The Comet," Strube; overture, "Masaniello," Auber; waltz, "Du und Du," Strauss; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; "Meditation" from "Thais," Massenet; "Humoresque," Dvorak; selection, "Samson and Delihah," Saint-Saens; ballet music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; selection, "The Midnight Sons," Hubbell; waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier," Strauss; march, "Kaiser Friedrich," Friedemann.

These concerts began in 1885 at old Music hall and this would properly be the 26th season, but for the fact that in 1890 a decree in Boston prohibited the serving of drinks with music. The association of the two was deemed less hazardous thereafter.

"The Music Hall Popular Concerts," Mr Adolf Neuendorff, conductor, beginning May 6, 1885, were given Wednesday and Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. A footnote upon the programs read as follows: The programs for these concerts will be made up largely of light music of the best class and will be of the same character as those given at the famous 'Bilse' concerts in Berlin."

June 24 the concerts were changed to Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings, and beginning July 1 they were given every evening, except Sunday, in the form of "Promenade" concerts.

Mr Neuendorff played only good music from the beginning. He opened his first program of that first season with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. In the line of names under it were Haydn, Thomas, Gounod and Beethoven. These concerts terminated for that season Oct 3 with a "complimentary testimonial" to Mr Neuendorff.

John Mullaly Led in 1886.

John G. Mullaly, one of the best known of the older musicians of Boston, conducted the concerts of 1886, which again ran all summer. A few soloists appeared. One of them was P. Fiumara, now at the first desk of second violins. Sept 7 the 'cello trio from "William Tell" was played by Fritz Giesse, one of Boston's notable performers; Wulf Fries and Guiseppe Campanari, since better known as the baritone.

In 1887 Mr Neuendorff was again conductor. He played at least one number by Wagner every consecutive night from the first concert on the evening of June 11 until June 29. The names of Beethoven, Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Schubert and Rubinstein were frequently seen. Judging from his programs, this conductor abhorred trash.

The element of humor was not altogether lacking at these concerts, for an oft-heard number was a "Carnival of Venice," by Ernst Scherz, a "study, showing how it would have been composed by Handel, Haydn, Brahms, Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Gounod, Strauss and Wagner."

Friday, Aug 12 a monster concert was held as a testimonial to Mr Neuendorff on the eve of his departure to conduct the first performance of his opera, "Prince Waldmeister," at the Walhalla theatre, Berlin. To give impressiveness to the occasion, a military band was added to the orchestra in four numbers, including Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrs," an air of Bach's and an "Aida" fantasie.

Under Wilhelm Rietzel, the succeeding conductor, the programs became more popular in quality. Soloists on brass instruments were used. Carl Hampe, trombone from the Bilse orchestra of Berlin, and organizer of the "Boston trombone quartet," and Ed. N. Lafricaine, cornetist, were featured.

Mr Kneisel Adds Soloists.

Franz Kneisel appeared first as conductor in the summer of 1888. Mr Louis C. Elson in an interesting article on the Boston Symphony orchestra in the November (1889) New England Magazine, tells of the decapitations which followed the advent of Mr Gericke, among them that of Boston's "musical hero and pioneer," Bernhard Listemann as concert master, the succession of Mr Kneisel, then a beardless youth, to the position, and his flawless performance of the Beethoven concerto, which asserted his right to it.

Mr Kneisel believed in adding variety to his program by using instrumental and vocal soloists. Among the men from the orchestra who played were Otto Roth, now at the second desk of the first violins (Mr Roth could then perform brilliantly the Vieuxtemps "Appassionata," a Wieniawski polonaise and the largo), M. Sautet oboe and Mr Schuecker harp, still members of the orchestra; Charles Mole flute, Fritz Giese 'cello, and Xaver Reiter, even then ascribed in the programs "the eminent horn virtuoso," now a justly valued asset of the Metropolitan opera.

Mr Kneisel apparently established the vogue of soloists, for when Mr. Neuendorff resumed the directorship, June 30 of that year, he continued the policy, and in addition to Sig Campanari, who had sung at Mr Kneisel's concerts, introduced Mr Barnabee and Mr Macdonald, later of "Bostonians" fame, the Temple and Weber male quartets, and the Schubert club.

Toward the close of the season he arranged a series of "operatic nights," in which his wife, Georgine von Januschowsky, Mr Campanari and other singers performed duets and quartets from the operas.

On the program of Wednesday, July 25, this footnote appears: "The audience is respectfully requested to preserve silence during this number," referring by a star to Gillet's familiar "Loin de Bal," for string orchestra, played for the first time here, and apparently to the immediate pleasure of the audience, judging from the repetitions of it which followed.

The possibility that Lillian Russell had ever been a soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra might now seem remote. Such was the fact, however, at a concert Wednesday, Sept 19, of that year, which long preceded the days of "Wildfire."

The conductors during more recent years may be briefly summarized as follows, although the list is not complete. In 1891, T. Adamowski and E. Gruenberg; 1894, T. Adamowski; 1895, Sig de Novellis, since heard in comic opera; 1896, Max Zach. Mr Strube appeared as conductor of these concerts for the first time in 1899, Mr Kautzenbach in 1908, and Andre Maquarre last year.

During 1898, the year of the Spanish war, "There'll be a Hot Time" and "Georgia Campmeeting" aroused the patrons of these concerts to such exuberant demonstration of patriotism that the ban was thereafter placed upon "ragtime" and its evils forever.

POST

MAY 3, 1910

BRILLIANT POP OPENS SEASON

Record Audience Greets Initial Concert

The opening of the "Pop" concert season last night in Symphony Hall registered the largest and the most brilliant audience which has gathered at these initial performances in the 10 years since the first popular programmes were given in Symphony Hall. The interior of the musical sanctum had undergone a change. Contrasted with the customary orderly rows of seats were tables surrounded by chattering groups, while the orchestra was to be seen through a beautiful blue haze.

Gustav Strube, again in the conductor's chair, led off with his rattling new march, written in honor of the period and the occasion, "The Comet." This scintillating piece was repeated. The concert bore evidence to the fact that in the lapse of a year Mr. Strube has not forgotten the art of programme-making. The good will and enthusiasm of his auditors kept increasing as one favorite followed another.

Mr. Strube has become more generous with encores than in past seasons for inaddition to his march, there were repetitions of the "Meditation from Massenet's "Thais," finely played by Jacques Hoffmann; the Dvorak Humoreske, and other pieces; and there were additions to the programme of such well-beloved old-timers as the Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffmann," and the graceful little piece by Helmsberger which has become such a favorite with Pop audiences of late seasons.

The audience had gathered to have a good time and be jolly, but it also knew how to listen. Mr. Strube only rapped for silence on one occasion—Mr. Hoffmann's solo—and his wishes were quickly followed. Mr. Hoffmann had to repeat his performance. For the rest of the programme, there was Auber's sparkling overture to "Masaniello"; Strauss' waltz, "Du und du"; selections from Bizet's "Carmen" and Saint-Saens "Samson and Delilah"; the overture to "Rienzi"; the flashing ballet music from Ponchielli's "Gioconda"; selections from "The Midnight Sons"; a waltz from Strauss' "Chocolate Soldier," after Bernard Shaw's play; the march, "Kaiser Friedrich," by Friedemann.

The performances of the orchestra were well nigh as satisfactory as orchestral performances can be. The programme for tonight will include Meyerbeer's coronation march, Von Flotow's overture to "Stradella," selections from Verdi's "Rigoletto" and Gounod's "Faust," Rossini's overture to "William Tell," the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the prelude to Saint-Saens' "The Deluge," when Jacques Hoffmann will again be the solo violinist; marches, waltzes and selections from popular musical comedies.

A demonstration is expected next Thursday, when "Tufts night" comes off. On the 11th Amherst night will be observed. There will be a Wagner night on May 9.

[158]

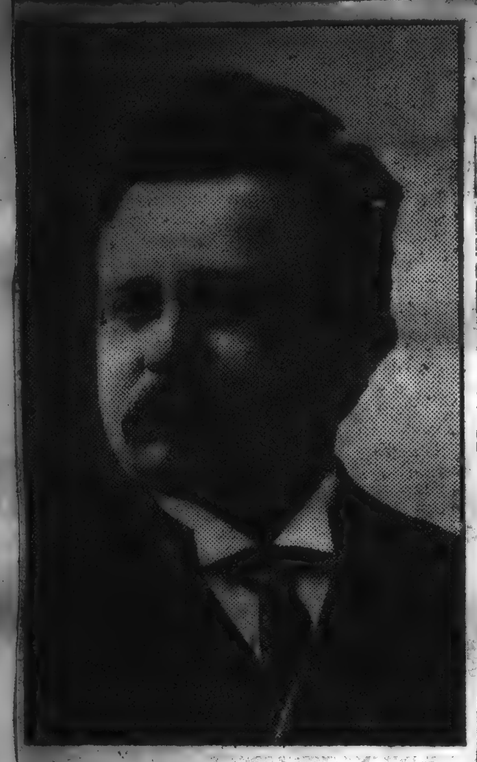
POST, MAY 1, 1910

THE POPS

As the old part song has it "Sumer is y-cumen in." The tulips are to be seen in the park, and tomorrow evening (Monday) the Pop concerts commence at Symphony Hall. This is the beginning of the 25th season of these concerts. They were begun in the old Music Hall in the spring of 1885, and this would be the 26th season were it not for the fact that in 1890 the management was unable to obtain a license, and the summer evening concerts were omitted, the orchestra making an extended tour of the West to take their place. The files of the newspapers two years ago bear witness to the stir made when it was announced that the Pops were to be abandoned for a season. It was only less than would have followed the announcement of the abandonment of the Symphony concerts during the winter, and that excitement was and is significant of the favor in which these concerts have been held ever since their organization. With Adolph Neuendorff as the first conductor and John Mullaly as the second, and these followed by Franz Kneisel, Signor d'Novellis, Timothee Adamowski, Mr. Gruenberg, Gustav Strube, Max Zak, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre, the concerts have prospered from the beginning. In the early years of the decade just finished, when they were first given in Symphony Hall, attendance dropped noticeably, for Symphony Hall 10 years ago was far out of the way and it was necessary almost to create a new public. Now conditions are otherwise.

Mr. Strube, who has been conductor of the Pops off and on for over 10 years, will start the season and will hold that post until June 1, when he will be succeeded by Mr. Andre Maquarre, who made such a success last year when he assumed the position for the first time.

The orchestra, as usual, will consist of 55 Symphony players, and the concerts will be given every evening except Sunday from May 2 to July 2 inclusive. They will begin at 8 o'clock and end at 11.



GUSTAV STRUBE.

The programme will present no radical innovations. There are no favorites like the old favorites, and all of them will be heard from time to time. Naturally, however, Mr. Strube and Mr. Maquarre will present a quantity of new music, for which they have been searching catalogues ever since last summer. All the new comic operas and musical comedies that have been heard in this country the past winter will be represented and selections from the better of the foreign operettas which are to be heard here next year will be played.

There will also be special nights. The first will be on next Thursday, May 5, when Tufts will celebrate. It will be the sixth "Tufts Night," the others having been in 1901, 1902, 1903, 1906 and 1908. A big representation of the student body will be present and Tufts songs will be sung by the Glee Club, which has just returned from a very successful Southern tour.

On Wednesday, May 11, will come the first "Amherst Night," details of which will be announced a little later. In June there will be the regular "Tech," "Dartmouth" and "Harvard" nights, and there will probably be some other special nights to be announced later.

The programme for Monday, tomorrow night, opens with the new march which Mr. Strube has composed in honor of the time and the occasion, "The Comet," and runs in full as follows:

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Du Und Du".....Strauss
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
"Meditation" from "Thais".....Massenet
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann.
Humoresque.....Dvorak
Selection, "Samson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "The Midnight Sons".....Hubbell
Waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier".....Strauss
March, "Kaiser Friedrich".....Friedemann

CONCERTMEISTER WITEK,
Now of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, as seen by a Dutch cartoonist. Mr. Witek will succeed Mr. Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MAY 3, 1910.

SOCIETY ATTENDS OPENING OF "POPS"

Bring on your warm weather. The "Pops" are here. They opened last night, with Symphony Hall crowded with a fashionable, music loving audience, a well-balanced program, Gustave Strube conducting and nothing lacking but "the good old summer time."

There were some notables in the music world to witness the inauguration of the "Pop" concert season. Among them were Director Fiedler of the Symphony, Max Zach and Timothee Adamowski. The audience paid close attention to the music and was generous with its applause.

A new march by Conductor Strube, "The Comet," opened the concert and was well received. A Strauss waltz set some toes to tapping the floor. This was followed by selections from "Carmen," which pleased some of those who knew the airs, even if they didn't have an acquaintance with other parts of the program.

There was one disappointment. There was nothing about "Rings on Her Fingers" in the selection from "The Midnight Sons." This was soon forgotten, however, but the real "Pops" atmosphere is scheduled to make its initial appearance on Thursday night. That will be the first of the special nights. It will be Tufts night, and the whole program is to be given over to the college boys.

Professor Lewis of the Tufts music department is expected to take a turn with the leader's baton, and most of the college songs have been orchestrated, so that there will be something doing from the time the performance begins.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 4, 1910

News of the Day

For the first time in the twenty-odd years of "The Pops," the form of the programme has changed. The little square newspaper, so to say, that the audience used to receive has vanished. In its stead has come a rectangular "booklet," with a cover in soft yellow, pleasantly designed and colored. The first page within bears the programme of the evening and then follows page by page the programmes for a week to come, all printed in clear black and white. The "booklet" is light to the hand and stainless to the glove; the information that it contains is readily discoverable; while the whole aspect of it agrees much more with the fashion of the time than the little fluttering folio that preceded it.

The programme for the "Pop" concert tonight at Symphony Hall, under Mr. Strube, goes:

March, "Ompkut".....Keene
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "New Vienna".....Strauss
Selection, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Songs of the Waves.....Johnston
Musette.....Sibelius
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba,".....Goldmark
('Cello Solo, Mr. Keller.)
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi".....Adam
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
(Organ, Mr. Marshall.)
Serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin".....Drigo
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
March, "Berliner Luft".....Lincke

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 2, 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE INCIDENTS OF THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Hess's Leave-Taking for Exceptional Episodes—The Audience and Mr. Fiedler—A Word About His Work for the Year, and the Share of the Men in It—A New York View of Opera and Concerts in Boston—Mr. Hammerstein's Sincerity—Harvard Receives a Dramatic Prize from Mr. Craig — Mr. Walkley on His Own Profession—The Chorus of the Cecilia Approves Co-operation with the Symphony Orchestra — A Sensible Saying About Strauss—The Final Performance of the New Theatre Company Here—Miss Tempest to Remain in America—Other Notes of the Day

The Symphony Concerts ended for the year on Saturday night with the usual incidents of such occasions and with one or two, arising from the departure of Mr. Hess, that were exceptional. Behind the scenes, Mr. Higginson, following his annual custom, spoke a few words of friendly thanks and praise to the men of the band in the "orchestra room" before the concert began; while the men themselves with Mr. Kuntz, one of the few present players in the orchestra who has served in it from the very beginning in 1881, as their spokesman, handed Mr. Hess a watch for souvenir of his work with them and their liking for him. His pleasure at the gift and the emotion of three days of nearly continuous experience of farewell ceremonies almost denied him words for reply. Then the scene shifted to the hall, and when the men had taken their seats, Mr. Hess came last of them toward his place. While he was still standing, the audience began to applaud him very heartily; then the orchestra and the chorus of the Cecilia rose from their places and added their plaudits. It was good for a virtuoso like Mr. Hess to be so honored by the public that has known and admired his work for four years; but perhaps it was better still, especially on the human side, to receive such warm and clear token of admiration and liking from professional associates, prone to note each other's infirmities. Again, as on Friday, at the end of the concert, Mr. Fiedler led Mr. Hess to the front of the stage, and so, as his approving and loyal chief, completed and sealed this circle of honors to the departing concert-master. None, in all the years of the orchestra, has excelled him in that post as an equally steadying and inspiriting leader, and, when he has turned "soloist" incidentally or in his concerto of the year, none has matched him as a virtuoso of the violin.

As usual, the conductor's stand was twined with greenery and plumed with a bouquet, and when Mr. Fiedler first came to it, the audience, which filled the hall, the orchestra, and the chorus of the Cecilia, which is likely to know him still better next year, all applauded him very warmly. There was more clapping at the end of Beethoven's first symphony; while at the pauses in the Choral Symphony, and at the end, the applause was reiterated proof of the warm liking and admiration of the audience. As usual, Mr. Fiedler turned open-handed toward the orchestra as one who would pour the plaudits, in his turn, upon his men; but the audience, insisting, made it clear that it was the conductor as well as the players that it would honor. And, as was noted in this place on Saturday, many of his most admirable and stirring qualities had played in his performance of the Choral Symphony and made it unique in the musical experiences of this town in recent years. Time and again in the long course of the season—fifty concerts in Boston and sixty or seventy more in other cities—they had played to equal illumination, power, and answering appreciation and emotion in d'Indy's symphony for example, in Strauss's "Zarathustra," "Don Juan," "Til," and "Don Quixote," in Liszt's "Faust," in Bruckner's symphony, and Elgar's and Tschaikowsky's, in Delius's "Paris," in the symphonies in which Schumann sings the spring and his bridal, in Sibelius's pieces and in Reger's.

In ultra-modern music, especially of the Germans, the Russians, and the Scandinavians, in romantic music, whatever its time or sort (unless it be too theatrically of the opera house) in music generally that invites large and intense treatment and expression, Mr. Fiedler remains, as he began here, a conductor of understanding and imagination, of puissance and personality. The very shortcomings that assail him with the severer classics and with music that less exalts expressive fervor, only serve him the better in this modern, romantic, highly-colored music that he feels so deeply and cherishes so warmly. Again, for a second year, the range, the diversity, the intelligent and the interesting ordering of his programmes have praised him and have been a continuing satisfaction to his audiences. He has been just in the holding of the balance between the old and the new, the familiar and the rare, and hardly one of the novel pieces or the revivals of the years has not deserved its place in the concerts either for its intrinsic interest or its significance of the musical current of its time. With a conductor of such methods and aims, and so engrossed and intense with his work as is Mr. Fiedler, moments were bound to come when the rare finesse and euphony of the orchestra, as he received it, seemed a little to decline. On the other hand, there have been many more occasions when he has carried the band to a thrilling [illegible] of brilliant, sonorous, puissant and sweeping tone and to heights and depths of large and searching beauty. As the Symphony Orchestra is, the men as well as the conductor make it. They, equally with him, are the guardians of its cherished and distinctive euphony and finesse, its delicacy and beauty of tone. Equally with him, they make its power, its brilliance, its magnificent and conquering voice. As they have been this year, as they will be in future, they as well as he are the makers and the pledges of its standards.

H. T. P.

News of the Day

At the end of the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon, after the chorus of the Cecilia had finished its work in the Ninth Symphony, it voted upon the question of coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra next season. The result of the test was altogether and even enthusiastically favorable to the project in principle, leaving the details for the officers of the Cecilia and the management of the orchestra to adjust. There has been of late an increasing disposition among the singers to leave the choir. Now, with its new fortunes, the mood sets in the other direction.

Mr. Ludwig, the short and bearded elder of the instruments of percussion in the Symphony Orchestra—and a familiar figure these many seasons to its audiences—is leaving the band this spring, since with advancing years the work has become too exacting for his physical strength. His spirit and his loyalty are as quick as ever, but the modern composers are making the way of the instruments of percussion steadily harder. Mr. Dworak, the tuba-player, of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke who passed to the "battery" under Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler, has also resigned.

ADVERTISER, MAY 3, 1910

MOISTENED MUSIC IN SYMPHONY HALL

"POP" CONCERTS BEGIN WITH STRUBE IN CHARGE

The "Rienzi" Overture and the Meditation From "Thais" Gems of the First Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

Last night, in Symphony hall, the Popular Concerts for this season began with much eclat. The King is dead, Long Live the Crown Prince! The Symphonies are ended, the moistened music has begun. Judging by the welcome given to Mr. Strube and his band the old Latin saying can be altered into "Nox Populi, Nox Dei"—that is, "the 'Pop' nights are divine." The programme last night was:—

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Du und Du".....Strauss
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
"Meditation" from "Thais".....Massenet
(Solo, Violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann)
Humoresque.....Dvorak
Selection, "Samson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Selection, "The Midnight Sons".....Hubbell
Waltz from "The Chocolate Soldier".....Strauss
March "Kaiser Friedrich".....Friedemann

As usual, Part II contained the nub of the concert. In this the melodious "Rienzi" overture proved that tuneful music will continue to exist in the teeth of all "theories" whatsoever, and Wagner is here a strong proof against himself. He may discard the overture all that he wishes to, the public will not follow suit.

For a sensuous and languishing foil to this there was the Massenet "Meditation" with the obbligato played by Mr. Jaques Hoffman, and very finely played. Then the graceful but not humorous "Humoresque" by Dvorak. Encores were in evidence and the audience was evidently "en rapport" with Mr. Strube's good reading of the well-contrasted numbers. But detailed criticism is scarcely in place here. People came for enjoyment and got what they came for. Therefore the Muse comes forward for a "farewell appearance," and chants thus:—

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Boston came with whetted appetite.

There were no puzzles by some modern Sphinx,
But pleasant melodies combined with drinks.

The old complexities were past and gone,
Though Strauss was there, not Richard now, but John.

And people soared upon celestial wings,
Refreshed by Music and by other things.

'Tis sometimes pleasant, all, we think, agree,
To take your "Tannhauser" without the "T".

To hear, while sipping produce of the Vat,
The horse's tail scrape bowels of the Cat.

Such programmes do not overtax the brain
And all are glad the Pops have come again.

[159]

BOSTON HERALD, MAY 3, 1910.

SCENE AT OPENING NIGHT OF THE POPS IN SYMPHONY HALL.

BRILLIANT CROWD AT 'POPS' OPENING

Symphony Hall Filled at First Performance, Gay Spring Gowns Giving Appropriate Color Touch to Scene.

Jocund as the very spirit of springtime, careful and recking not of east wind or the threat of leftover April showers, the "Pops" opened last night at Symphony Hall with appropriate fizz and brilliance.

The hall was crowded as it seldom has been before even on opening nights. The floor was made gay by a plenitude of many-hued costumes, with an unusual number of bright spring gowns and hats that provoked analysis or comment.

As an exhibition of novelties in fashion and millinery the occasion was a scintillating success. There were glowing Japanese wraps and shimmering gauzy shawls; there were gowns that almost called forth "oh's" and "ah's" as their wearers swept or ambled along between the rows of tables, and there were head coverings that were closely related to the flower garden, the umbrella or the chicken coop.

Yet the conservatism of Boston held ultimate sway—there was not a Chantecler hat present, unless it was in the back row of the top gallery. There were several near-roosters on view and one creation of white that looked like a broad-billed dodo or some such fowl, nodded over the first balcony rail. But on the whole the millinery was far less extreme in character than last year, when peach baskets, coal scuttles and old oaken buckets were lavishly represented. There were few, if any, vegetables displayed, flowers taking the places, so that with the Chantecler temptation resisted it may be said that the tendency of Boston's feminine head gear is away from the barnyard and the kitchen garden toward the flower garden.

Photo by Purdy.
GUSTAV STRUBE.

With less of the bizarre in gowns and hats, it was possible for the average person to pay more attention to the music—and the programme and the playing of the Symphony men were worth it. The throng followed the splendid work of the players closely, with evident appreciation, and at the end of many favorite numbers with enthusiastic applause. The conductor, Gustav Strube, had to rap for quiet only a few times when some delicate selection like "Meditation," from "Thais," or Dvorak's "Humoresque" was to begin.

Probably the best work of the orchestra was given to "Meditation." In this the remarkably fine playing of J. Hoffman as violin solonist and of Mr. Schuecker at the harp was rewarded with a storm of applause. This piece, like "Humoresque" and others, was repeated in part, and the orchestra showed its usual "Pops" generosity with frequent encores.

The only new number given was the first, "The Comet," a march by Mr. Strube. This was played with great gusto. It was revealed as a comet of a rather bounding nature, one that had a tendency to bump-the-bumps amid the celestial spheres and its tail had a decided swish. But its journey was a tuneful and lively one and it caught the fancy of the audience. Several of its bumps and swishes were repeated in response to insistent plaudits.

The other pieces on the program, all of which were received with evidences of pleasure varying only in intensity, were: Overture, "Masaniello," Auber; waltz, "Du und Du," Strauss; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; selection, "Samson and Delila," Saint-Saens; ballet music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; selection, "The Midnight Sons," Hubbell; waltz, from "The Chocolate Soldier," Strauss; march, "Kaiser Friedrich," Friedemann.

Following is the program for tonight's concert in Symphony Hall:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
(Organ, Mr. Marshall)
Valse and Pizzicato from Suite "Sylvia".....Delibes
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Introduction act 3, "Lohengrin".Wagner
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
(Violin solo, J. Hoffman)
Selection, "Bright Eyes".....Hoshna
March, "Flag of Victory".....Bion

[160]

GAY WELCOME FOR THE POPS

Opening Attended by Large Number.

Spirited Music by Strube's Men "Just Suits."

Comfort in Dress Seems to be Decision.

The Pops, that happy habit, indigenous to the soil of Boston, which blooms in May, and bids every man eat, drink and be merry to what tune he please, returned auspiciously last night to Symphony hall.

The men of the orchestra, with countenances blandly expectant of a good time, had comfortably seated themselves before conductor Gustav Strube appeared, shortly after 8 o'clock, with a stride tuned to the exigency of the 25th season, to the round of applause which accompanied him to the desk, and to the tempo of the first piece to be played.

It was his march, "The Comet," new, breezy, brisk and down to the minute. It went to the mark. The delegates were not all in their seats, but the members of Halley's new astronomical society applauded in a body. Mr Strube repeated the new work once through.

By the time the "Masaniello" overture was over, it began to be clear that comfort in dress was to be the rule among the men. There were courageous ones in evening clothes—swallowtails and white waistcoats and some in black—but they did not prevail. Dinner coats were in greater evidence and the man in a business suit found himself in good company.

Decollete was the decided exception among the women. There were, however, gowns and outer wraps to excite the admiration of all who delight in feminine attire, and there were engrossing specimens of the milliners' art which loomed up here and there upon the floor.

By the time the prompt and the near-punctual had waltzed in imagination to Strauss' "Du und Du," had followed Carmen from the fourth act to the second and back, and had heard the trumpet's signal in Rienzi, there were scarcely sittings for two.

Here Mr Strube added the barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffmann." The audience became quiet, listened, enjoyed it, then applauded zealously and heard a repetition.

Then Mr Hoffmann spoke for himself and played the "Meditation" from "Thais." Mr Hoffmann is the concert master. His playing was enjoyable and brought an insistent encore.

Conversation resumed quietly, smoke curled up toward the august statuary lazily, and energetic waiters counted out change in soft places noisily, while Dvorak's quaint "Humoresque," more fit to call up tender sentiment than to excite laughter, and a "Samson and Delila" selection finished the group.

Then, as has been the custom, came the promenade. It was an informal and a festive occasion. The audience had listened to spirited music invitingly played; had been served, if it chose, to refreshment likewise inviting, and was giving all the usual and decorous signs of having a good time.

TRAVELER, MAY 5, 1910.

"TUFTS NIGHT" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Symphony Hall will be filled this evening when "Tufts Night," the first of the special college nights, will be the feature. "Tufts Nights" are noted for the high grade of college music that is heard, for they have had many good song writers out there and their men know how to sing. The Glee Club will be present in full numbers, and the whole of the second section of the programme will be devoted to Tufts music under the leadership of Prof. Lewis, '87, with R. W. T. Francis, '09, at the organ.

Tomorrow night the delegates of the Eastern Art and Manual Training Association will attend the pop concert in a body. The feature of the programme will be two movements from Debussy "Little Suite," which will be played in Boston for the first time in its orchestral form.

BOSTON GLOBE- MAY 3, 1910.

OPEN!

THE POP CONCERT SEASON OPENED AT SYMPHONY HALL LAST EVENING.

This evening the program will be as follows: "Coronation March," Meyerbeer; overture, "Stradella," Flotow; waltz, "Girls of Baden," Komzak; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; selection, "Faust," Gounod; "Reve Angelique" (organ, Mr Marshall), Rubinstein; valse and pizzicato from suite "Sylvia," Delibes; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; introduction act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; prelude to "The Deluge" (violin solo, Mr J. Hoffmann), Saint-Saens; selection, "Bright Eyes," Hoshna; march, "Flag of Victory," Bion.

MONITOR,
MAY 5, 1910.

Tufts Night to Be Observed at Symphony Hall "Pops"

The sixth "Tufts night" will be observed tonight at the "Pops" in Symphony hall. For several weeks the College Hill undergraduates have been rehearsing the college songs and music which will be a feature of the program the evening. Practically the entire lower floor will be occupied by the students with the glee club and the baseball team, which will play Bowdoin in the afternoon, as guests of the evening.

Among the Tufts numbers which will be given by the orchestra will be the new "Victory Song," by William W. Rose '12 of Philadelphia; "Forward Tufts," the latest composition of Prof. Leo R. Lewis of the college music department, who has been rehearsing the singing and who is the glee club musical director; "The Campus Song," "For Tufts Hurrah," "Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man" and "The Brown and Blue."

Roy W. T. Thompson of Everett, the college organist, will be at the organ during some of the numbers. The college glee club, led by Winthrop L. Wales '10 of Hyde Park, will appear on the stage, singing with the orchestra in several Tufts numbers, and will also give several selections from its own repertoire, including the "Barnum Song." Novel orchestral arrangements have been secured and several impromptu features will be introduced during the evening.

The entire undergraduate body will journey in to Symphony hall tonight and the event will also be attended by the college alumni organizations on this section. The affair is given under the auspices of the honorary senior class secret society, Tower Cross, and the general committee in charge consists of James E. Douglass of Hull, John A. Adams of Hartford, Conn., and Prentice M. Hatch of West Somerville.

GLOBE-
MAY 5, 1910.

TUFTS NIGHT AT POPS.

Music by Students and Alumni Features the Program.

[illegible] Tufts night at the Pops. Tufts nights are always notable for their musical features. The second part of the program will be devoted entirely to Tufts music, which will be conducted by Prof Lewis '87, with R. W. T. Francis '09 at the organ. The program follows:

March, Durch Kampf zum Sieg.....Blon
Overture, Zampa.....Herold
Brown and Blue.....E W Newton '09
For Tufts Hurrah.....'87 Class Song
Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man?.....
E W Newton '87
Forward, Tufts (with glee club)..L R Lewis '87
Keep Your Eye on Tufts (with glee club)..
L C Powers '05
The Barnum Song (with glee club).....
Tufts Songs
Victory Song (prize winner '09)..W W Rose '12
Selection, The Midnight Sons.....Hubbell
Campus Song (stein song).....Bullard
Dear Alma Mater.....L R Lewis '87
(At the organ, R. W. T. Francis '09.)
Selection, Mlle Modiste.....Herbert
American Patrol.....Mecham
Waltz, Jolly Fellows.....Volstedt
March, Stars and Stripes.....Sousa

Orchestration of Tufts numbers by Lewis '87, Ingalls '00, Willis '01, Maxwell '04, Francis '09, Lamont '10.

BOSTON HERALD,
MAY 5, 1910.

"TUFTS NIGHT" AT THE POPS.

This evening brings the first of the special College Nights of the Pops, Tufts being the celebrant. The second part of the program will be devoted to Tufts music, conducted by Prof. Lewis, '87, with R. W. T. Francis, '09, organist. This is the sixth "Tufts Night," and will be the largest the college has ever had, as the greater part of the hall is already sold out. The program is as follows:

March, "Durch Kampt zum Sieg"....Blon
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
(a) Brown and Blue....E. W. Newton '09
(b) For Tufts Hurrah....'87's class song
Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man?
E. W. Newton '87
Forward, Tufts (with Glee Club)...
L. R. Lewis '87
(a) Keep Your Eye on Tufts (with Glee Club).....L. C. Powers '05
(b) The Barnum Song (with Glee Club).....'Tufts Songs"
(c) Victory Song (prize winner '09).
W. W. Rose '12
Selection, "The Midnight Sons"....Hubbell
(a) Campus Song (Stein Song)..Bullard
(b) Dear Alma Mater.....L. R. Lewis '87
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
American Patrol.....Mecham
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Volstedt
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa

Orchestration of Tufts numbers by Lewis '87, Ingalls '00, Willis '01, Maxwell '04, Francis '09, Lamont '10.

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 6, 1910

TUFTS OWNED THE POPS

Songs and Cheers of the Brown and Blue Made Symphony Hall Ring

All recitations at Tufts College are given today in whispers; the vocal chords of the students are unequal to the strain of anything more vigorous. Of the causes the first was the victory of the Tufts baseball nine over Harvard, the second was the victory of the nine yesterday over Bowdoin, and the third, and perhaps the most potent, was the sixth Tufts night at the Pops last evening in Symphony Hall. Once in two years the college has the opportunity as a body to share its vocal wares with the instrumental efforts of the Symphony, and when it does the statues that adorn the hall almost seem to lean over to see what it is all about.

Never was there a more enthusiastic Tufts night at the Pops. Mr. Strube and the orchestra were allowed to occupy the centre of the stage for the first two numbers on the programme, while the belated arrivals were finding their proper places and the Tufts spirits were effervescing. The enthusiasm was uncorked, figuratively some other things literally—when L. R. Lewis, director of the department of music at Tufts, took the leader's platform and began to swing the baton.

From that time it was Tufts, first, last and all the time. Tufts songs, written and orchestrated by Tufts men; sung by the Tufts Glee Club, with a whooping chorus from Tufts undergraduates and graduates made the hall ring from their volume. When particular emphasis was desired in the songs, the bass drum and the viol did not lack for support—they had it from bottles, vigorously pounded; from feet, heartily stamped; from voices, vociferously chorused. And the general effect was so good that there usually was a demand from all parts of the hall for more.

And it might be said of the Tufts songs that they are unusually good ones. They have a swinging rhythm and a strong college spirit. The last college selection of the evening was "Dear Alma Mater," written by Mr. Lewis and given with organ accompaniment, with R. W. T. Francis, '09, as organist.

GLOBE- MAY 6, 1910.

POPS ALL FOR TUFTS.

Brown and Blue Spirit Has Complete Sway.

Enthusiasm Brought to Flood Tide by Baseball Victory.

Tufts spirit deluged the floor of Symphony hall last night and most of those who sat thereon, effervesced through the air, oozed into the balconies, infected the orchestra and generally invaded the place.

The night was dedicated to youth, its exuberance, the annihilation of anxious care and to such lusty commemoration of these as demands good fellows and sound lungs.

With the afternoon's victory over Bowdoin still fermenting in their veins, 300, more or less, young men descended upon Symphony hall and, in the name of Tufts, showed how the Pop concerts should be run. They pitched their camp around tables in the forward section of the floor. Mr Strube was permitted to take precious time for two pieces as a curtain raiser, which matters not now, so long as they are past. Then came the big game.

L. R. Lewis, director of the department of music at Tufts, took the stand and by his vigorous manipulations of the baton proceeded to galvanize the greater part of the delegation with the voice of song in the performance of a series of compositions of music by Tufts men about Tufts. The orchestra meanwhile performed such notes as were set down in orchestrations furnished by Lewis '87, Ingalls '00, Willis '01, Maxwell '04, Francis '09 and Lamont '10. Some of the players performed other even more marvelous improvisations.

There was "Brown and Blue" (E. W. Newton '90), the college colors, which blazed meanwhile in a Tufts sign of colored electric lights over the organ; "For Tufts Hurrah" ('87's class song), and "Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man?" (E. W. Newton '90.) Everybody apparently was, for to the energetic leadership of cheering leader W. F Gray the total undergraduate population arose as one man and howled a series of metrical remarks which were amazing for their zeal if not for their diction. Mr Newton was carried to the platform and saluted with more yells by the chorus.

Those who were in the glee club sang several times from the platform and were warmly applauded. Those who were not then tried their vocal powers by classes, relays and platoons. The aspect of the place became as a young tumult on the board of trade, and it looked as though Tufts would win.

The orchestra returned from a brief respite and the second half began. The millinery, the beauty and the femininity of Tufts gazed over the rails of both galleries and applauded their stalwart brothers below in "Forward Tufts," with Glee club (L. R. Lewis '87), "Keep Your Eye on Tufts" (L. C. Powers '05), "The Barnum Song" and "Victory Song." The latter was the prize winner in last year's song competition. Everybody joined in the catchy melody and Mr Rose was lifted to a table and roundly cheered.

The climax came with a Tufts version of the "Stein" song, in which gray-headed men joined heartily, and the room rang with the familiar old melody. "Dear Alma Mater," by Mr Lewis, with R. W. T. Francis '09 at the organ, closed the group sonorously.

Then began a magnified production of the first intermission. Rivalry in the show of class spirit prevailed.

The night belonged to Tufts and everybody made merry in more or less rigorous fashion. At the last observation of the scene the orchestra was feebly struggling to make audible a selection from "Mlle Modiste."

BOSTON POST,
MAY 6, 1910

TUFTS NIGHT AT THE "POPS"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Tufts College celebrated last night at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall, and the statues on the wall looked down aghast at the goings-on. A record breaking audience filled the galleries, while members of the college, classmen and alumni and their associates held forth on the floor. Against the pipes of the great organ above the stage showed the name of "Tufts" in blue and the nearest electrical approach to brown. A banner of the same color was hung from the railing of the first balcony at the other end, and smaller flags hung all along the fringes of both balconies.

The students gathered in good order. The first burst of real cheering came when Professor Lewis, '87, the present head of the music department of the college, came forward to conduct the first Tufts song, "Brown and Blue," by E. W. Newton, '90. Later Newton himself acknowledged an ovation from the stage.

If the audience was record breaking, so were the performances, musical and otherwise. After two or three selections the growing excitement infected the galleries. The ladies commenced detaching the flags from the railings and dropping them down to favored individuals below. The result was a number of free fights for honors. The baseball team was cheered, individually and collectively, which delayed the band. Various classes and societies commenced to make themselves heard. The number of empty bottles on the tables kept rapidly increasing.

The occasion, however, was orderly as these occasions go. Tufts is becoming known among colleges as "the singing college." Its songs are remarkable for their ginger and variety of ways of raising the roof, which are materially enhanced by the learned and carrying quality of the orchestration, the secret of which is communicated to aspiring young composers by the enthusiastic Professor Lewis. After the song by Newton, most of the other famous songs of this college were heard in succession. Before the final refrain, "Aren't You Glad?" what was supposed for some minutes to be a catastrophe of nature came when Professor Lewis raised his baton and the orchestra, well schooled in the ways of Richard Strauss and his contemporaries, let loose a pandemonium of tone—every man for himself—and the whole floor, or college, made a variety of deafening sounds never before heard on earth. After a while the cataclysm resolved itself into a perfectly orderly "dominant 7th," and the last verse followed.

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 10, 1910

A Pop concert is as susceptible to the weather as any other fine crop. Its audiences that should teem are kept timid and retreating on these evenings when all good folk are kept teetering between gauze and wool, between pumps and goloshes, a fan and a fur coat. The Pops flower best in a steady warm sun. Then the undergrad may step forth numerously and confidently in his top hat and tail coat, and the suede slipper and fluffy gown will also. Thus far the clock has often crawled to nine in the evening before the Pop habitués have finally decided which it shall be—the fan or the furs. In the meantime, had they but known it, Mr. Strube was steadily supplying a fair substitute for the sparkle and geniality that was wanting in the weather. He played a Wagner programme last evening, with enough lighter and other things to keep Mr. Wagner from cloying. He knows just the degree of thunder and blare that Pop audiences like. He frowns not on their talking. He could make even Beethoven jaunty. And none so intimately as he knows the swing that a waltz should have to stir fond recollection in the aforementioned undergrad. He keeps his band well in order; he imparts to them his own idea of sparkle; he believes that a Pop concert should have pop. And occasionally—as last evening, in the "Oberon" overture, or the prelude to "Lohengrin"—he can seize just the right note of seriousness, not too high for a graceful descent to Waldteufel again.

BOSTON JOURNAL
MAY 10, 1910.

WAGNER NIGHT IS FEATURE AT "POPS"

Last night was the first Wagner night of the season at the Pops. The music was immensely enjoyed by a large audience. There was great applause for the orchestra and Conductor Strube. The Pops spirit was at its height throughout the evening.

Tonight's program at the Pops will be largely operatic, the works represented being Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Verdi's "Il Trovatore," Bizet's "Carmen," Auber's "The Bronze Horse," and Herbert's "The Fortune Teller." Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" is also on the list. The program is as follows:

German March.....Strube
Overture, "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Selection, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Valse Lyrique.....Emery
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Second movement from first sonata, Glazounow
Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
March, "Schutzmann".....Lincke

BOSTON HERALD,
MAY 10, 1910.

THE POPS.

Tonight's program at the Pops will be largely operatic. The program in full is as follows:

German March.....Strube
Overture, "The Barber of Saville," Rossini
Selection, "Il Trovatore,".....Verdi
Valse Lyrique.....Emery
Selection, "Carmen,".....Bizet
Second Movement from First Sonata.....Glazounoff
Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "1812,".....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "The Bronze Horse,"....Auber
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube,".....Strauss
Selection, "The Fortune Teller," Herbert
March, "Schutzmann,".....Lincke

BOSTON GLOBE-
MAY 10, 1910.

Symphony Hall "Pops."

This evening's program at the "Pops" in Symphony hall will be as follows: German march, Strube; overture, "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; selection, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; valse, "Lyrique," Emery; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; second movement from first sonata, Glazounow; "Spring Song," Mendelssohn; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky; overture, "The Bronze Horse," Auber waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; selection, "The Fortune Teller," Herbert; march, "Schutzmann," Lincke.

Tomorrow will be "Amherst" night, the first time this college has had a representative evening at the "Pops."

POST.
MAY 10, 1910

WAGNER AIRS HIT AT POPS

The second week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall opened last evening with a Wagner programme, and again a record-breaking audience. Mr. Strube had interspersed the Wagner numbers with music of different composers of classic or light music, though, as far as the enthusiasm of the audience went, he need not have done so.

After a certain number of years of awestruck whispering about the horribly discordant music of Wagner, it is now to be seen at any concert hall that there is no programme so popular with the masses as a Wagner programme. This has been proven repeatedly at the pension fund concerts of the orchestra, when the seats are sold to the general public at regular concert prices, and the announcement of a Wagner night brings a packed house when all else fails.

There was a brilliant beginning with the march from "Tannhauser," in which the organ joined with prodigious effect, and this was repeated. The rest of the Wagner music consisted of selections from "The Flying Dutchman," the overture to "Tannhauser," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Each one of these pieces could have been played over again—the "Lohengrin" was—and there were a number of encores.

There are few sights more truly suggestive of "solid comfort" than the groups at the tables, silently smoking or sipping and absorbing the music. The remainder of the programme included Weber's poetic overture to "Oberon," Strauss' waltz, "Roses From the South"; Rubinstein's melody in F, orchestrated by Vincent D'Indy; the overture to Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," which was being played at the Opera House at nearly the same moment; Walteufel's waltz "Barcarolle," Hoshna's "Bright Eyes" and Fucick's march "Gladiator."

The programme this evening will consist largely of operatic music from "The Barber of Seville," "Il Trovatore," "Carmen," "The Bronze Horse" and "The Fortune Teller." Tomorrow night will be "Amherst night," when the students will gather.

[161]

BOSTON POST MAY 24, 1910

HARVARD NIGHT AT POP CONCERT

Composers of "High Brow" Music Hear Works Given

Last night Harvard College, or at least a good deal of it, took possession of Symphony Hall. There was hardly a spare foot of space to be seen, and this, perhaps, was partly due to the gorgeous proportions of the head-gear worn by an immense number of fair Harvard sympathizers. The galleries were living with the Harvard colors, which disappeared in the course of the evening, as they were appropriated for souvenirs. Harvard, which has turned out all sorts of good men in the past, now boasts a considerable galaxy of gifted musicians and composers. Perhaps, after all, no more popular music has come out of Harvard than Morse's "Up the Street," but there were, as well, selections from "Inbad in Trinidad," by Titton, of '10; Percy Lee Atherton's ('93) "Noon in the Forest," orchestrated by Prof. Walter R. Spaulding, head of the music department; Charles Roepper's ('10) Orchestral Scherzo; Atkinson's waltz, "Lotus Flower;" selections from W. A. Langshaw's Hasty Pudding music for 1910, "Diana's Debut," and the football medley, in which everybody joined, to a ripping orchestral accompaniment, in the refrains of the new song of the year, sung at the Yale game, "Harvardiana," "Soldiers' Field" and "Gridiron King."

The entertainment went on in orderly style, and as far as rumpus goes, there has seldom been a more orderly Harvard Night. Still, there were phalanxes of empty bottles. Conductor Strube was greeted with a rousing cheer as he entered. The snappy music from "Inbad in Trinidad" was encored, as was most of the programme. Harvard knew how to treat its own. It sang with Morse and the football song, but listened so intently that the walking of the agile waiter was something of a disturbance during the performance of Atherton's composition and Roepper's Scherzo. These composers were present to hear their music played by the best orchestra in the country, and appreciated by a very much in earnest audience.

The Glee Club was there. They sang between the orchestral numbers such songs as "Johnny Harvard," "Has Anybody Here Seen Kelly," "Put Your Foot on the Soft, Soft Pedal," "One, Two, Three, Four," "How Well I Remember," "Oh Days of 49," Rhine wine song, a new parody on "Harrigan," the text of which was always striking, at the least, and the well-known Glee Club medley. The singers, led by Loen Foster, of '10, numbered about 30. You could hear the words as well as the music, and once, after a performance, the audience broke into a cheer.

ADVERTISER, MAY 24, 1910

"HARVARD NIGHT" AT THE "POPS"

ANNUAL EVENT DREW CONVENTIONAL THRONG

No Disposition to Intrude Undergraduate Hilarity, and Concert Was Thoroughly Enjoyed.

Harvard nights at the Pops are necessarily given to repetitions like a garrulous old man. The spirit is always the same—always a desire, sometimes suppressed, at other times vented, to make a noise. Of late the student seems to have undergone a refining influence—he is the university man out for an evening's entertainment, not the college youth prone for a rough house. He takes his pleasure and his cheering with a fair degree of moderation. Thus it was last night.

Cheers were faint and decidedly far between, loud voiced praise for the crew and nine and eleven, enthusiasm for the glee club which excelled that for popular Conductor Strube and his band, many pretty maidens and doting mammas, to say nothing of papas willing in such moments of bursting pride to be a victim of the undergraduate touch, and the time honored music. It is this music, heard through occasional cheer and clinking glass last evening, which keeps the Pops for Harvard a hardy, lusty, husky perennial.

Waldteufel's swinging and "castanetty" "Estudiantina" caught with its three four rhythm. The "American Fantasy," "Fair Harvard" and "Up the Street" brought cheers and thousands to their feet this year as last at this time. Mr. Strube put one of his marches at the head of the programme as usual—this year "The Comet." Student composition had its chance with "Noon in the Forest," by Percy L. Atherton, '93, and a scherzo by Charles B. Roepper, '10. The Hasty Pudding show and the Pi Eta theatricals were pleasantly remembered by selections from Tilton's and Langshaw's score.

It took the audience a long time last evening to get in the spirit of the occasion. There were many late comers, and evidently more interested in observing the season's "creations" than in paying strict attention to the music. In fact, the evening had far progressed when the regulation cheer for the glee club was given. The old songs and tunes, together with such ephemeral delights as "Rings on Her Fingers" and "Has Anyone Here Seen Kelley?" started the enormous crowd singing.

There were many notables in the audience, not the least of whom was "Bob" Morse, composer of the famous "Up the Street."

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 24, 1910

Harvard Night at the Pops

And it came to pass about the eighth hour on the first day of the week that the sons of the Prophet rose and girt themselves, saying: "Lo! we wot where good things are to be had—the red juice of the vines of Araby, and the music of the loud timbrel, conducted by Mr. Strube, one of the Faithful. Who goes along?" And nearly everybody went. And when they had drawn nigh unto the temple and entered in, behold, a lurid glare as of the sun at its going down was over the place, and mystic symbols bearing the name of the prophet. And mystic sounds came from the platform of the temple such as the sons of Allah are wont to cry when they get themselves down the field or up the street to do battle for the faith. And there, too, were daughters of the Prophet, which had obligingly left off their veils, and their faces were as the dassie of the sun when he rises on warm morns over the Eastern sands. Great is Allah who made the sun and the daughters of the sun.

And all the young men cried out together and shouted "Rah!" in a loud voice. And all the old men absorbed the soft drinks. So it was about the eleventh hour that they gat themselves back over the river into the pleasant land flowing with subways and the elm beetle. Allah is great!

BOSTON GLOBE— MAY 24, 1910.

HARVARD HAS NIGHT.

Lots of Pleasure, Little Noise at the "Pops."

Glee Club Contributes Some New and Old Songs.

Johnny Harvard and his lady were out in full force last evening for the annual Harvard night at the "Pops," and though the baseball defeat of the afternoon rankled sorely and prevented any undue demonstration of obstreperousness, they enjoyed themselves very thoroughly.

The program on the face of it was not noticeably a Harvard one, but the interpolations by the orchestra and by the glee club contingent, some 30 strong, and conducted by Leon Foster '10, gave the necessary crimson tinge to the whole affair.

In numbers the audience quite equalled those of other years, but whether it was Princeton or the comet or anything else, they were not disposed to noisemaking. They applauded duly and joined freely in the football songs and popular choruses, but only twice did they break out into cheers—once for the glee club and one final "Harvard" at the end.

The musical selections were well chosen and without exception were appreciated. "The Comet," which headed the list, gave a suggestion of timeliness. The football medley put a real thrill of enthusiasm into the audience, and the selections from the Pi Eta and Hasty Pudding shows were loudly applauded both by those who had heard them before and those who had not.

In addtiion to these last named and the old reliable "Up the Street," Harvard appeared on the program in the "Noon in the Forest," composed by Percy Lee Atherton '93, and orchestrated by Walter Spaulding '87, and the "Orchestral Scherzo" of Charles B. Roepper, '10, while as ever the evening ended with "Fair Harvard."

The program in full was as follows:

March, The Comet.....Strube
Overture, Semiramide.....Rossini
Selection from Inbad in Trinidad, Pi Eta theatricals, 1910.....A C Tilton '10
Waltz, Estudiantina.....Waldteufel
Up the Street.....Morse
Noon in the Forest....Percy Lee Atherton '93
Orchestrated by Walter Spalding '87
Orchestral Scherzo.....Charles B Roepper '10 a—Waltz, The Lotus Flower.....Atkinson b—Football Song.
Selection, Bright Eyes.....Hoshna
Selections fom Hasty Pudding theatricals, 1910, Diana's Debut....W A Langshaw '11
American Fantasy.....Herbert
(Organ, Mr Marshall)
Fair Harvard.....Gilman 1810
(Organ, Mr Marshall)

What was on the program, however, was only the half, and not the biggest half of the evening. The rest was in the encores and the glee club.

Of the former those that evoked the loudest applause from the listeners were the beautiful "Oh, Lovely Night," from Offenbach's "Contes d'Hoffman," a cleverly orchestrated version of "John Brown's Body," which allowed everybody to proclaim that "This is Harvard's Day," though it wasn't, and the stirring "American Patrol."

The glee club sang liberally and well, and won much merited applause. New songs and old, college songs and medleys came mixed all in together, from "Johnny Harvard," "Off for Australia," "One, Two, Three, Four," and "The Days of '49" to "Kelly," "Put on the Soft, Soft Pedal," and an apparently brand new parody of "Harrigan." Best welcomed of all, perhaps, was the glee club medley of old college songs which, though not new to many, brought an echo of laughter and applause.

No other decoration would have been necessary, perhaps, than the gorgeous habiliments of the feminine portion of the audience and the crimson socks, handkerchiefs and neckwear of their escorts, but the organ bore a great "Harvard" in crimson lights, and over the balconies hung many crimson banners which one by one vanished as the evening passed.

Tonight at the "Pops" will be "Italian night" with a program drawn almost wholly from the Italian composers, and it is expected that the Circolo Italiano of Boston will attend in large numbers. Tomorrow will be the first Boston City club night.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 28, 1910

THE POPS AND MR. MAQUARRE

The Special Programmes Projected by the Conductor of Their Second Period

For the rest of the season Mr. André Maquarre will conduct the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Strube waves the baton next Wednesday evening for the last time this season. Mr. Maquarre, who follows him, won his way into favor with the audiences last spring in the new part of conductor. His flute was familiar to them from solo passages in the symphonies of the winter, and his leadership proved as polished as his playing. He will give the first "French Night" of the series on June 13; a second "Wagner Night," June 20; an evening of Italian, French and Russian music, June 23; German music on the evening of June 27; operatic music, June 30; and for the final evening, July 2, chiefly national airs. Next Tuesday evening Mr. Strube has designated "Soloists' Night," with Mr. Schuëcker, the harpist; Mr. Gietzen, the viola player; and Mr. Heine, the first trumpet, to play Sullivan's "The Lost Chord." Tonight's programme is:

March, "Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Morning Journals".....Strauss
Selection, "Bright Eyes".....Hoshna
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Morning Mood and Dance from Suite "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Avé Maria.....Schubert
'Cello, Mr. Keller; Harp, Mr. Schuecker; Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
March, "Under the Double Eagle".....Wagner

The programme for Monday evening, Memorial Day, is:

March, "Hoch Habsburg".....Kral
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Vision of Salome".....Joyce
Selection, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Romance for violin.....Strube
Mr. J. Hoffmann, by request.
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Bolero Fantastic.....Merrill
Overture, "Si j'étais Roi".....Adam
(a) Intermezzo.....Atherton
(b) Serenade.....Moszkowski
American Fantasy.....Herbert
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa

BOSTON GLOBE— JUNE 3, 1910.

MAQUARRE ASSUMES BATON.

Symphony Player Succeeds Strube as Conductor of the "Pops."

Mr Maquarre, the admirable first flute of the Symphony orchestra, last night succeeded Mr Strube as conductor of the "Pops" and directed his men with much animation.

He made a feature of Bizet's beautiful suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne." Mr Brooke played the flute solo smoothly. Mr Maquarre included for the last number on his first program his march "Teddy's Return." The floor of Symphony hall was filled, and an audience of good size occupied the galleries. There was much applause. Several encores were given.

Tech night will occur Tuesday, June 7. June 13 will be "French" night. June 27 will be the second "German" night, June 30 will be "Operatic" night. The season will close Saturday, July 2, with a patriotic program.

BOSTON JOURNAL— JUNE 3, 1910

POP SEASON'S SPECIAL NIGHTS

The Pops swung into the homestretch of the season with Andre Maquarre, the admired flutist of the Symphony Orchestra, as conductor, last night. The crowd was large and as enthusiastic as any of the season and the program, of more than ordinary attractiveness, which marked Mr. Maquarre's assuming the leadership, was accorded appreciation.

The leadership of Mr. Maquarre, with which Pop audiences became acquainted last season, is as polished as ever. The soloist of the evening was Arthur Brooke, flutist, and one of the features was the new march, "Teddy's Return."

The program was:

Marche des Amoureaux.....Ganne
Overture—"Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz—"Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Selection—"La Belle Helene".....Offenbach
Suite No. 2—"L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
Flute, Mr. A. Brooke.
The Dragon Fly.....Strauss
Selection—"La Boheme".....Puccini
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Selection—"Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Serenade.....Haydn
Waltz—"Fideles Wien".....Komzak
March—"Teddy's Return" (first time).....Maquarre

Conductor Maquarre will give the first "French Night" of the last half of the season June 13, a second "Wagner Night" June 20, an evening of Italian, French and Russian music June 23, German music on the evening of June 27; operatic music, June 30; for the final evening, July 2, chiefly national airs.

The following is tonight's program:

March, "Schutzmann".....Lincke
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Girofle Girofla".....Lecocq
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Crepuscule.....Massenet
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Marche Hongroise.....Berlioz
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Selection, "Bright Eyes".....Hoshna
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss
March, "Teddy's Return".....Maquarre

BOSTON POST JUNE 3, 1910

NEW CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Work of Andre Maquarre Well Received

Last night Andre Maquarre, the leading flutist of the Symphony orchestra, made his first appearance this season as conductor of the Pop concerts. In previous years Mr. Maquarre has shown his exceptional aptitude for this office, and last night he was welcomed again by a most enthusiastic gathering.

For the last half of the season French music will do much to flavor the programmes of these concerts, and there is no more fascinating material, especially when interpreted by a Frenchman. Mr. Maquarre led with all imaginable warmth and musicianship. There was not a hackneyed moment, however well known the suite, or the waltz, or the march. In spite of but two hours in which to rehearse some 18 pieces, the conductor's individuality and enthusiasm were felt at once. He knew so thoroughly just what he wanted that he could make his wishes known in an unmistakable manner.

It is, moreover, a pleasure now and then, to observe a conductor who, whatever he is conducting, is not ashamed to let his love for his work be seen. Of Mr. Maquarre, indeed, it might be said that he sweated every piece on the programme. What vigor! What vivacity! How flowing the rhythms, how warm the curve of each long phrase!

The programme commenced with Ganne's "Marche des Amoureux," included the grateful overture to Auber's "Fra Diavolo," a selection from one of Offenbach's finest operettas, "La Belle Helene," second suite from Bizet's music to "L'Arlessienne," Strauss' "Dragon Fly," music from "La Boheme," "The Ride of the Valkyrias," music from "The Huguenots," a charming little serenade of Haydn, Komzak's waltz, "Fideles Wein," and last but not least, Mr. Marquarre's new march, composed for the occasion, "Teddy's Return." With what an optimistic tread does the Colonel return to his own! Tramp, Tramp! Tonic, dominant! On this figure the march is ingeniously built. The instrumentation is cleverly effective.

The evening was a succession of encores, and Mr. Maquarre's audience retired with happy anticipations of the remaining half season of these pleasant concerts.

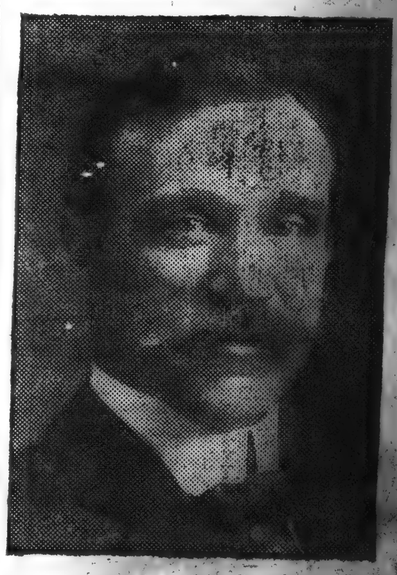
BOSTON HERALD, JUNE 3, 1910.

MR. MAQUARRE CONDUCTS.

Warmly Welcomed for Second Half of Pop Concert Season.

Andre Maquarre assumed the baton at the Pops last evening for the second half of the season and was warmly welcomed by a large audience. He conducted a program more classical than ordinary with his accustomed skill and the orchestra was obliged to respond to several encores.

Especially pleasing was Bizet's suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne," and M. A. Brooke's flute playing won much applause. Mr. Maquarre's march, "Teddy's Return," was heartily approved.



ANDRE MAQUARRE.

The following is tonight's program:

March, "Schueltzmann".....Lincke
Overture, "La Dame Blanche," Boieldieu
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Girofle Girofla".....Lecocq
Ballet music from "La Gioconda,"
Ponchielli
Crepuscule.....Massenet
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Marche Hongroise.....Berlioz
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Selection, "Bright Eyes".....Hoshna
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
March, "Teddy's Return".....Maqua

[162]

TRANCSRIPT,
JUNE 4, 1910

THE POPS AND TECHNOLOGY

Also, the Novelties Furnished by Mr. Maquarre's Programmes

Music and Science are scheduled to unite on Tuesday evening for their annual joint revel. Which is to say that Technology celebrates at the Pops. Symphony Hall has been monopolized in advance for the evening by the undergraduates, the alumni, the friends of the undergraduates, the friends of the alumni, the acquaintances of the friends of the undergraduates, and the guests of the acquaintances of the alumni. This will require most of the seating capacity.

A word concerning Mr. Maquarre's programmes; pieces which cannot find a place in the more severe concerts of the orchestra have been selected with considerable discrimination by Mr. Maquarre for this series. Dupont's "Chanson de Jeune Fille" is to be played this evening, the solo part by Mr. Willy Krafft, the present concertmaster; and also Guilmant's swelling "Marche Fantaisie" for orchestra and organ. Monday night brings an entr'acte from Massé's "Galathée," with Mr. Brooke, the first flute, and Mr. Wendler, the first horn, as soloists. In full, tonight's programme is:

March, "Merry Soldiers"	Sabathil
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppé
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"	Herbert
Ballet Music from "Le Cid"	Massenet
Chanson de Jeune Fille	Dupont
Violin, Mr. Krafft
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Marche Fantaisie	Guilmant
Organ, Mr. Marshall
Overture, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppé
Entr'acte, "Midsummer"	A. Maquarre
Waltz, "Je t'aime"	Waldteufel
March, "Flag of Victory"	Blon

Monday evening's programme is:

March, "Tambour Battant"	Messager
Overture, "Domino Noir"	Auber
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Selection, "The Midnight Sons"	Hubbell
Suite, "Noce Villageoise"	Godard
Entr'acte from "Galathée"	Massé
Mr. Brooke, Flute, and Mr. Wendler, Horn
Selection, "Faust"	Gounod
Entrée Triomphale des Boyards	Halvorsen
Overture, "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Saison des Roses"	A. Maquarre
Spring Song	Mendelssohn
March, "Stars and Stripes"	Sousa

TIMES
om
ldress New York City.
ate

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" Played—Mme. Sembrich the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in New York on its last visit of the season, and gays its evening concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schumann's B flat symphony, and Strauss's "Symphoina Domestica." There was an unusual pleasure offered the listeners in the fact that the soloist was Mme. Sembrich, whose appearance in orchestral concerts have been rare.

Schumann's symphony was put on the programme, no doubt, as a reminder of the approach of his hundredth birthday. The music retains its freshness and vitality, its buoyancy of spirit in a remarkable degree, and there are pages of infinite charm in it, upon which time seems to have laid no withering touch. This music has an innate nobility and distinction, and the comparison between this and the innate commonplaceness and triviality of Richard Strauss's colossal "Domestic Symphony," which came later upon the programme, must have presented itself to everybody in the audience. Schumann's writing for orchestra may have lacked the highest skill and technical accomplishment; Strauss has infinite dexterity, unlimited bagfuls of tricks that he lets loose in this pretentious work. But so far as his baggage of musical ideas is concerned, it could be wrapped in a small paper parcel. The symphony of Schumann was heard with the greatest pleasure—the outbursts of applause was loud and demonstrative, and Mr. Fiedler had his men rise and bow to accept their share of it, which was large.

The "Symphonia Domestica" was played for the first time in New York and has been heard a few times since, but it gains no ground on repeated hearing. It never sounded clearer and plainer than it did last evening, but this clarity and plainness only made it easier to see the poverty of its ideas, the lack of a real musical inspiration, or even musical prompting in it, the dry craftsmanship with which it has been built up to carry out a wholly extra-musical intention. The piece not only gains nothing by a rehearing; it loses. Passages that formerly seemed to possess beauty, as the slow section, seem now deplorably commonplace, elaborate development of ideas in themselves poor. In fact, it is clearer than ever that in this composition, as in most of the latest ones from his pen, Strauss has put a minimum of thought upon the musical quality, beauty, and expressiveness of his themes, and a maximum upon their adaptability for manipulation in combinations and complexities that occupy his mind so much in its present development and that represent themselves to him as descriptive and narrative.

Mme. Sembrich's participation in the concert aroused much enthusiasm. She did not appear to be in quite so good voice as she was in her recent recital here, but the perfect art and the command of all her resources resulted in a performance of great beauty and finish. She sang from "The Marriage of Figaro," the air "Deh vieni," and from Graun's oratorio "Der Tod Jesu," the vigorous air, "Lo, the Heav'n-Descended Prophet," that stood upon the programme of her last recital, sung then with pianoforte accompaniment, last evening, of course, with orchestra. There was later a group of songs with pianoforte accompaniment: "Der Nachtigall," by Brams; "Widmung," by Schumann; "Wiegenlied," by Mr. Fiedler, and the "Standchen," by Strauss.

rom EVE. MAIL
ddress New York City.
ate MAR 25 1910

MUSIC

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

At an impromptu Strauss festiva yesterday, Oscar Hammerstein pro vided two-thirds, and the Bosto Symphony orchestra provided th balance. Mr. Hammerstein's shar was "Elektra" in the afternoon an "Salome" in the evening, while th great orchestra from Boston unde Max Fiedler presented the Domesti Symphony. Had this been prear ranged, Strauss admirers would no have been compelled to choose be tween Scylla and Charybdis, as i was not possible for one to hear "Salome" and the symphony at the same hour. There seemed to be enough people to go around, however, with an immense audience at the Manhattan, not an empty seat in Carnegie hall and "The Pipe of Desire" at the Metropolitan drawing an unusually large audience.

Still another composition, on a day of Strauss thunderbolts, crept in like a delicate whiff of perfume through the excellent taste of Mme. Sembrich, who appeared as soloist with the orchestra. This was the "Serenade," with its fresh beauty, real musicianship and a dainty message of life in its springtime. Full of the spirit and the genius of the young German from whose pen melody streamed as only from that of Schubert, it was rich in promise, kept in his later songs, "Cecilie," "Traum Durch die Daemmerung," "Allerseelen" and others.

Genius grew stronger, blossomed into a tree, on which the exotic fruits hung heavily, became an overwhelming strength, a maelstrom of power. Strauss had mastered every secret of the orchestra, had wrested from it the last vestige of music. He discovered that he could move audiences to laughter with "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," could terrify, awe and glorify them with his "Death and Apotheosis." Then Nietsche fell across his path, and "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was born. Before Nietsche, Schopenhauer and Nordau had written, but Strauss had genius to hurl his satires and cynicisms, with the desired originality, and Strauss became the most original and most daring man of his time.

Is this epitaph or eulogy? A eulogy for the brilliancy which created "Elektra," "Salome" and the "Domestic Symphony," and a tear for the one who wrote the "Serenade."

Much interest was manifested in the second performance of Frederick Converse's "The Pipe of Desire," given last night after "Cavalleria Rusticana" with Destinn and Jadlowker. The cast was the same, including Mme. Homer, Messrs. Martin,

rom STAATS ZEITUNG
ddress New York City.
ate

hren.

Das Reich der Töne.

Morgen Abend findet in der neuen Musik-Akademie das fünfte und letzte Saison-Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters statt, unter Leitung von Max Fiedler. Das Programm enthält Haydn's „Oxford"-Symphonie, das Konzert No. 3 für Violine und Orchester von Max Bruch, Rachmaninoff's symphonisches Gedicht „Die Insel der Todten", sowie den dritten Satz aus Strauß' „Aus Italien"-Symphonie, sowie das Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern von Nürnberg". Herr Willy Heß ist der Solist des Konzertes.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
rom Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N.
Address
Date MAR 2 9 1910

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An Unusually Varied Programme, With Professor Willy Hess, Violinist, in a Bruch Concerto.

Full measure of enjoyment was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, at the Academy of Music last evening, the last for the season under Institute auspices. No larger audience has assembled in any of the concerts and, although it was rather quiet in demonstrations of appreciation, this was due largely to some of the numbers that were new in Brooklyn. Mr. Fiedler never had either himself or his players in better command, and the varied programme called for all kinds of musical elocution, Haydn's "Oxford" symphony in G major, formal and yet flowing in style, seemed cloying and simple beside the intricate orchestration of these times. Especially in the first movement it needed what it received—a spirited accent from the baton. Very pleasing was the sedate and pensive adagio, with its advancing introspection and meditation, followed by the minuet, into which Mr. Fiedler alternately infused vigor and delicacy. The last, flying movement, bird-like in its flight, was beautifully shaded from pianissimo at the beginning to fortissimo at the close, yet without too much thundering of dynamics. In fact, throughout the concert the conductor's baton brought the players up to resonance and acclaim without going a step over the boundary that lies between music and noise.

The Bruch concerto No. 3, opus 58, for orchestra and violin, Professor Willy Hess playing the violin, is a solid, elaborately written work, tinged with romance, and served to bring out forcefully the accomplishments of the violinist. Its romantic feeling met with sympathetic response in Professor Hess' temperament. His style is polished and yet vigorous. After the first, swift movement there was much work for him in a silvery stream of long drawn out melody, against the orchestral background, and the violinist played as freely as though he were improvising. Extremely brilliant was his playing of the last movement, which called for absolute knowledge of and skill on the instrument. Notably sympathetic was the work of the orchestra in support of the soloist.

Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem for full orchestra, to the picture of the island north of the Gulf of Naples, by A. Boecklin, the German painter, was the novelty of the programme. The picture shows a boatman conveying a dead body to its last resting place and approaching the island. The tone poem is almost programme music, beginning with oboes and woodwind choirs, depicting somber thoughts: muted first violins then lend emotion in a song motive, while second violins wail. The 'cellos, in manly baritone, begin a chant and the lament for the dead swells up to the brass choir, while all of the choirs join in and pile up the mournful elegy, subsiding to a distant funeral march, as though in retreat from the island, a hymn following and the resumption of the introductory weaving of the sea, ending with the feeling of eternal silence over the island. And all through runs the plaint of the oboes, somber but not dismal. So rhetorical and eloquent was the orchestra that there remained a solemn hush in the auditorium at the conclusion.

Strauss' "On the Shore of Sorrento," from his symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," opus 16, was atmospheric, after the Strauss fashion, but not particularly eloquent, the instrumentation being comparatively light and the whole a tone picture. There were sparkling flashes of melody, but none that led anywhere, the most speaking passages being the suggestion of a shimmering light across a rippling sea. The Wagner prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" brilliantly closed the concert and the season.

om Daily Eagle,
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te MAR 29 1910

Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been called to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to become director of the violin department, in succession to the celebrated late Professor Holie.

rom STAATS ZEITUNG
ddress New York City.
ate APR 2 5 1910

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestrige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler brachte ungemessenes Vergnügen. Schon die Anfangsnummer, Beethoven's „Coriolan"-Ouverture, machte Stimmung. Wuchtig und kraftvoll gedrungen rauschte das Werk durch das Haus, dabei von einem Wohlklang gesättigt, der das düstere Kolorit linderte. Den größten Genuß der orchestralen Nummern brachte aber Schumann's Erste Symphonie, die frühlingshaft duftige, die wie eitel Frühlingsruf und Verheißung dahinrauschte und das große Orchester in unerhörter Vollendung zeigte. Herr Fiedler hat mit dieser That eine der geschlossensten Leistungen geboten, die wir von ihm bewundern konnten. Da paarte sich Kraft mit Milde, vollendete technische Durchführung mit duftiger Poesie zu einem Gesammteindruck, der unwiderstehlich war. Das Publikum applaudirte minutenlang, bis Fiedler das ganze Orchester aufstehen ließ.

Die Solistin war keine Geringere als Frau Sembrich, die wieder einmal helles Entzücken erregte. Man kann die Mozart'sche Arie „Deh vieni", aus der „Hochzeit des Figaro" und „Singt dem göttlichen Propheten" aus Graun's „Der Tod Jesu" nicht mit reiferer Kunst und überwältigenderem Eindruck singen, als Frau Sembrich es gestern gethan hat, und mit weiteren vier Liedergaben hob sie die Begeisterung des Publikums womöglich noch. Die Künstlerin, die blühend aussah, wurde unzähligemale gerufen.

Richard Strauß' „Sinfonia Domestica" schloß das Konzert, das von Anfang bis Ende ein Vollerfolg war. Der Saal war gänzlich ausverkauft.

rom TRIBUNE
ddress New York City.
ate

MUSIC

NO END OF RICHARD STRAUSS'S MUSIC.

Two Operas and a Symphony.

Mr. Hammerstein, for reasons not hard to understand, turned yesterday—one of the days of his last week for the season—into a Richard Strauss day, and gave two operas for the price of one. He thus introduced an air of solemn festivity—or festive solemnity—into the Manhattan something like that which will prevail today at the Metropolitan when "Parsifal" will fill a large portion of the day. In utter unconsciousness of Mr. Hammerstein's purpose, obviously (for Boston is very unconcerned about New York's musical doings, as was evidenced in the usual manner by Mr. Fiedler making up a programme of music already heard at other concerts this season, all but one number), the Boston Orchestra came in the evening and to Strauss's "Elektra" and "Salome," which were Mr. Hammerstein's offerings, added the "Sinfonia Domestica." Whether any public was ever before asked to endure five hours or more of Richard Strauss in a single day is not of record. It was a gracious Providence that made it impossible for any one person to hear it all. There were great popular tributes on each occasion, but it was plainly to be seen that they were to individuals rather than to the Strauss music. In the afternoon Madame Mazarin whirled the audience off its feet when she whirled herself off her own in the mad dance at the end of "Elektra"; in the evening Miss Garden danced the people out of their wits as she had danced the head off the shoulders of John the Baptist. At the Boston Orchestra concert, also in the evening, the symphony which tells of Papa, Mamma and the Baby was heard by an audience phenomenal in numbers, but its presence, as its demonstrations of enthusiasm plainly showed, was due to the co-operation of Mme. Sembrich, who, although she sang Strauss's exquisite "Serenade" at the close, chose her principal numbers from Mozart ("Deh viene") and Graun ("Singt dem göttlichen Propheten," from "Der Tod Jesu"), which was a number in her last recital programme. Afterward she sang songs by Brahms, Schumann and Fiedler, as well as the one by Strauss already mentioned. Besides the "Sinfonia domestica," which, like "Elektra," loses in interest with every hearing, while "Salome" grows, Mr. Fiedler gave fine performances to Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan" and Schumann's symphony in B flat.

H. E. K.

[163]

rk City.
25 1910

m MORN. TELEGRAPH
dress New York City.
te MAR 25 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Max Fiedler, of Boston, Conducts Last Evening Concert of the Series and Madame Sembrich Sings.

STRAUSS' SYMPHONY IS HEARD

Applause of Large Audience Resolves Itself Into Tribute to the Boston Artists.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its New York series at Carnegie Hall yesterday evening. Max Fiedler conducted, Professor Willy Hess led the first violins, and Madame Sembrich was the soloist. They formed in all senses a worthy and heartily greeted trinity.

The house was packed to the doors, and the applause often took the form of a tribute to the high abilities of the orchestra, and of an expression of esteem to Mr. Fiedler himself, whose popularity as a conductor has increased with each concert that he has given.

The symphony played was Schumann's in B flat major—that delightful composition so exuberant in melody, so alive with invigorating rhythm, in all things so fresh, so limpid and so inspired.

Accurate and Powerful.

The playing of the first movement was as accurate and as powerful a piece of work as it is given to hear in the concert room, and fully in accordance with the best traditions of the Boston orchestra. The serene beauties of the larghetto received at the hands of the artists—and in dealing with this orchestra the phrase "artist" is used advisedly—concerned, a most tasteful and eloquent interpretation.

The Symphonia Domestica of Richard Strauss was also played.

On the occasion of its last performance by this orchestra the writer of this review attempted to delineate the powerful dramatic ideas underlying this picturesque and realistic description of home, with its pains and pleasures, its humors, its trials and its dashes of temperament against temperament. Strauss has herein painted as the great Dutch painter loved to do, an interior. That it is the interior of a Harlem or a Berlin flat is not against it. There are far more Harlem flats than Fifth avenue palaces. There are more burgesses than Brahmins.

Let Us Bow!

The wonder is that Strauss has done in tones what many able authors cannot or dare not do in words. Let us bow to the man who has materially extended the domain of music and stop chattering. Be it also said that the Symphonic Domestica is as lucid a piece of descriptive music as was ever penned. That is why so many "leaders of musical thought" fail so utterly to apprehend it. Strange men those leaders of musical thought.

Mme. Marcella Sembrich sang. In a wilderness of declamatory passion of a high order, amid a torrent of sound uttered by "lyric actresses," in a tumult of new school hysteria, we have learned to turn to this extraordinary artist to remind us what singing really can be and once was.

Represents Scholarship.

She represents scholarship; too many others typify audacious and extravagant apprenticeship. It is useless to talk now of the length of her career, of certain obvious and unavoidable deficiencies corollary to the length of the career.

No one is blind to them, least of all those who are not always mentioning them. But the real lover of music forgets them readily in such phrasing, such musicality, such science as Madame Sembrich exhibited last night in her perfectly poised utterance of the aria "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze de Figaro."

The last concert of the Boston orchestra season will be given on Saturday afternoon.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess
MAR 25 1910

"ISLAND OF THE DEAD" BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

In concluding the series of Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, performed for the first time here Rachmaninoff's "Die Todteninsel" ("The Island of the Dead"), a symphonic poem conceived after the manner of the celebrated painting by Arnold Bocklin. The impression which such a work as this would have upon an audience is immaterial to the judgment of its merits, inasmuch as the composer strives not to satisfy the musical sense of the ear, but to visualize in tone, figures and suggestions previously portrayed on canvas. For this reason Rachmaninoff's purpose is not musical, but pictorial, and the importance or value of his achievement can only be estimated from the strength and poignancy of its appeal to the imagination. Naturally the composition is representative of the very ultra-modern course which the line of musical development is following, and when considered from this standpoint alone there becomes apparent every qualification of a highly successful example of latter-day orchestral writing. Rachmaninoff, who follows closely the precepts established by the mighty creators of the great Russian music, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff, inherits from them a love for realism. And while he fails to reveal the inner emotions of the soul as feelingly as Tschaikowsky, the composer of "Die Todteninsel" nevertheless places before the eye with extraordinary truth the concrete details of his subject. Even the symbolism of Bocklin's wonderful scene is brought by Rachmaninoff into abstract relief from his many and vari-colored tissues of tone, and in the final effect leaves some listeners bewildered, and others even more so. The symphonic poem expresses fully the sombre and intensely tragic atmosphere surrounding Bocklin's island. Throughout there is an accompaniment based on a figure for violoncellos, double basses and kettledrums, which conveys mysteriously the effect of waves rushing to and fro. This theme is woven so elaborately into the harmonic texture that it really becomes the background for all succeeding developments. The island looms up in the distance with its desolate rocks and unpeopled shores—marking the destination of the boatman and his silent burden. From overhead he views with anxiety the premonition of a coming storm. The strokes of his oars quicken, and the boat cuts through the waves in faster pace. Not a sound from the ferryman nor a move of the white, silent figure standing near the coffin as the ravaging arms of storm seize all in their grasp. The conflict of the elements hides the dreadful group from sight, but they reappear in the calm that follows, still moving towards the "Island of the Dead," and when the composer draws the curtain one hears the unceasing, measured splashing of waves against the rocks. In order to follow Bocklin's picture with such religious adherence to incident, Rachmaninoff is confronted with the exceedingly difficult task of constantly changing the tonal key. How well he has accomplished this could not possibly be more self-evident than in the truthful description of the boat and its strange passengers, the approach and decline of the storm, sighing of the lone mourner at the coffin, and finally the soft beating of the waters on the shores of the island. Every shade of tone, each gradation of sound lends a touch of color in the completion of a memorable picture. A reminiscent phrase from the "Dies Irae" now and then interrupting the progress of episodes carries the listener deeper into the spirit of the composition, and the ears are strained in the desire to grasp the significance of every passing vibration. The applause after the conclusion of the number was not very enthusiastic, and yet it had to be generally admitted that the "Island of Death" is one of the most interesting things heard in Brooklyn in many a day. For the rest of the programme the orchestra performed the Haydn Symphony in G major, Strauss' "On the Shore of Sorrento," which forms the third movement in his symphonic fantasia "From Italy," and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." With the exception of the last number, which was played rather indifferently, all three features were found enjoyable. Willy Hess, appearing as soloist, played Bruch's Concerto No. 3 for violin and orchestra. His performance was especially brilliant in the first movement, and even though he lacks somewhat in general fullness of tone, he was able to make the adagio of the second movement attractive. After his spirited finale he was given a hearty demonstration of applause.

EVENING POST,
ess New York City.
MAR 25 1910

The best weapon to fight the devil with is music, in the opinion of Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Music is the highest religion. It makes men better," he said to a representative of the Musician. Concerning modern conducting he said:

om EVE. GLOBE
dress New York City.
e

The Boston Orchestra.

THERE is no doubt but the subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra got their money's worth last night, for the great crowd did not leave Carnegie Hall until 10.35. And even so, it would have remained longer had Mme Sembrich, the soloist, consented to sing any more additional numbers. The band, too, was enthusiastically applauded, with Mr. Fiedler, after both the symphony and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Strauss. It was a gala evening, full of solid fare and fine performance.

The concert opened with the Coriolanus overture of Beethoven, a piece heard so often this season that it would indeed be a remarkable performance which could stir us just now to tremendous enthusiasm. It was followed by Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1, which Mr. Damrosch played, to be sure, only last Sunday, but which has not been, nonetheless, too often heard, which is peculiarly fitting, of course, to the spring season, and which was played by Mr. Fiedler and his men with a jubilant sonority inspiring to hear. Mr. Gericke used to make the slow movement more romantically lovely, and perhaps the whole symphony more ingratiatingly melodious, with more exquisite coloring of the springlike details. But in the one great quality of jubilant sonority—jubilant, that is, as spring itself is jubilant, with blossoming life—the band last night were unexcelled.

Mme Sembrich then sang the "Deh vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "Lo the heaven-descended Prophet" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu," which she also sang at her last recital. Then she sang it, however, with piano accompaniment. Last night, with orchestra, the full power and beauty of Graun's music was realized. And it is music 155 years old. Mme Sembrich, opening with Mozart's difficult aria, difficult in its divine simplicity, was a little unfortunate. Her phrasing saved her, for her voice, especially in the lower register, was far from its best.

Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" followed the intermission. Mr. Fiedler conducts Strauss con amore. The performance was superb, alike in its tenderness of treatment when the music offered a chance, in its brilliant handling of the contrapuntal passages, and in its vivid outpourings of sound. Six years ago this month the "Symphonia Domestica" was first played by any orchestra at Carnegie Hall, the composer conducting. (It was not nearly so well played then, either!) How some of us then roared, or scoffed! And how comparatively Mozartian it all sounds now, to ears ringing with "Electra"! All of it is interesting—save, perhaps, papa's long, long dream; and a great deal of it is either beautiful or stirring. And none of it will ever make anybody like Schumann any the less. We dread the iconoclasts too much; ultimately they only smash what is hollow.

The programme concluded with four songs sung by Mme Sembrich—Brahms's "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmung," Strauss's "Serenade," and Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song," a lovely little song which she had to repeat, and after which she led out the composer to share the applause with her.

From
Address
Date MAR 25 1910

CLOSING ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

To-night brings the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, who will play Bruch's Third Concerto for violin and orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Haydn's Oxford Symphony, Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead," which will be heard in Brooklyn for the first time; the third movement from Richard Strauss' Symphonic Fantasia, from Italy, entitled "On the Shore of Sorrento," and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will form the last programme to be given by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Young People's Concert, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Symphony Society and the Brooklyn Institute, at the Academy of Music to-morrow afternoon. The programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Spinning Chorus from "The Flying Dutchman."
Prelude, Prize Song, Dance of the Apprentices, "Die Meistersinger."
Processional of the Knights of the Holy Grail.
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdaemmerung."
Ride of the Valkyries.

[164]

om AMERICAN
dress New York City.
MAR 25 1910
e

SEMBRICH SHARES IN SYMPHONY LAURELS

Strauss's Musical Novelty Instant Hit of Concert at Carnegie.

The Boston Symphony was heard in its last evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night, and fell into line with Mr. Hammerstein's "Strauss Day" plan by placing that composer's "Symphonia Domestica" in an important place on its programme.

Strauss's rather unique idea of setting to music the happenings of one day in his household was given a most noteworthy presentation. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the score is a noble, lucid and dominating one, but even his ability and the musicians' skill cannot help make the work anything but the noisy equivalent of a noisy home.

A Consant Tumult.

The tranquil, peaceful moments are rare, and to carry out the truly main idea of confusion the symphony ends with tremendous booming from the large brasses.

Perhaps, however, to most of the large audience, the reappearance of Mme. Sembrich was the real important feature of the evening. The charming soprano, exquisitely gowned as usual, was welcomed with enthusiasm, and first sang "Deh Vieni" by Mozart, one of the favorite pieces in Mme. Sembrich's long repertoire.

A delightful rendition of an excerpt from Graun's "The Passion of Our Lord," followed the Mozart aria, and later in the evening she sang songs by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler and Strauss. If appreciation meant anything, Sembrich could have sung twice as many songs as were on the programme, and then, perhaps, not have satisfied her innumerable and faithful admirers.

Splendid Achievement.

Schumann's always pleasing and melodious "Spring" symphony, and Overture to "Coriolanus," by Beethoven, were the other instrumental numbers.

In both of these the high standard of the Boston Symphony was maintained. Especially impressive was reading of the symphony. It was a splendid example of beauty and warmth of expression in the lighter moments, and superb force and firmness characterized the greater passages.

On Saturday afternoon Willy Hess, the society's concert master, will be the soloist, the programme of the concert to be composed of Haydn's Symphony in G, Bruch's concerto for violin and orchestra, "A Saga," by Sibelius; third movement of Strauss's "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's "Overture 1812."

From EVENING WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 25 1910

Sembrich Eclipses Boston Orchestra's Carnegie Concert

Soloist Makes the Famous Band a Mere Annex to What Practically Is Another of Her Recitals—Familiar Scenes Repeated.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING

MARCELLA SEMBRICH gave a recital at Carnegie Hall last night before an audience that crowded the auditorium. She was in splendid voice and most gracious humor and all the familiar scenes save one were in evidence—the procession of ushers down the aisles carrying flowers until the piano was obscured, was lacking. But the crowd flocked to the front of the stage when the official programme was over in the accustomed way and extorted from the diva four extra numbers, the last, of course, being "The Maiden's Wish," to which she played her own accompaniment. Even then the audience was reluctant to go home.

Ostensibly, the concert was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its farewell visit to town for the season. It began with Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, and included Schumann's "Spring" symphony and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," all played in the masterful way of this superb band. But for this once, at least, the famous orchestra was a mere annex to its soloist. Its individual members might easily have reached Thirty-fourth street after its labors were over, while Sembrich was still singing and bowing and smiling to the crowd. The final concert of the Boston Orchestra's season, without the distraction of Sembrich, is to be given to-morrow afternoon.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 25 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Richard Strauss Day.

Munich is to have a whole Strauss week the coming summer, beside the usual Mozart and Wagner festivals. New York has luckily escaped with a Strauss day. At the Manhattan Opera House Oscar Hammerstein presented "Elektra" in the afternoon, "Salome" in the evening, both to crowded houses, and while "Salome" was being sung, the same composer's "Sinfonia Domestica" was played by Max Fiedler's Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Thus we had not only a Strauss Day, but a Day in the Life of Strauss, for that is the subject of the "Sinfonia Domestica." Apparently he chose a day when he happened to be in Sicily, and an eruption of Mt. Ætna was going on part of the time. To be sure, it may be simply that the cook was discharged and smashed all the crockery—one cannot always be quite sure of the exact significance of the latest kind of programme music. One of the many unexplained mysteries of this work is why, in the scherzo, the clock strikes seven in the evening so much more slowly than it strikes seven in the morning in the following adagio. Perhaps it had nearly run down in the evening. Strauss gives much attention to such subtle points; herein, all other masters are mere bunglers compared with him.

In the Domestic Symphony, as in all his other works, Strauss makes good use of the "oasis method," which consists in planting a few pages of simple, euphonious music in the midst of a howling wilderness of discords. No matter how commonplace the oasis music, it sounds green and lovely. What we object to mainly in this tone poem and its fellows is not the cacophony, the noise, the intricacy, but the appalling emptiness of most of the music. Though this symphony lasts forty minutes, there is in it only one fine theme—a theme of four tones. That theme, to be sure, is admirable, and, when it is hurled out toward the end by the full band, including four saxophones, the effect is thrilling. It was thrilling last night, though less so than when Strauss himself honored New York by permitting it, on March 21, 1904, to hear the very first performance given anywhere of what was then his latest work, and under his personal direction, too.

There were other things on last night's programme which were applauded warmly: Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture and Schumann's first symphony. The audience was the largest of the season, and no wonder, for the soloist was no less an artist than Marcella Sembrich. She was not in as good voice as at her recent recital, but nevertheless got no end of applause for her artistic singing of airs by Mozart and Graun, and songs by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler, and Strauss—always Strauss. Every Strauss has his day.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, March 22.—A number of luncheon and dinner parties, teas and theatre parties are being planned for Miss Helen Taft, who is expected to arrive here on Thursday, among them being a tea on Saturday, with Mrs. John W. Foster as hostess.

Judge Wilson returned to-day from a visit of several weeks to Cuba and Nassau, where his granddaughter, Miss Martha Bowers, a debutante of this season, accompanied him.

Thomas Wilson Bowers, the son of the Solicitor General and Mrs. Bowers, will arrive here to-morrow to spend the Easter holidays with his parents. Mrs. Bowers will spend several days of this week in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, who have been travelling in the South for the health of the former, will return here on Thursday. Mr. Walsh has almost entirely recovered from his illness.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt have as a house guest Miss Maria von Stumm, of Germany, who arrived here yesterday to serve as bridesmaid at the marriage of Miss Hoyt to her brother on March 30. The brothers of Mr. von Stumm, who came to America for the wedding, stopped in New York and Boston, and will not arrive here until Thursday.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season was given at the New National this afternoon. Mrs. Taft was present, and accompanying her were Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Oliver, Mrs. Winthrop and Miss Biddle. Others in the audience were the German Ambassador and Countess Luise Alexandra von Bernstorff, the Netherlands Minister, Mrs. Gaff, Mrs. Barney, Mrs. Irwin, Miss Irwin, Mrs. Clover, Mrs. Hopkins, Mrs. Jennings, Mr. and Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Hitt, Miss Williams, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Keep, Mrs. Edson Bradley, Mrs. T. H. Carter, Mrs. H. M. Hoyt, Miss Hoyt, Miss von Stumm and Justice White.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m Daily Citizen,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

te MAR 25 1910

LECTURE-RECITAL GIVEN AT ACADEMY OF MUSIC

At the close of the lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to-night, given in Music Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the audience was asked for its opinion as to the advisability of continuing the lecture recitals. The question was put by John E. Leech, president of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, under whose auspices and those of the Brooklyn Institute, lecture recitals and concerts are given. The audience is mainly composed of subscribers to the concerts.

Mr. Leech spoke of the educational value of the lecture recitals and of the earnest effort that has been made to have them given by men of high standing in music to the end that the utmost advantage may be received from them.

Mr. Leech divided his question, first, asking those who came to the lecture recitals with real enthusiasm and felt that they doubled the worth of the concert in pleasure and in the educational value received, and who desired their continuance, to say "Aye." Every one responded vigorously. He then asked any who came just for the coming and did not care particularly about the lecture recitals to respond. This time there was no answer.

Mr. Leech said that he desired this information in order to make report to the directors of his society and thanked the subscribers for the cordiality with which the affirmative was expressed.

Because of the religious significance of the day the number present was rather less than usual. These lecture recitals are given under the Henry K. Sheldon Fund and have been an attractive feature of the musical season for some six years, one preceding each concert. That of yesterday was, therefore, the last of the season, as the concert this evening will close the series.

The lecturer was Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University. He did not take up all the numbers which will be heard to-night, but discussed the Symphony in G major, called "Oxford," by Haydn; the themes of "From Italy," a symphonic fantasia by Richard Strauss, whose third movement "On the Shore of Sorrento," is a part of the programme, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, playing excerpts from the first two and giving the last in its entirety.

The Concerto No. 3, for violin and orchestra, op. 58, by Bruch, in which Willy Hess will be the soloist, was not considered. The "Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem for full orchestra, by Rachmaninoff, which will be presented for the first time in Brooklyn this evening, was not attempted because there is no piano score. It was written to the picture by A. Bocklin, the Swiss painter, and is, Mr. Mason said, a composition of unusual beauty.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

APR 25, 1910.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTONIANS PLAY STRAUSS AS SEMBRICH SINGS HIM.

Good Friday "Passion," "Parsifal" and Manhattan Adieux Starting After a Day of Strauss and Russian Dancers—How "Elektra's" Curtain Rose Untimely and How Pavlowa's Audience Came Back for the "Bacchanale"—Sembrich's Encore for Max Fiedler.

That awful morning after 8-hour "Domestica," "Elektra" and "Salome" had its moment of high relief in to-day's memory of Marcella Sembrich singing the Strauss "Serenade," that ended the "Richard Strauss Day" in New York last night about neck and neck with the racier finish of nekrophilistic drama. Carnegie Hall's finest audience would not let the concert singer go without an encore, Schumann's "Spring Song," and then another for luck, the old English "Lass With the Delicate Air." And before these, she also repeated the poetic "Cradle Song" composed by Conductor Max Fiedler. Boston's "man of the iron mask" sat unwarily among his orchestra men to hear his own song, after the prima donna turned their big, noisy concert into a nice little piano-song recital of her own, and Sembrich spied him there. She beckoned him to his feet to bow his acknowledgments, just as the leader had made his 100 men stand up after the dancing scherzo of Schumann's "Spring Symphony," and again after the sonorous nocturne and breakfast fugue of the "Domestica" of Strauss.

Last farewells of the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place to-night in Brooklyn and to-morrow in Carnegie Hall. The programme for both includes Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, Bruch's third violin concerto for Willy Hess, and "On the Shores of Sorrento" by Richard Strauss.

To-morrow's matinée adds a novelty, Sibelius's "En Saga," and Tschaikowsky's "Overture, 1812," while Brooklyn to-night, in place of these two, has Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

MAR 26 1910

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Says Farewell to Brooklyn for the Season.

With a programme of more generous proportions than usual, the Boston Symphony Orchestra took leave of Brooklyn at the Academy of Music, last night, until the opening of another musical season. They are scheduled to reappear on November 11, for the first concert of the season of 1910-1911. There was a very large attendance at this last concert of the series of five, and a diversified musical list was received with signs of keen satisfaction, yet with no greatly demonstrative show of approval. Willy Hess, ordinarily seen at the first desk of the first violins as concert master, appeared in a more important role in the eyes of the public as the special soloist for this concert, taking no part in the orchestral performances.

The full symphony number generally accorded the place of honor on the programme was Haydn's Symphony in G Major, differently numbered in different printed editions and generally known as the "Oxford," because it first saw the light at the second of three concerts Haydn conducted at Oxford in 1791. It is elemental in simplicity, compared to later symphonies being very clearly defined in melodic outline and ingenuously frank in treatment, with scarcely a hint of the broad manner and developed fullness of later days. An orchestral novelty of leading importance heard at this concert was the symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by Sergei V. Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, who has been visiting this country this season, and who has in this composition found his inspiration in a picture by A. Bocklin, who painted a "dream" picture, suggested by the group of Ponza Islands, north of the Gulf of Naples, which are curiously secluded fragments of the earth. Mr. Rachmaninoff's composition is a remarkable production, out of the beaten track, and is a really noble expression of individualism. The music is in keeping with the strangeness of the subject, and is music of the highest order. It is not music to catch the musical ear directly with tuneful measures, but reaches deeper to the higher sensibility to the interpretative power and spiritual reflection of music. It is sombre music of necessity, yet withal a beautiful embodiment of the legitimate pictorial capabilities of tone effects. The instruments are used with a finely discriminating appreciation of their expressive function, and the score is singularly rich in its massing of the instrumental voices. This symphonic poem is a splendid production, and may be expected to take a high place among the standard works of its class. Besides the two compositions mentioned, the orchestra played the third movement (On the Shore of Sorrento), from Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Hess' highly developed skill and admirable musicianship were apparent in his rendering of the solo part in Bruch's Concerto No. 3, a work of serious import and worth. Mr. Fiedler has never conducted with more considerate and successful regard for the compositions in hand than he did last night, and the concert left a pleasant memory of an excellent series.

m HERALD

ress New York City.

e

MME. SEMBRICH WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Her Interpretation of a Little Cradle Song Gets Most Applause of the Night.

Mme. Sembrich, the soloist at the Boston Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night, received the most applause of the evening for her singing of a little cradle song by Mr. Max Fielder, the conductor of the orchestra. Singer and composer were recalled by an immense audience so many times that it was finally repeated.

Other songs which Mme. Sembrich sang with delightful art, and that were applauded to the echo, were Brahms' "Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmung" and Mr. Strauss' "Ständchen." After the regular programme she added Schmann's "Spring Song" and "The Lass with the Delicate Air."

Mr. Fiedler's men did their best work with Mr. Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played with admirable finish and was received with such a burst of applause that the whole orchestra rose in acknowledgement. The concert began with a beautiful performance of Schumann's first symphony.

HERALD

ress New York City.

e MAR 23 1910

WASHINGTON SOCIETY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mrs. Taft and Other Social Leaders of the Capital Hear Boston Orchestra Play.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

Almost the only diversion of which society is not depriving itself during the last days of Lent is the theatre. Informal dinner parties made up by telephone an hour or so before dinner time are the rule, with a visit to a theatre afterward.

Practically all of society attended the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, which was given this afternoon in the National Theatre. Mrs. Taft had a box and had with her Mrs. Lewis Moore, her sister, who is a guest at the White House; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, wife of the Assistant Secretary of War, and Miss Biddle.

Mrs. Leiter had with her the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce and Mrs. Butler Randolph. In another box were Mrs. C. A. Williams, who had the German Ambassador, Count von Bernstorff; his daughter, Countess Luise Alexandra von Bernstorff, and Miss Williams. Others in the audience were Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Frederick Keep, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt and Miss Constance Hoyt, who were accompanied by Mr. Ferdinand von Stumm; Mrs. Francis B. Crowninshield, Mrs. Barney, the Netherlands Minister and Mrs. Thomas T. Gaff.

Mr. Ballinger, Secretary of the Interior, and Mrs. Ballinger gave the first of two dinner parties which they had arranged for this week. Among their guests were the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, Postmaster General Hitchcock, the Solicitor General of the Department of Justice and Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, the Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Dryden, Mrs. Oscar Lawler, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth and Mr. Gist Blair.

The Japanese Ambassador and Baroness Uchida were also among the dinner hosts to-night.

From NEW YORK [illegible]

Address New Yo[illegible]

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Sembrich in Symphony Concert.

As Marcella Sembrich lent her stellar brilliancy last night to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final evening concert of the season it was not surprising that the huge auditorium was packed to the doors, even though so formidable an offering as Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" had to be taken into the bargain. It can hardly be said, however, that the concert gave unalloyed pleasure, for neither did the famous soprano reveal her powers to advantage nor did the orchestra play up to its usual high standard.

In her opening number, with orchestra, the familiar "Deh Vieni" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mme. Sembrich sang delightfully and with that peculiarly youthful expression of voice of which years have not robbed her. Graun's "Singt dem Goettlichem Propheten," from "Der Tod Jesu," with its difficult and wide-ranging coloratura, overtaxed her strength, however, and the result was not as finished as one usually expects from Mme. Sembrich. However, the prima donna had an opportunity to compensate in four songs, with piano accompaniment—Brahms's "Die Nichtigall," Schumann's "Widenung," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied" and Strauss's "Staendchen"—which brought the programme to a close, and the audience showed satisfaction in unmistakable terms.

The crowd, in fact, was remarkably demonstrative for an aggregation of Boston Symphony admirers, and passed the evening innocent, to all appearances, of the rough spots in the instrumental ensemble. Maybe spring weather had played mischief with the Hub's musicians. Be this as it may, Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, which came immediately after the opening number—Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture—certainly lacked much of the euphony and finish characteristic of the Boston orchestra at its best, though Fiedler's reading, as such, had a certain roughly propulsive fervor. Despite shortcomings, however, the crowd applauded loudly, and Fiedler saw fit to ask all his men to stand up in acknowledgement.

If the performance of Schumann's symphony had flaws there was still more reason for complaint in Strauss's "Domestica." This gigantic tone-poem may show more headwork and less spontaneous feeling than many of Strauss's other creations. It represents nevertheless an exceedingly interesting page in the composer's musical career and contains material of real eloquence and beauty. Played as it was last night, though—with insufficiently defined rhythm or the rigidity that comes from insecurity, with poorly adjusted dynamics and far too little attention to light and shade, to significant accentuation and characterization—the effect of the work is minimized. To make an impression Strauss's music must be given with the rhythmical incisiveness and lucidity which Mahler knows how to obtain and Fiedler does not. If the score does not impinge upon the ear as crisply as the printed notes stand out on paper the loss is great.

[165]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
New York City.
Date MAR 27 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Tone Poem by Jean Sibelius Gives Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its fifth and last matinée in Carnegie Hall yesterday, offered a somewhat kaleidoscopic programme of national colors and liberal proportions. The opening number was one of Haydn's most beautiful symphonies, the one in G, called the "Oxford." Following the symphony came Bruch's third violin concerto, which was heard here eighteen years ago, but not recently. Dedicated to Joachim, the concerto was fittingly played by his one time pupil, Willy Hess, who brought to its performance a spirit of devotion tempered with much lyric feeling and delicacy of exquisite tints.

The second orchestral number on the list was a tone poem entitled "A Saga," and by the composer of the little "Land of the Thousand Lakes," Jean Sibelius, the Finn. It was played in New York for the first time. Which native legend is here pictured we are not told; we can only take the music as we hear it. A rigorous, healthful treatment of themes, through which filters the Sibelian note, one so completely sounded by the expressive word of the Finnish tongue, sisu—a tender, loving pathos, one ever hopeful, while having its root in tragic suppression—is told, and uncommonly well, in "A Saga." It is an individual's utterance which is national and comes from the hearts of that simple, intelligent and unique race far away to the north whose land of oak forests and rocky coasts has been ever swept both by nature's cyclones and invading peoples.

From Finland to Italy is a long jump, but Mr. Fiedler and his audience made it yesterday with assurance and safety. "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," was first heard here some two decades ago from the Theodore Thomas Orchestra. It is of simpler and more natural forms and suggestion than the Strauss music as we have now come to know it and brings to mind peaceful and other pleasurable memories of Italian sky and waters. Tschaikowsky's patriotic overture "1812," suggesting Napoleonic defeat, Moscan flames, the Marseillaise and the Russian Hymn, brought the season's programmes to a striking close. The Boston men did some splendid work and the perfect balance of tone in the Haydn symphony was what we are used to hearing from them.

AMERICAN
New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FINISH HERE NOTABLE

Programme of a High Order Terminates Orchestra's 24th New York Season.

The twenty-fourth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed into history with yesterday afternoon's concert at Carnegie Hall. The character of the program, its excellent performance by the musicians and the choice of the soloist were all in perfect accord with the importance of the event.

Mr. Fiedler gave an example of taste and judgment in making up the programme of this concert for each of the five numbers. It was a distinctive composition. The four works following the Haydn symphony are by modern contemporaneous composers, but no two resemble each other either in melodic scheme or treatment.

A Capital Number.

For instance, there was Bruch's third concerto, for violin and orchestra. Willy Hess, the society's distinguished concertmaster, was the soloist. This number was most interesting in exploiting the growth and development of themes that start small and gain in power and grandeur as they travel from the small violins through the larger instrumental choirs until they reach the great basses.

Then one heard the strange tone-poem of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. The music of this "saga" is purely of the North, suggesting the melancholy and unhappiness that one finds in the more important Grieg works. This piece is surnamed "A Legend," and is supposed to be the music equivalent of the despairing struggle of the people in the far North, "the land of a thousand seas" and little sun.

Big Audience Delighted.

After this the audience was cheered and warmed by an excerpt from Richard Strauss's "Italian Symphony," and the last number was Tschaikowsky's stirring "Overture 1812," in which occurs magnificent settings of the "Marseillaise" and the "Russian Hymn."

Mr. Hess was an enormous success in a delightful and scholarly reading of the solo part in the Bruch number, and was applauded most generously.

The house was well filled and most enthusiastic.

From
Address
Date

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and this (Saturday) afternoon. On Thursday evening the soloist was Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who appeared in this capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in ten years. Mme. Sembrich sang an air from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's Passion Oratorio, and "Der tode Jesu," and also four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song," and Strauss's "Serenade." The symphony was Schumann's in B. flat No. 1. The principal work of the evening, however, was Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

This (Saturday) afternoon the program will begin with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Willy Hess, as soloist, will play one of Bruch's Concertos for violin and orchestra. The program also contains a novelty—Sibelius's tone poem, "A Saga." The other numbers will be the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's Symphonic Fantasy "From Italy," and Tschalkowsky's overture "1812."

From PRESS
Address New York City.
Date MAR 27 1910

Boston Symphony Season Ends.

Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall at the orchestra's last concert of the season here. Max Bruch's third concerto, the work dedicated to Joachim, was the number in which the concert master played. It was a masterful performance in every way, for the soloist was at home thoroughly with his orchestra and that body of artists in absolute sympathy with their sub-leader. Max Fiedler conducted with care, and the concerto proved the chief feature of the afternoon. In previous interpretations in this country, usually with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the soloist has been a woman, Camilla Urso playing it several times, and Geraldine Morgan, too, having it for one of her principal concert works. Therefore the more robust work of Hess yesterday was a welcome change, for at frequent points it needs a man's strength to carry the themes above the heavy orchestral accompaniments.

Est 1884
om TIMES
ldress New York City.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last Week of Its Season Brings Out a New Work by Sibelius.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its New York season on Saturday afternoon with its fifth matinée concert in Carnegie Hall. There was a very large audience, as there has been at all the concerts of the Boston orchestra given here this season. There was a new piece on the programme, entitled "A Saga," by Jean Sibelius, played for the first time in New York, in which there is the note of Finnish folk music, tender and pathetic. Also unfamiliar, though played here twenty years ago, was the third movement, entitled "On the Shores of Sorrento," from Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," one of his earliest attempts at programme music. It is founded on ideals and written with methods from which he has departed very far at present. Tschaikowsky's blaring patriotic overture (of which he had rather a low opinion himself) brought the concert to a close. Its opening was made by Haydn's so-called "Oxford" symphony.

Prof. Hess, concertmaster of the organization, was the soloist, and played Max Bruch's third violin concerto, also a composition that had not been heard here for years. It has never gained a tithe of the popuarity of its composer's first concerto. Mr. Hess played with delicacy and finish.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m dress
e

Willy Hess, Soloist, With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the visiting organization, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard this evening in a lengthy and varied program, which will open with Haydn's G-major symphony and include a Bruch concerto for violin and orchestra, wherein the solo part will be assumed by Hess. The Rachmaninoff symphonic poem, "L'Ile du Mort" (The Isle of Death), a Strauss movement, "On the Shores of Sorrento," and the vorspiel to Richard Wagner's comic opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg), are the other offerings announced. Max Fiedler will conduct the program.

[166]

From Daily Eagle
Address Brooklyn N. Y.
Date MAR 25 1910

ALL PRESENT SAID "AYE."

So the Lecture-Recitals in Connection With the Symphony Concerts Will Go On.

At the close of the lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of to-night, given in Music Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the audience was asked for its opinion as to the advisibility of continuing the lecture recitals. The question was put by John E. Leech, president of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, under whose auspices and those of the Brooklyn Institute, lecture recitals and concerts are given.

Mr. Leech divided his question, first asking those who came to the lecture recitals with real enthusiasm and felt that they doubled the worth of the concert in pleasure and in the educational value received—and who desired their continuance, to say "aye." Every one responded vigorously. He then asked any who came just for the coming and did not care particularly about the lecture recitals to respond. This time there was no answer. Mr. Leech said that he desired this information in order to make report to the directors of his society and thanked the subscribers for the cordiality with which the affirmative was expressed. The lecture last evening was given by Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City.
Date

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

In äußerst gelungener Weise hat Herr Max Fiedler am letzten Samstag Nachmittag die diesjährige Serie der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte vor dicht gedrängtem Zuhörerraum zu Ende geführt. Herr Fiedler hat uns in den zehn diesjährigen Konzerten des Schönen und Werthvollen die Menge geboten. Er zeigt gegenwärtig eine so volle Vertrautheit mit seiner Künstlerschaar und ein solches Verständnis von deren hochstehenden Eigenheiten, daß er unbedingt als der richtige Mann bezeichnet werden muß, unter dessen zielbewußter Führerschaft zu den alten Lorbeeren der berühmten Vereinigung zahlreiche neue zu erwerben sein werden. Herr Fiedler hat sich sowohl als inspirirter Führer der Orchesterkräfte erwiesen, als auch als geschmackvoller, durchaus auf der Höhe der modernen Errungenschaften stehender Musiker, dessen Ideale doch in den Klassikern wurzeln. Dies ist die richtige Mischung für ein Orchester von der hohen Bedeutung der Bostoner. Die Nachricht, daß er auch künftig an der Spitze des Bostoner Orchesters stehen werde, ist daher geeignet, alle Freunde guter Musik mit Freude zu erfüllen.

Im letzten Konzert hörten wir eine liebevoll ausgearbeitete Wiedergabe von Haydn's schöner „Oxford"-Symphonie, den langsamen, dritten Satz aus Richard Strauß' symphonischer Phantasie „In Italien", den der Komponist „Am Strand von Sorrento" überschrieben hat und dessen leuchtende Farbenpracht in der Darbietung der Bostoner in südlichem Glanz erschien, und ferner eine Novität für New York, nämlich das Tonpoem „A Saga" von Jean Sibelius, dem eigenartigen finnländischen Komponisten. Dieses 1903 geschriebene Werk ist ein echter Sibelius. Träumerisch, düster, in seiner originellen Schmerzlichkeit förmlich erschütternd. Kein Lichtstrahl erhellt diese düstere Welt des Komponisten, der in diesen tragisch-beklemmenden Tönen offenbar das harte Schicksal seines Volkes malen wollte. Dafür sprechen die gelegentlich visionären Akzente, denen man in diesem Stück begegnet. Gearbeitet ist das Werk mit der kontrapunktischen Meisterschaft und der vornehmen Instrumentirung, die Sibelius eigen ist. Sehr verdienstvoll ist namentlich die Detailmalerei im Orch[illegible], welche selbst weniger inspirirten St[illegible] ein interessantes Gepräge verlei[illegible] Gespielt wurde das Werk mit volle[illegible]sterschaft.

Den glänzenden Absch[illegible] des Concerts bildete Tschaikowsky's Ouverture „1812", jene so überaus lärmende Verherrlichung des russischen Siegs über Napoleon. Die Bostoner adelten selbst die dynamischen Brutalitäten des sonst so packenden Werkes durch ihren vornehmen Klangzauber und versetzten das Publikum in eine gelinde Raserei. Herr Fiedler wurde immer und immer wieder gerufen.

Der Solist des Concerts war Herr Willy Heß, der Concertmeister, dessen bewährte Kraft das Orchester in der nächsten Saison zu entbehren haben wird. Er spielte das wenig bekannte 3. Violin-Concert von Max Bruch, das uns gestern nach vielen Jahren wieder sehr gut gefiel. Es ist melodisch wirksam und äußerst geschickt gearbeitet. Herr Heß meisterte die Schwierigkeiten des Werkes mit seiner sichern und geschmackvollen Künstlerschaft und wurde lebhaft gefeiert.

From EVE. TELEGRAM
Address New York City.
Date MAR 25 1910

IN a musical season of unusual opulence one of the most brilliant concerts was given last night at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, gave its final concert but one for this year, with Mme. Marcella Sembrich as soloist.

From the moment the opening strains of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" rang through the hall to the final encore sung by Mme. Sembrich to admirers, who still remained and clamored for more, the programme was full of appeal for the music lover.

As usual, Mr. Fiedler's catholicity of taste and his broad musical sympathy were in evidence. Beethoven was followed by Schumann's Spring Symphony, admirably played and very welcome to an audience which had come into the hall from the witchery of a spring evening. Mme. Sembrich in German lieder was followed by Strauss' Domestic Symphony, with its denotement of a family life more sonorous than harmonious. Mme. Sembrich, gracious and charming as ever, sang another group of songs, including a particularly exquisite cradle song by Mr. Fiedler, of which an enthusiastic audience demanded a repetition.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last matinee of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Despite the call of the spring weather, the audience scarcely could have been larger, an audience, moreover, that in its enthusiasm was worthy of the great orchestra. The soloist of the afternoon was Willy Hess, who chose for his selection Bruch's Concerto No. 3 for violin and orchestra. The concerto gave Mr. Hess an admirable chance to display his technical mastery, and in the adagio he played with great delicacy of feeling. Of course, the programme could not have been complete without the name of Richard Strauss, no programme in New York seems to be nowadays, yet the selection chosen by Mr. Fiedler was not one of the "Domestic Symphony" type, but one that possessed a very general appeal.

The Strauss number was "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement of his symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." It is a composition full of atmosphere and delicate, dreamy melody. It was played by the orchestra with fine poetic feeling. The programme opened with Hadyn's "Oxford" Symphony in G major, a number which showed Mr. Fiedler's understanding of the classical masters. The other selections were Sibelius's "A Saga," a tone poem for orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's overture "1812."

EVE. MAIL
ess New York City.
MAR 1910

Willy Hess was the soloist on Saturday afternoon at the last Boston Symphony concert. There was a double interest, as the concertmaster and artist of the orchestra has been called to the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin, to replace the late Prof. Halir, and this was his last appearance with the Boston organization. He played the third violin concerto of Bruch with exquisite finish, beautiful tone color and the polish and poetry of the fine artist. The concerto has not been heard in recent years and its reception was not alone a testimony of approval of the work, but a tribute to the artist. Mr. Fiedler again brought out superb effects in Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; a tone-poem, "En Saga," by Jean Sibelius, and "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from Richard Strauss's symphonic "From Italy." The programme closed with Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

a TIMES
ress New York City.
e 1910

Hess Resigns from Boston Symphony.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 28.—Announcement was made to-day that Prof. Willey Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned to go to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin. Mr. Hess will succeed in Berlin the late Carl Halir, who died last November, as the head of the Violin Department in the Royal Academy. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, is mentioned as a successor to Prof. Hess.

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date MAR 27 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SAYS NOISY GOODBY

Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture in the Programme of Season's Final Concert.

Mr. Max Fiedler offered a big audience that gathered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, for the last of this season's Boston Orchestra concerts, an extraordinary contrast by beginning with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and ending with Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

The first is a beautiful specimen of simple, lovely melody, graceful and joyous, while the last is one of the noisiest of modern compositions, in which Tschaikowsky originally used cannon and bells. Mr. Fiedler had no cannon yesterday, but he managed to make a tremendous noise nevertheless. Both compositions were admirably played. In the symphony the orchestra showed a delicacy and a beauty of tone that evoked the heartiest of applause.

Mr. Willy Hess played Bruch's third violin concerto in a smooth and competent manner. The orchestra was also heard in Sibelius' tone poem, "A Saga," and in a movement from Mr. Richard Strauss' fantasia, "From Italy." At the close of the concert there was quite an ovation for Mr. Fiedler and his men.

---

om EVENING WORLD,

ddress New York City.

te MAR 28 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FAREWELL CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra said farewell for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, was the soloist in Bruch's violin concerto No. 3. The programme included Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, Sibelius's tone poem "A Saga," Richard Strauss's "On the Shore of Sorrento," the third movement from his symphonic fantasia "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. Mr. Hess, as well as the orchestra, left grateful recollections.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1910

A Strauss week end will begin Thursday at 3.30, with "Elektra," at the Manhattan. In the evening, while "Salome" is under way at the same house, the Boston Symphony orchestra will present the Domestic symphony, which received its first performance on any stage in New York under direction of the composer, and has not been given here in three years. Saturday afternoon the Boston orchestra will play the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Sunday afternoon, at the pension concert of the New York symphony, "Don Juan" will be presented by Walter Damrosch.

---

om EVE. SUN

ddress New York City.

te

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing its farewell to New York to-day, it may be time to tell the news that Concertmaster Willy Hess is not to return next year.

Mr. Hess makes his last appearance here with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet next Tuesday evening at Cooper Union, in chamber music of Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt and Dvorak.

He goes soon to Berlin, it is said, as successor to the great Joachim.

---

n SUN,

ress New York City.

e 29 1910

HESS GOING TO BERLIN.

Witek Probably Will Succeed Him at Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, March 28.—Confirming a cable despatch of this morning, which said that Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been called to Berlin, announcement was made at Symphony Hall to-day that Prof. Hess had sent his resignation to take effect at the close of the current symphony season, April 30.

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, probably will succeed Prof. Hess. The announcement puts it this way:

"Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Mr. Hess.

"Mr. Hess was under contract to remain [illegible] longer with the Symphony [illegible] but his invitation to Berlin [illegible] to him that the man-

---

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible] HERALD

ss [illegible]

gonnen.

— Aus Boston kommt die Nachricht, daß der im Boston Symphonie Orchester als Concertmeister fungirende Willy Heß, eine anerkannte Größe am musikalischen Himmel, als Direktor der Abtheilung für Violine an die kgl. Musikakademie in Berlin berufen worden ist und zwar als Nachfolger des berühmten Professor Holie.

rom [illegible]

ddress [illegible]

ate [illegible]

Willy Heß tritt zurück.

(Depesche der „Associated Preß".)

Boston, 28. März. Es wurde heute bekannt gegeben, daß Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters, seinen Posten niedergelegt und ein Lehramt an der königlichen Musik-Akademie in Berlin annehmen wird.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, March 23. For this Mr. Fiedler has arranged the most elaborate program the orchestra has ever given in Baltimore, not even excepting that for the last concert, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed with such success. The soloist will be that greatest of lyric sopranos, Madame Marcella Sembrich, who on this occasion makes her only appearance of the year in Baltimore. Madame Sembrich is down for two arias and a group of songs with piano. The two arias belong to that style in the singing of which she stands without a rival in the world today, and the first one, "Deh Vieni," from the last act of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," is indelibly connected with her name.

In all the performances of this charming opera in the last 10 years given by the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Sembrich has been the only Susanna, and her retirement from the opera stage has left a gap at least in respect to this opera that will not easily be filled. She is one of the last of that generation of great singers for whom the smooth legato music of Mozart held no terrors. Her second aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from the Passion Oratorio "Der tod Jesu," by Karl Heinrich Graun flourished in the first half of the eighteenth century. It was one of the favorite selections of the lamented Lillian Henschel, who sang it often. Madame Sembrich's songs will be Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade."

Of quite equal importance will be the orchestral part of the program. At the request of a large number of Baltimore patrons Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program the Haydn Symphony in C major, which is known as the "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Fiedler is particularly happy in the performance of Haydn, for he is able to preserve the eighteenth century traditions, and yet fill the music with modern warmth. The great work, however, will be Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. This is the last of the monumental tone poems of the greatest living composer.

It was performed for the first time at the third concert of the Richard Strauss festival at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 21, 1904, and the composer was the conductor. It was first performed at the Boston Symphony concerts three years ago by Dr. Karl Muck and Mr. Fiedler, who made an enviable reputation as an interpreter of Strauss, is playing it this month in Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. In this work Strauss has essayed to express musically the daily life of a family, and it is no secret that it is his own family to which he has given musical expression.

The esthetics of the work have been fiercely discussed; in fact, none of his works, not even excluding "Zarathustra," "Salome" or "Electra," have caused such bitter controversy among connoisseurs. It is a work of huge dimensions and enormous technical difficulty. The concert will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus."

---

om SUN,

dress New York City.

te MAR 25 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

THE "SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA" ONCE MORE.

Also Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and Schumann's B Flat Symphony —Orchestra's Playing Not as Smooth as Usual—Mme. Sembrich the Soloist.

It must have required no small amount of ingenuity to arrange so clumsy and incongruous a programme as that of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Society, which took place at Carnegie Hall last night. The soloist was Mme. Sembrich, whose doings seemed entirely apart from the rest of the concert, while the entertainment as a whole was altogether too long.

Its conclusion was reached by means of five songs with pianoforte accompaniment sung by Mme. Sembrich. These songs were admirable in themselves and offered opportunity for the display of the singer's beautiful art, but following the tremendous orchestration of the last instrumental number they seemed misplaced.

The first number on the list was Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture. It would be interesting to know why Conductor Max Fiedler regarded it as essential that this composition should be performed. It certainly was not because he thought New York needed to hear it, for it is one of the most familiar of works and has already been played this season by the Philharmonic Society and quite as well as it was played last evening.

This is a Schumann year and therefore it was not unnatural that Mr. Fiedler should wish to pay his tribute to the great romanticist. The B flat symphony has been also played here this winter in order to commemorate the Schumann anniversary, but let us forgive its repetition because the others have been played too.

The third orchestral number was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Symphonia Domestica," to which we have sometimes irreverently referred as the composer's hymn to papa, mamma and the baby. What more fitting than a pæan in praise of family life? How beautiful, too, it was to make the central picture that of peaceful evening, the blessed baby asleep in his crib, mamma knitting by the fireside, the shadows flickering on ceiling and wall and the great Mr. Strauss seated in the centre of all things making immortal music.

Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad that the music is so opulent in orchestral color, so gorgeous in polyphonic instrumentation. Doubtless it is not fecund in thematic invention, yet he who has few ideas and none of them heaven scaling, but who can make them sound as if they were, is after all a musician worth meeting.

The slow movement which follows the first striking of the clock is indeed good to hear. Let Mr. Strauss sit often in the middle of things and compose thus. Let him forget the maddening blood thirst of Elektra and the base passions of a Salome and reflect upon the joys of home, sweet home. Let him blow home, sweet home on his big bass soon, on as many horns as he can find in the town, on trumpets and trombones, on sackbut and psaltery. His song is far more beautiful than the shrieks and groans and sighs of the daughter of Clytemnestra.

And the allegro which follows the striking of the clock in the morning! That is a thing to remember. What magnificent polyphonic bravura! What a speaking of a myriad voices of the orchestra! If the excellent Mr. Strauss can find all these things by his hearth why does he leave his happy home for ancient Greece translated into modern German realism?

A superb piece of scoring is this allegro, and if the coda is a little overdone with its gasping brass and its numerous final cadences which are not final let us forgive him. Parting with this canticle of home, sweet home is such honeyed sorrow that a poor composer must be permitted to shed a few instrumental tears over the end.

Mr. Fiedler has throughout the season now at its close sought to evoke from the Boston Symphony Orchestra a larger and more brilliant tone than it hitherto emitted. There were rude thunders in last night's concert such as we have not been wont to hear from the clear and starry firmament of this organization. Doubtless some music lovers are troubled with questionings as to whether this is altogether for the best.

Ancient Horace emitted this pungent line: "Vis consili expers mole ruit sua." This is a truth worth pondering. The big tone habit is almost as bad for orchestras as it is for singers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been renowned for the exquisite finish of its performances. There were moments in the symphony of Schumann last night when one wondered whether something of this had not been sacrificed to other things not so desirable.

The Strauss work better endures the power of sound, yet even in this there are passages which would have been better for a little polishing. Nevertheless there was much brilliancy of style in the playing of both works, and Mr. Fiedler produced some splendid dramatic climaxes.

Mme. Sembrich sang with orchestra Mozart's familiar air: "Deh' Vieni" and the air "Singt dem göttlichen Propehten" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu." Her songs with piano were Brahms's "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmong," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied," and Strauss's "Serenade." Her delivery of the Mozart music displayed her unfailing art in the treatment of this master's melody, while her bold handling of Graun's difficult number aroused the enthusiasm of the audience.

---

n [illegible]

ress [illegible]

SUN

ess Baltimore, Md.

MAR 2 9 1910

WILL APPEAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH

ton Symphony concerts three years ago under Dr. Karl Muck. The concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus."

THE LAST SYMPHONY

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening.

The soloist will be Madame Sembrich, who will sing two arias and a group of songs with pianoforte. This will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the current season. The chief orchestral work of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

---

n STAR

Baltimore, Md.

ress MAR 23 1910

MAR 23 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening. The soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, who will sing two arias and a group of songs with pianoforte. This will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the current season. The chief orchestral work of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

[167]

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date MAR 27 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SAYS NOISY GOODBY

Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture in the Programme of Season's Final Concert.

Mr. Max Fiedler offered a big audience that gathered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, for the last of this season's Boston Orchestra concerts, an extraordinary contrast by beginning with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and ending with Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

The first is a beautiful specimen of simple, lovely melody, graceful and joyous, while the last is one of the noisiest of modern compositions, in which Tschaikowsky originally used cannon and bells. Mr. Fiedler had no cannon yesterday, but he managed to make a tremendous noise nevertheless. Both compositions were admirably played. In the symphony the orchestra showed a delicacy and a beauty of tone that evoked the heartiest of applause.

Mr. Willy Hess played Bruch's third violin concerto in a smooth and competent manner. The orchestra was also heard in Sibelius' tone poem, "A Saga," and in a movement from Mr. Richard Strauss' fantasia, "From Italy." At the close of the concert there was quite an ovation for Mr. Fiedler and his men.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...GERMAN HERALD

...ss .....

...ginnen.

— Aus Boston kommt die Nachricht, daß der im Boston Symphonie Orchester als Concertmeister fungirende Willy Heß, eine anerkannte Größe am musikalischen Himmel, als Direktor der Abtheilung für Violine an die kgl. Musikakademie in Berlin berufen worden ist und zwar als Nachfolger des berühmten Professor Holie.

...Newspaper ...

...rom .....

...ddress .....

...ate .....

Willy Heß tritt zurück.

(Depesche der „Associated Preß".)

Boston, 28. März. Es wurde heute bekannt gegeben, daß Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters, seinen Posten niedergelegt und ein Lehramt an der königlichen Musik-Akademie in Berlin annehmen wird.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

---

om EVENING WORLD,

ddress New York City.

te MAR 28 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FAREWELL NCERT.

The Boston Symphony orstra said farewell for the season Carnegie Hall on Saturday afterno Willy Hess, the concertmaster, wa the soloist, in Bruch's violin concerto o. 3. The programme included Haydn's Oxford" symphony, Sibelius's tone em "A Saga," Richard Strauss's On the Shore of Sorrento," the third vement from his symphonic fantasia "From Italy," and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. Mr. Hess, as well as the orchestra, left grateful recollections.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1910

A Strauss week end will begin Thursday at 8.30, with "Elektra," at the Manhattan. In the evening, while "Salome" is under way at the same house, the Boston Symphony orchestra will present the Domestic symphony, which received its first performance on any stage in New York under direction of the composer, and has not been given here in three years. Saturday afternoon the Boston orchestra will play the third movement, "On the Shore of Sorrento," from the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," and Sunday afternoon, at the pension concert of the New York symphony, "Don Juan" will be presented by Walter Damrosch.

---

om EVE. SUN

ddress New York City.

te .....

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing its farewell to New York to-day, it may be time to tell the news that Concertmaster Willy Hess is not to return next year.

Mr. Hess makes his last appearance here with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet next Tuesday evening at Cooper Union, in chamber music of Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt and Dvorak.

He goes soon to Berlin, it is said, as successor to the great Joachim.

---

n SUN,

ress New York City.

e ... 9 1910

HESS GOING TO BERLIN.

Witek Probably Will Succeed Him at Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, March 28.—Confirming a cable despatch of this morning, which said that Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been called to Berlin, announcement was made at Symphony Hall to-day that Prof. Hess had sent his resignation to take effect at the close of the current symphony season, April 30.

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, probably will succeed Prof. Hess. The announcement puts it this way:

"Negotiations are in progress with Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and it is probable that he will succeed to the post vacated by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Hess was under contract to remain ... longer with the Symphony ... his invitation to Berlin ... to him that the man-

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, March 23. For this Mr. Fiedler has arranged the most elaborate program the orchestra has ever given in Baltimore, not even excepting that for the last concert, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed with such success. The soloist will be that greatest of lyric sopranos, Madame Marcella Sembrich, who on this occasion makes her only appearance of the year in Baltimore. Madame Sembrich is down for two arias and a group of songs with piano. The two arias belong to that style in the singing of which she stands without a rival in the world today, and the first one, "Deh Vieni," from the last act of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," is indelibly connected with her name.

In all the performances of this charming opera in the last 10 years given by the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Sembrich has been the only Susanna, and her retirement from the opera stage has left a gap at least in respect to this opera that will not easily be filled. She is one of the last of that generation of great singers for whom the smooth legato music of Mozart held no terrors. Her second aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from the Passion Oratorio "Der tod Jesu," by Karl Heinrich Graun flourished in the first half of the eighteenth century. It was one of the favorite selections of the lamented Lillian Henschel, who sang it often. Madame Sembrich's songs will be Brahm's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade."

Of quite equal importance will be the orchestral part of the program. At the request of a large number of Baltimore patrons Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program the Haydn Symphony in C major, which is known as the "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Fiedler is particularly happy in the performance of Haydn, for he is able to preserve the eighteenth century traditions, and yet fill the music with modern warmth. The great work, however, will be Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. This is the last of the monumental tone poems of the greatest living composer.

It was performed for the first time at the third concert of the Richard Strauss festical at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 21, 1904, and the composer was the conductor. It was first performed at the Boston Symphony concerts three years ago by Dr. Karl Muck and Mr. Fiedler, who made an enviable reputation as an interpreter of Strauss, is playing it this month in Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. In this work Strauss has essayed to express musically the daily life of a family, and it is no secret that it is his own family to which he has given musical expression.

The esthetics of the work have been fiercely discussed; in fact, none of his works, not even excluding "Zarathustra," "Salome" or "Electra," have caused such bitter controversy among connoisseurs. It is a work of huge dimensions and enormous technical difficulty. The concert will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus."

---

om SUN,

dress New York City.

te MAR 25 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

THE "SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA" ONCE MORE.

Also Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and Schumann's B Flat Symphony —Orchestra's Playing Not as Smooth as Usual—Mme. Sembrich the Soloist.

It must have required no small amount of ingenuity to arrange so clumsy and incongruous a programme as that of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Society, which took place at Carnegie Hall last night. The soloist was Mme. Sembrich, whose doings seemed entirely apart from the rest of the concert, while the entertainment as a whole was altogether too long.

Its conclusion was reached by means of five songs with pianoforte accompaniment sung by Mme. Sembrich. These songs were admirable in themselves and offered opportunity for the display of the singer's beautiful art, but following the tremendous orchestration of the last instrumental number they seemed misplaced.

The first number on the list was Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture. It would be interesting to know why Conductor Max Fiedler regarded it as essential that this composition should be performed. It certainly was not because he thought New York needed to hear it, for it is one of the most familiar of works and has already been played this season by the Philharmonic Society and quite as well as it was played last evening.

This is a Schumann year and therefore it was not unnatural that Mr. Fiedler should wish to pay his tribute to the great romanticist. The B flat symphony has been also played here this winter in order to commemorate the Schumann anniversary, but let us forgive its repetition because the others have been played too.

The third orchestral number was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Symphonia Domestica," to which we have sometimes irreverently referred as the composer's hymn to papa, mamma and the baby. What more fitting than a pæan in praise of family life? How beautiful, too, it was to make the central picture that of peaceful evening, the blessed baby asleep in his crib, mamma knitting by the fireside, the shadows flickering on ceiling and wall and the great Mr. Strauss seated in the centre of all things making immortal music.

Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad that the music is so opulent in orchestral color, so gorgeous in polyphonic instrumentation. Doubtless it is not fecund in thematic invention, yet he who has few ideas and none of them heaven scaling, but who can make them sound as if they were, is after all a musician worth meeting.

The slow movement which follows the first striking of the clock is indeed good to hear. Let Mr. Strauss sit often in the middle of things and compose thus. Let him forget the maddening blood thirst of Elektra and the base passions of a Salome and reflect upon the joys of home, sweet home. Let him blow home, sweet home on his big bassoon, on as many horns as he can find in the town, on trumpets and trombones, on sackbut and psaltery. His song is far more beautiful than the shrieks and groans and sighs of the daughter of Clytemnestra.

And the allegro which follows the striking of the clock in the morning! That is a thing to remember. What magnificent polyphonic bravura! What a speaking of a myriad voices of the orchestra! If the excellent Mr. Strauss can find all these things by his hearth why does he leave his happy home for ancient Greece translated into modern German realism?

A superb piece of scoring is this allegro, and if the coda is a little overdone with its gasping brass and its numerous final cadences which are not final let us forgive him. Parting with this canticle of home, sweet home is such honeyed sorrow that a poor composer must be permitted to shed a few instrumental tears over the end.

Mr. Fiedler has throughout the season now at its close sought to evoke from the Boston Symphony Orchestra a larger and more brilliant tone than it hitherto emitted. There were rude thunders in last night's concert such as we have not been wont to hear from the clear and starry firmament of this organization. Doubtless some music lovers are troubled with questionings as to whether this is altogether for the best.

Ancient Horace emitted this pungent line: "Vis consili expers mole ruit sua." This is a truth worth pondering. The big tone habit is almost as bad for orchestras as it is for singers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been renowned for the exquisite finish of its performances. There were moments in the symphony of Schumann last night when one wondered whether something of this had not been sacrificed to other things not so desirable.

The Strauss work better endures the power of sound, yet even in this there are passages which would have been better for a little polishing. Nevertheless there was much brilliancy of style in the playing of both works, and Mr. Fiedler produced some splendid dramatic climaxes.

Mme. Sembrich sang with orchestra Mozart's familiar air: "Deh' Vieni" and the air "Singt dem göttlichen Propehten" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu." Her songs with piano were Brahms's "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmong," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied," and Strauss's "Serenade." Her delivery of the Mozart music displayed her unfailing art in the treatment of this master's melody, while her bold handling of Graun's difficult number aroused the enthusiasm of the audience.

...SUN

...ess ... Baltimore, Md.

... MAR 2 0 1910

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Boston Symphony To End Baltimore Season Wednesday.

The last Baltimore concert of the season of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening. For this performance Mr. Fiedler has arranged an elaborate program. The soloist will be Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who will make her only appearance of the year in Baltimore. Mme. Sembrich will sing two arias and a group of songs with piano. The arias belong to that style in the singing of which she stands without a rival—"Deh vieni," from the last act of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from the passion oratorio "Der tod Jesu," by Karl Heinrich Graun, who flourished in the first half of the eighteenth century. The latter was one of the favorite selections of Lillian Henschel, who sang it often. Mme. Sembrich's songs will be Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Serenade."

Of equal importance will be the orchestral part of the program. At the request of a large number of Baltimore patrons Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program the Haydn Symphony in C Major, which is known as the "Oxford" Symphony. Mr. Fiedler is particularly happy in the performance of Haydn, for he is able to preserve the eighteenth century traditions and yet fill the music with modern warmth. Another number will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. This is the latest of the monumental tone poems of the greatest living composer. It was performed for the first time at the third concert of the Richard Strauss festival at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 21, 1904, when the composer was the conductor. It was first performed at the Boston Symphony concerts three years ago under Dr. Karl Muck. The concert will begin with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus."

---

n .....

...ress .....

THE LAST SYMPHONY

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening.

The soloist will be Madame Sembrich, who will sing two arias and a group of songs with pianoforte. This will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the current season. The chief orchestral work of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

---

n STAR

ress Baltimore, Md.

MAR 23 1910

MAR 23 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening. The soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, who will sing two arias and a group of songs with pianoforte. This will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the current season. The chief orchestral work of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

From STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 24 1910

MADAME SEMBRICH SMASHED THE RULE

Three Encores in Brilliant Concert Ending Boston Symphony Season.

Madame Marcella Sembrich was the soloist last evening at the last concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received from the large audience that filled the Lyric such an ovation as to prove that Baltimore is with the rest of the world in the appreciation of her art. The program given was an interesting one, presenting as it did sharp contrasts. It was as follows:

Beethoven—Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Op. 62.

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "Oxford" (Peters, No. 9; Rieter-Biedermann, No. 2). I. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso. II. Adagio. III. Menuetto; Allegretto; Trio. IV. Presto.

Arias with orchestra.—Mozart—"Deh vieni" ("O come, my heart's delight"), from "Le Nozze di Figaro," act IV., scene 10. Graun—"Singt dem gottlichen Propheten" ("Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet"), from "Der Tod Jesu" ("The Death of Jesus").

Strauss—Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53 (in one movement).

Songs with piano.—Brahms—"Die Nachtigall" ("The Nightingale"), Op. 46, No. 4. Schumann—"Widmung" ("Dedication"), Op. 25, No. 1. Fiedler—"Wiegenlied" ("Cradle Song"), Op. 8, No. 1. Strauss—"Standchen" ("Serenade"), Op. 17, No. 2.

There can be little that is more opposed than the Haydn and Strauss numbers—the first simple and beautiful, the latter involved and written evidently for the display of technique. It did not find the general favor with the audience that was awarded the remainder of the program, and its rather long and involved movements were extremely difficult to follow. Its rendition was extremely brilliant, however, and the orchestra was warmly applauded.

The Haydn number was perfect. Its simplicity and harmony made it stand out as one of the genuine delights of the symphony programs this season.

Madame Sembrich was, as usual, dramatic. The two arias which composed the first portion of her program proved at once that her tones were as pure as ever, her range as wide. She gave the Graun number a dramatic rendering, and was recalled to the stage repeatedly. After the collection of songs that ended the program she received her greatest ovation. The audience lingered, and their insistent applause was rewarded by Madame Sembrich with two encores. Her interpretation of these songs was thoroughly charming, especially the "Cradle Song," written by Max Fielder, a dainty, exquisite bit of music, which Madame Sembrich repeated as an encore.

The scene at the conclusion of the concert was most interesting and uncommon. Madame Sembrich returned to the stage again and again to respond to the applause, and finally, when it became too insistent, the rule of the Boston Symphony, which eliminates encores, was broken, and she gave two additional songs. People stood up and waved their hands and handkerchiefs to the singer, and by their enthusiasm paid her one of the most remarkable tributes that has been received by any singer in this city. In addition to being a great artist, Madame Sembrich has a pleasing and graceful personality, and with smiles and bows and answering waves to the audience she responded again and again, each appearance apparently adding to the desire of the audience for another song. When finally the people left the Lyric it was with the impression of a season of Boston Symphony concerts brilliantly ended.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY FINISHES SEASON

With a program replete with interest in every number, and accompanied by Marcella Sembrich as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of a highly enjoyable season in the Academy of Music last night. In every number which was essayed the orchestra, under the baton of Conductor Fiedler, showed itself splendidly capable. The great house which had assembled to pay tribute to the organization in its farewell concert was generous in its applause.

Mme. Sembrich was heard in selections from "Figaro," and in lieder songs. In all of them, and especially in the last, her power of entertaining an audience was found to be undiminished.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 24 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN LAST BIG CONCERT

Sembrich Soloist In Program Illustrating Several Distinct Epochs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Sembrich, gave the last great concert of the season at the Lyric last night. Mr. Fiedler presented the following program, which illustrates several distinct epochs in the evolution of our art:

Overtule to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Op. 62.....Beethoven

Symphony in G major, "Oxford" (Peters, No. 9; Rieter-Biedermann, No. 2).....Haydn
1. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.
2. Adagio.
3. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
4. Presto.

Arias with Orchestra:
(a) "Deh vieni" ("O Come, My Heart's Delight",) from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Act 4, Scene 10.....Mozart
(b) "Singt dem gottlichen Propheten" ("Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet") from "Der Tod Jesu" ("The Death of Jesus").....Graun

Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53 (in one movement).....Strauss

Songs with Piano:
(a) "Die Nachtigall ("The Nightingale"), Op. 46, No. 4.....Brahms
(b) "Widmung" ("Dedication") Op. 25, No. 1.....Schumann
(c) "Wiegenlied" ("Cradle Song") Op. 8, No. 1.....Fiedler
(d) "Standchen" ("Serenade"), Op. 17, No. 2.....Strauss

Beethoven created few works which equal the "Coriolanus" overture in terse adequacy, symmetry of form and clearness of characterization. It is noble music, without lapses in significance, and its instrumental dress only accentuates its potent features. The overture was sanely read by Mr. Fiedler.

Haydn, whose characteristic habit it is to make his entry with ceremonial pomp, a powdered wig and a beneficent smile, with his "Oxford" symphony induced last evening's audience to look upon the bright side of life. Haydn was not an emotional giant, who tore passion to tatters, but he was a big, loving and lobavable man, who dispensed altruistic sunshine. In these turbulent musical times Haydn's music is like a poultice for wounded senses. The "Oxford" symphony would have been more practically comforting, because more needed, had it been introduced later in the evening's exercises.

Mme. Sembrich is no longer the preeminent artist. Her voice has lost much in quality and reliability, and she unfortunately resorts to exuberant mannerisms to veil the decadence of her once incomparable bel canto. It is not pleasant to chronicle such facts of one who has been supreme, but truth is the only element the presence of which can justify public criticism.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," according to its author's dictum, illustrates "a day in my family life." After having heard this work one is filled with commiseration for Frau Strauss and fo rthe little Strauss. If the experiences of a day in his household be truthfully depicted in this monstrous work, one wonders at Dr. Strauss' indelicacy in having taken the public into his confidence. A witty London critic in reviewing the "Domestica," said: "How fortunate that Dr. Strauss wrote this work while there was but one child in the family instead of waiting 10 years!" There is no doubt about Strauss' possession of genius, but he seems tired of writing true music. There are oases in "Domestica," but the body of it is like the unrelated improvisations of deaf instrumentalists. Having once heard this work, let us pray for its absence.

O. B. B.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Mme. Sembrich, who will sing two arias and a group of songs with pianoforte. This will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the season. The chief orchestra work of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Symphonia Domestica," which will be heard here for the first time. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

Most Successful Season Is Ended By Boston Symphony Orchestra

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which was ended with last night's concert, has been a highly successful one, the audiences having been both large and most representative at each of the five concerts.

General expressions of pleasure concerning the program presented by Director Fielder are heard on all sides, and much satisfaction in the choice of soloists is apparent. The first concert was given on November 10, with Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, as soloist. This was his first appearance in Baltimore, and he made a favorable impression in his own piano concerto (Op. 18), without creating anything like a furore. The other numbers were the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major (Op. 73), Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Weber's overture to "Freischutz."

Schumann-Heink was billed for the second concert on December 8, but, because of her sudden illness, Baltimoreans were given the first opportunity of hearing Tilly Koenen, the Dutch contralto. Miss Koenen had been scheduled to appear at a Peabody recital earlier in the season, but an attack of grip forced her to cancel the engagement, and her substitution for Mme. Schumann-Heink came as a great surprise. It was the consensus of opinion that no other artist could have taken the beloved German contralto's place better than did Miss Koenen. She sang an aria from Bach's "Passion" music, and "Judith's Song of Victory," by Van Eyken.

Rare Production.

The symphony on this occasion was the Schumann No. 2, in C major, and additional interest was lent the concert by the performance of the Handel Concerto for oboe and orchestra, with George Longey of the orchestral forces as soloist—a rare production. Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" site completed the program.

Mischa Elman, the sensational "boy" violinist, made hs second local appearance at the thrd concert on January 12, playing the colossal Beethoven Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra, and creating a perfect storm of enthusiasm. The symphony was the A flat major of Sir Edward Elgar, the English composer, never heard before here, and the evening was ended with the "Prelude" and Liebestod" from Wagner's "Trustan and Isolde."

The fourth concert, on February 22, marked the most emphatic honor ever paid a local musical organization, when the orchestra was assisted by the Baltimore Oratorio Society in presenting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the chorus having been drilled by Director Joseph Pache.

Dates Fixed For Next Season.

One of the largest audiences ever present at a similar affair in this city thronged the Lyric, and the highest praise was showered on the work of all concerned. The soloists were Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, Daniel Beddoe, Miss Janet Spencer and Claude Cunningham in the Symphony, and "Willy" Hess, concert-meister of the Orchestra, in Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor. The other number of the program was Schumann's seldom-heard "Genoveva" overture.

With the concert last night the Orchestra completed a season that, in the opinion of musicians and regular patrons, is memorable for its many fine incidents, and which was of boundless import in its educational and pleasure-giving elements.

The dates of the Orchestra concerts next season have already been announced—November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

[168]

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 24 1910

LAST CONCERT OF SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fine Program at Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its closing concert for the present season last evening at the Lyric, with Mme. Sembrich, soprano, as soloist. The following program was rendered:

Beethoven—Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Op. 62.

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "Oxford" (Peters, No. 9; Rieter-Biedermann, No. 2). I. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso. II. Adagio. III. Menuetto; Allegretto; Trio. IV. Presto.

Arias with Orchestra: Mozart—"Deh vieni" ("O come, my heart's delight"), from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Act IV., Scene 10. Graun—"Singt dem gottlichen Propheten" ("Lo, the heaven descended Prophet"), from "Der Tod Jesu" ("The Death of Jesus").

Strauss—Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53 (in one movement).

Songs with Piano: Brahms—"Die Nachtigall" ("The Nightingale"), Op. 46, No. 4. Schumann—"Widmung" ("Dedication"), Op. 25, No. 1. Fiedler—"Wiegenlied" ("Cradle Song"), Op. 8, No. 1. Strauss—"Standchen" ("Serenade"), Op. 17, No. 2.

The concert was certainly the most educational, and probably the least entertaining, of the entire course. The music of Wagner's "Walkure" was still ringing in the ears of the listeners when they were called to hear at this concert Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, and Haydn's symphony in G major, followed by old-fashioned arias by Mozart and Graun, and the most modern Strauss symphony in one huge movement. This sequence made the Beethoven overture seem quaint, the Haydn symphony dainty, with Wagner for present-day music and Strauss for music for the future, but not yet.

The Straus music is not easy to comprehend, but some of its tricks are apparent at the first hearing. One of these is the repetition of the same theme in different tempos in succession and also at the same time by different instruments. This scheme, while giving plenty of work to the musicians, saves labor to the composer in economizing invention, while the listener is none the wiser for the device. There is no warrant for saying that all music of any certain period is fine music any more than there is for saying that all music is pleasant music.

Mme. Sembrich does well to "make hay while sun shines," for the summer for any artist is comparatively short and it never returns. Her best success last evening was in the Mozart aria, "Deh Vieni," alth ough it is a pity she did not sing the "Dove Sono" from the same opera instead, as it is much more beautiful. The Graun aria required more effort. She was repeatedly recalled. After the real concert was over she gave her recital of songs with piano accompaniment and the Boston season of concerts was ended. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, including nearly all of Baltimore's lovers of music. Herr Max Fiedler directed the concert.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Marcella Sembrich, as Soloist, Receives Great Ovation.

The Boston Orchestra, which for 25 successive seasons has played to large and increasingly appreciative audiences, gave the fifth and last concert of the present season in the Academy of Music last night. The audience was one of the largest seen in the Academy this season, which was undoubtedly due to the presence of the great song bird, Marcella Sembrich, as soloist.

The program was opened with a beautiful rendition of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." The "Spring Symphony" of Schumann, which is only too infrequently heard, was the principal offering in the sense of orchestral music, for certainly the "Sinfonia Domestica" that strenuous emanation from the facile brain of Richard Strauss; could only by a very violent stretch of the imagination come under the name of real music. The Schumann work is so original in style, so polisned, subtle and elegant in exploitation, that one wonders it is not a favorite on the regular programs.

Of this symphony, Schumann himself wrote, "I do not wish to portray, to paint, but I firmly believe that the period in which the symphony was produced influenced its form and character, and shaped it as it is." It is almost needless to say that the symphony was composed in the spring and with it was put all the poetical feelings awakened in the sensitive mind of this wonderful musician. It remains an orchestral offering that can never be anything but a joy and delight to those who are privileged to hear it with a love and sympathetic understanding of the composer.

The Strauss work, which is always more or less, generally more, of a shock to the nervous system, suffers more in comparison with a work like the Spring Symphony than when played in conjunction with some of the more modern and less musicianly writers. One is forced to the thought that if this is in any way what it is given out as being, a day in the composer's home life, he can be forgiven in a measure for some of the erratic musical works he has launched on the public. The theme descriptive of the family awakening might more fittingly apply to the awakening of beasts in an African jungle. Then the bath episode in public is attended, no doubt, with more or less shock to the delicate and sensitively inclined. Even if such an absurdity were possible as a tonal portraiture of the Strauss family, why give it to the public? Does it serve any purpose in the field of art?

Madame Sembrich, always a great favorite in Philadelphia, received a tremendous ovation. She sang, with the orchestra, the recitative and aria, "Girmse al fin il Momento" and "Deil vieux" from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Grams' Air, "Singt dem goettlichen Propheten" from "Der Tod Jesu." Later she gave in her most artistic and charming manner, four songs from Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler and Strauss. The beautiful quality of Sembrich's voice never fails to arouse an audience. Her expression and style are too well known to require comment. She was assisted by Frank La Forge, who is an accompanist so talented that his art seems almost on a par with that of Sembrich. She was obliged to give several encores. First the audience demanded a repetition of Fiedler's tender little "Waegenlied," next she gave Schubert's "Fruhlingsnacht," then the old English song, "The Lass with the Delicate Air," and finally the audience refusing to leave, she played her own accompaniment to Chopin's great song, "The Maiden's Wish." It was a concert long to be remembered, and closed the season of the Boston Orchestra in a happy manner.

In connection with the performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" it is interesting to note that the first performance of the symphony in Philadelphia were given by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Fritz Scheel on February 10-11, 1905. This Philadelphia interpretation, the first adequate reading of the symphony in America, since, as is well known, the first time the work was performed by the Wetzler Orchestra in New York on March 21, 1904, under Strauss, the orchestra broke down and the interpretation was unsatisfactory.

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Closing Concert of the Season, With Mme. Sembrich as Soloist.

An audience which completely filled the Academy of Music last evening enjoyed one of the notable concerts of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing for the last time this winter, with Richard Strauss's "Simfonia Domestica" as the instrumental feature and Mme. Marcella Sembrich as soloist.

It was the first appearance of the famous prima donna in Philadelphia since she sang her farewell here in opera at the Academy of Music Tuesday evening, January 26, 1909, and her reception was a cordial one. When she made her appearance on the stage last evening there was a tremendous outburst of applause from all parts of the house, which continued for several minutes, and which plainly was an expression of hearty good will, admiration and affection. Sembrich's reign as a supreme favorite among operatic sopranos was a long one, and it can truthfully be said that there has arisen no one to take her place. Others there may be capable of executing with equal facility the florid music allotted to such top-note heroines as Lucia, Gilda and Violetta, but the exquisitely refined vocalism of Sembrich, as shown in the singing not only of operatic music but of songs and ballads of almost every character, probably is equalled by no other soprano of the present. Her voice is not what it used to be, to be sure; it is thinner, and there is less ease and fluency in tonal production than of yore, but it is still a glorious organ, retaining much of its marvelously mellow, sweet, flute-like quality. In appearance she seems but slightly changed from the Sembrich who first came to this country more than twenty-five years ago, for time has indeed dealt with her most kindly, and she had the looks, the manner and the buoyance of youth last night, as she stood on the Academy stage. She appeared twice on the program, singing first a recitative and aria from the fourth act of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," the opera in which she sang her farewell here last season, and an air from Graun's oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu." Her second appearance came as the last number of the evening, when she gave a group of songs with piano accompaniment, having the whole stage to herself. This part of the program, in fact, was almost in the nature of a Sembrich recital, for in addition to Brahms's "Die Nachtigall," Schumann's "Widmung," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied" (which was repeated), and R. Strauss's "Standchen," she generously added three encore numbers. After her first appearance, Sembrich was presented with a large basket of flowers.

The orchestra by no means deserves to be ranked second in importance, though interest seemed largely to centre in the appearance of the distinguished soloist. The program was opened with the beautiful "Coriolanus" overture of Beethoven, which was followed by Schumann's first symphony, B-flat major, the "Spring Symphony," which is as radiant as the budding year and a veritable blossoming of melodious beauty. In marked—almost jarring—contrast to this poetic composition came the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica," with its tonal elucidation of the affairs of a household, with papa, mamma and the baby. Strauss, we are told, does not intend this to be taken as program music, yet it is avowedly an illustration, as he says, of "a day in my family life." It is played without a break, though divided into four parts, or movements, as follows: 1, Introduction; 2, Scherzo; 3, Cradle-Song and Adagio; 4, Finale: Double Fugue. While the work has many of the bizarre effects, the daring innovations and the oft-styled "musical absurdities" of Strauss, its cacophonies are not so pronounced, nor its erratic qualities so apparent, as when first heard, for since then have we not listened to "Salome" and "Elektra"? It has, indeed, much to charm in a purely musical way, and such an interpretation as it was given last night emphasized its beauty and atoned for many of its so-called inconsistencies. The "Sinfonia Domestica" was first played in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Fritz Scheel, February 10-11, 1905.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 20 1910

to be quite a social event.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8.15, and a program of unusual elaborateness has been prepared for the occasion. The soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this city for the first time with Boston's great orchestra. Madame Sembrich has chosen two short arias in the style of music in which she is heard at her best. The first is the familiar "Deh Vieni," Susanna's aria in the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro." Her other aria will be "Lo, the Heaven-descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a famous Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss's "Serenade."

The orchestral part of the concert will be no less important. It will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus," and then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B flat major, No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. Altogether this is the biggest program that the Boston Symphony has ever offered to Philadelphia, and it brings to an end the most successful season the orchestra has had here in several years.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 20 1910

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH
SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

CALENDAR OF THE WEEK

MONDAY—Opera, "Louise," 8 (Phila. Op. House).
Boston Symphony, 8:15 (Academy).
TUESDAY — Opera, "Pelleas and Melisande," 8 (Phila. Opera House).
WEDNESDAY — Meyer-Ezermann Recital, 8:15 (Witherspoon Hall).
THURSDAY — Opera, "Lakme," 8 (Phila. Opera House).
SATURDAY — Opera, "Rigoletto," 2; Gala Farewell Performance, 8 (Phila. Op. House).

THE fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8:15, and a programme of unusual elaborateness has been prepared for the occasion. The soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this city for the first time with Boston's great orchestra. Madame Sembrich has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is so indelibly connected with her fame as the most musical singer of her time. The first is the familiar "Deh Vieni," Susanna's aria in the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro." To the present generation of opera-goers Madame Sembrich is the only Susanna known, for during the last ten years in which she has been one of the principal singers of the Metropolitan Opera House whenever this opera was given this role was hers. Her other aria will be "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der tod Jesu," a famous Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Wigmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss's "Serenade."

The orchestral part of the concert will be no less important. It will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus" and then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in b-flat major No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck. Altogether this is the richest programme that the Boston Symphony has ever offered to Philadelphia, and it brings to an end the most successful season the orchestra has had here in many years.

* * *

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 20 1910

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 and a program of unusual elaborateness has been prepared for the occasion. The soloist will be Madame Marcella Sembrich, who will appear in this city for the first time with Boston's great orchestra. Madame Sembrich has chosen two short arias in the style of music which is so indelibly connected with her fame as the most musical singer of her time. The first is the familiar "Deh vieni," Susanna's aria in the last act of "The Marriage of Figaro." For the present generation of opera-goers Madame Sembrich is the only "Susanna" known for during the last ten years in which she has been one of the principal singers of the Metropolitan Opera House whenever this opera was given this role was hers. Her other aria will be "Lo, the Heaven - descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu," a famous passion oratorio of the eighteenth century She is also scheduled to sing four songs with piano—Brahms' "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Cradle Song" and Richard Strauss' "Serenade."

The orchestral part of the concert will be no less important. It will begin with Beethoven's overture "Coriolanus" and then will come Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B flat Major No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck. Altogether this is the richest program that the Boston Symphony has ever offered to Philadelphia, and it fitfully brings to an end the most successful season the orchestra has had here in many years.

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CLOSES SEASON HERE

Marcella Sembrich, Soloist, Warmly Welcomed at Academy.

SYMPHONY BY STRAUSS

Beethoven and Schumann Selections Also in the Opulent Program.

By H. T. Craven

A combination of attractions that included Marcella Sembrich and a musical program that both in variety and interest has been surpassed by but few concert offerings of the year drew an audience of capacity proportions last evening to the Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony made its final appearance of the season.

The orchestral contributions were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, the "Spring" symphony of Schumann and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," selections surely representative of strikingly contrasting schools of music. Mme. Sembrich appeared twice, and sang both with the orchestra and with a piano accompaniment. The occasion marked her only visit here this year.

The Polish diva, who, until the current season, has been the mainstay of the Metropolitan Company in the field of coloratura opera, was cordially welcomed, and appreciation of her efforts was liberal and most friendly. Harsh as it may seem to describe the singing of a once well-nigh peerless artist as "efforts," no other term can adequately depict her contribution to the concert. Mme. Sembrich's exquisite technique has lost none of its perfections. The husks and shell of a once lovely soprano, in fact, one of the memorable voices in the chronicle of music, are present today, but the luster, the sparkle and the shimmering radiance of tone have departed.

Excellent Lieder Songs.

It was moreover manifest labor for Mme. Sembrich to cope with her first two selections last evening. These were the recitative "Giunse al fin il momento" and the aria "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and an interesting and melodious air, "Singt dem Goettlichen Propheten," from Graun's forgotten work, "Der Tod Jesus." Far better results were achieved in the songs with piano accompaniment, which composed the final number of the concert.

Veteran artist though she be, there is still no necessity for Mme. Sembrich to resign from the province of lieder, in which her reign has been long and undisputed. She offered last night Brahms' "Die Nactigall," Schumann's "Widmung," Fiedler's "Wiegenlied," a charming lullaby, which was repeated as an encore, and Richard Strauss' "Staendehen." In such environment the demand for extraordinary vocal power is less exigent, and Mme. Sembrich's mastery of the subtleties of ballad or lieder singing is sufficient compensation for even the limitation on her resources that time has imposed.

Play Strauss' Symphony.

The "Symphonia Domestica," which has not been heard here since the Philadelphia Orchestra gave it six years ago, exhibits the genius of Richard Strauss in its most poetic and inspired vein—a composition pre-eminently superior to a whole wilderness of "Elektras." This deeply fascinating and tremendously difficult essay in "program music" revealed the resources of the Boston Orchestra in their finest estate and the executive mastery of Conductor Fiedler at its best.

There was a sympathetic and appealing interpretation of the Schumann symphony, a veritable garden of spontaneous melody, and a dignified reading of the Coriolanus overture. The latter was the opening number of a musical evening op-[illegible] with interest.

From EVE. TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

THE WORLD of MUSIC

The Waning Season—Opera and Orchestral Concerts Over—Some Events of the Near Future—The Operatic Society.

WITH tonight's "gala bill" that represents an operatic concert, the second season of the Philadelphia Opera House will end. That of the Academy has already finished. The only opera in prospect is "The Bohemian Girl," to be produced by the Operatic Society. Monday last's Boston Symphony concert concluded the busy orchestral year to which our own Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic contributed. For the future of a waning season several musical

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIFTH CONCER

Strauss' "Domestica" and Schumann's "Spring," in B Flat Major, the Symphonies.

SEMBRICH THE SOLOIST

Beethoven—Overture to Collin's Tragedy "Coriolanus," Op. 62.
Schumann—Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
Mozart—(a) Recitative, "Giunse al fin il momento" and Aria, "Deh vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Act IV, Scene 10.
Graun—(b) Air, "Singt dem gottlichen Propheten," from "Der Tod Jesu."
Richard Strauss—Symphonia Domestica
Songs with Piano:—
(a) Brahms.....Die Nichtigall," "Widmung,"
(b) Schuman.....Wiegenlied,"
(c) Fiedler.....Standchen"
(d) R. Strauss.....

The fifth and last of the Boston Symphony concerts was given at the Academy of Music last evening. It was likewise the best of the five, both in the orchestra's own contribution, and in that the soloist was Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who was heard here for the first time this season. The attendance was also the largest to which the Boston Symphony played this year.

The most important of the orchestral numbers of the concert was the Strauss "Symphonie Domestica," a composition which the Boston Symphony gave here three years ago, but which was first heard in Philadelphia by our own orchestra under Fritz Scheel, in February, 1905, the first actual reading of the Strauss composition in this country, and only two months after it was first given in Berlin, with Dr. Strauss as conductor.

The "Symphonia Domestica" has called out more discussion than any other composition of its character, and even after a life of more than six years, the critics are just as critical, and the admirers just as enthusiastic. Dr. Strauss is no doubt justified in doing what he pleases with any musical ideas that may go floating through his fertile brain, and it is easily admitted that no modern thinking apparatus is filled more fully with the quaint, the weird and the unusual in music—and the public only rightful may judge whether the impression conveyed is to the life.

Audiences who have studied Strauss this Winter in his "Elektra," with its grunts and groans and grewsome discords, have somewhat changed their opinion at again hearing this symphony with its mild and mellow musical imitations of Papa Strauss, Mama Strauss and the baby. The oddly contrived sounds representative of the baby's bath, with the more intricate tonal delineation of the parents in a wordy combat, contrast Strauss' music in his symphony and probably justifies their giving to the music world as a bit of patriotism on the part of the composer, as showing the light and airy, although at times squeamish, domestic life in the Fatherland.

Fielder's Reading of Strauss.

The symphony is divided into four movements which are joined in one. Mr. Fielder has not varied his reading of the symphony to any material extent in three years. It is such an individual composition that a director must give it an individual reading with each performance. He brought out the full, flowing style of the composition in the introduction, which presents the three themes—that of father, mother and child. The guy chatter of the scherzo was played with splendid spirit and the cradle song was a sweet, flowing melody of the most penetrating character.

The love scene of the Adagio movement breathed of the true passion, but in the merry dispute of the final portion Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra was at its best. He showed Strauss in anything but an enviable light in the high pitch of the quarrel scene, excused only by those who fully appreciate the high but not serious temper of the Teuton. But this musically passionate outburst was but for brief, to early dwindle away to the joyous conclusion. If not the best, it was at least the most interesting thing that Mr. Fiedler has given his Philadelphia admirers this season.

Brilliant Reading of Schumann.

The opening number of the program was Beethoven's brilliant overture "Coriolanus," which was played in splendid style by the orchestra. This was followed by Schumann's Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 1. Fiedler has Schumann's style thoroughly in his grasp, and conducted all four of the movements with such sympathy and respect for the composer's intent as to command the warmest praise. The scherzo number was especially well read, and the treatment of the trio was as dainty and continent in color as to arouse the audience to great enthusiasm.

Between the Schumann number and the "Domestic Symphony" Sembrich sang two numbers, the first a recitative and aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the second an aria from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu," entitled "Singt dem gottlichen Propheten." The singer was given a very warm reception when she first appeared, and the audience showed every evidence of thorough delight after both numbers. Her finished art will never be lost to her, having been acquired through such a long period before the public. That her voice has lost something of its former beauty was heard with regret, but that it is still an organ of delightful quality was particularly evident in her singing of the four short numbers with which she closed the concert. It was in such a number as Graun's that the lack of vocal power was most noticeable. Many of the audience present last night will remember what wonderful things in the way of brilliant execution used to lie in her power in a number like this, but last evening there was little more than a semblance of the former great Sembrich. The art was there, but the voice failed in those full, round tones which she once possessed, but which the hard work of years has hollowed out and only left a certain part of their former beauty. The short number by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler and Strauss are still within her powers, and she was delightful in all of them, but particularly so in Conductor Fiedler's "Wiegenlied," which she repeated in response to the applause.

Music Notes

THE fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given at the Academy of Music Monday evening, with Mme. Marcella Sembrich as soloist. This will be Mme. Sembrich's first appearance here with the Boston Orchestra, and the first time she has sung in Philadelphia since she bade farewell as an operatic prima donna, as Susanna, in Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," January 26, last year. Next Monday evening she will sing Susanna's aria, "Deh Vieni," from the last act of that opera, and "Lo, the Heaven-Descended Prophet," from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu," a famous Passion oratorio of the eighteenth century. She is also scheduled to give four songs with piano, Brahms's "The Nightingale," Schumann's "Widmung," Max Fiedler's "Crandle Song," and Richard Strauss's "Serenade." The orchestral part of the program also will be unusually attractive, beginning with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," followed by Schubert's "Spring" symphony in B-flat major, No. 1. The great work of the evening, however, will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which was played here three years ago this month by the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 27 1910

THE MUSICAL SEASON.

The musical season, just closed, is in many ways the most remarkable in our history. Second only to New York in the number of operatic performances given, Philadelphia stands well to the fore in the presentation of all classes of music, instrumental and vocal. Music is apparently more appreciated in this city than in any other in the country. It is patronized here for the love of it, the social function entering into its consideration only in a minor degree. Close to one hundred performances were given in one opera house and twenty-five in the other, not to speak of the opera performances by less important traveling companies, and by our own Operatic Society.

Philadelphia's own Symphony Orchestra has had the most prosperous season of the ten since its organization, and its inauguration of a series of popular concerts has afforded pleasure to many thousands. Aside from our own orchestra, under Pohlig, Philadelphians have had the privilege of studying the instrumental work of the organizations under Fiedler, Mahler and Damrosch. The fine choral and oratorio societies of this city, of which we have more than any other city of the country, have had their usual active season, with some concerts still in reserve.

Altogether Philadelphia is holding a proud position in music and it has contributed considerably more than its share of the great artists who have helped to make the season just closing in America a distinctly notable one. Of the stars of this country who figured prominently in both the big operatic companies—Garden, Farrar, Homer, Hinckley and Scott—are now or were formerly residents of Philadelphia.

Thus Philadelphia is not alone the city where grand opera is patronized most liberally, but it is really the only city in the country from which the big opera companies have been able to secure talent which they recognize is of a character worthy to be placed on the same high level with the great artists of Italy, Germany and France.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

Schumann and Strauss, With Mme. Sembrich Between.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, B flat.....Schumann
Arias with Orchestra:
"Deh Vieni".....Mozart
"Sigt dem Gottlichen Propheten".....Graun
Sinfonia Domestica.....R. Strauss
Sons with piano:
"Die Nachtigall".....Brahms
"Widmung".....Schumann
"Wiegenlied".....Fiedler
"Standchen".....Strauss
Soloist, Marcella Sembrich.
Max Fiedler, Conductor.

A dignified presentation of the noble "Coriolanus" overture opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, under the direction of Max Fiedler. The experimental orchestration of Schumann's first symphony is at a disadvantage in immediate contrast with this lucid masterpiece, but it was admirably played. Its fresh charm, its sense of the joy of spring was conveyed with great animation, and its lyrical quality rightly felt. Almost the earliest, it is one of the most constantly delightful of Schumann's orchestral works.

There is a much longer gap between Schumann and Strauss, but this was partly bridged [illegible] two arias, which, with her subsequent songs, furnished the popular features of of the programme, though the "Simponic Domestica" was the important conducting of the orchestra.

Strauss has carried his methods of composition several grades onward since he wrote this fantastic programme symphony, which had its first performance here by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Fritz Scheel—practically the first in America—just five years ago. It had been well advertised and was much debated: it then dropped out of consideration. The lapse of time, while it has brought acceptance for much of this composer's work, has not deepened conviction in this particular manifestation of his inventiveness, and the impression it made last night was much as before, of a pretentiousness of expression beyond the value of the thing expressed. It discourses at great length, with passages of great beauty and many distracting discords or seeming trivialities, and with a final effect of perplexed unrest. But the long slow movement in the middle is lovely music, pure in melodic feeling and deep and rich in color. It was superbly played. The whole work, indeed, was given its utmost value, and no one of its bizarre exactions was neglected. If the last effect was of uncontrolled madness, which made "Til Eulenspielge" seem sane, one could feel sure that the composer's desire had been fulfilled. It was worth while to hear the symphony again, and its execution was in all respects deserving of the warmest applause.

Madame Sembrich's selection of an aria from Graun's forgotten oratorio, or "Passion," "Der Tod Jesu," suggested a reference to the season, but it is merely a bravura aria in the Handel manner and displayed the singer's clear and fluent delivery better than Susanna's dull scene from the "Nozze di Figaro." The singer gave her audience the most pleasure when she came upon the stage after the orchestra had left it and, standing by the piano, sang, with the clarity and diction and purity of tone, the perfect style and impeccable taste that are always hers, a group of varied modern songs. The Schumann was perhaps the best of these, but the singer's art was very delicately shown in Mr. Fiedler's charming song, which the audience redemanded, the singer bringing the composer forward to acknowledge the applause with her. The Strauss, again, was beautifully delivered and left a more satisfying impression of that composer than the big symphony. The audience would have been glad to keep Madame Sembrich at the piano indfinitely, and her fine art and her gracious personality leave a grateful memory about the last orchestra concert of the season.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 1910

SOCIETY AT WASHINGTON

Mrs. Taft Attends Final Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Mrs. Taft occupied her usual box at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in the National Theatre. The soloist was Willy Hess, violinist. In Mrs. Taft's box were Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Miss Lydia Biddle and Mrs. Moore. Mrs. Leiter, who had as her guests the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Mrs. Calderon Carlisle were other boxholders entertaining friends.

The Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Ballinger gave another large dinner party this evening. In the company were the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, the Postmaster General, the Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Oliver and the Solicitor General and Mrs. Bowers.

The Japanese Ambassador and Baroness Uchida entertained a dinner company of 18 this evening, the Chinese Minister and Madame Chang being the guests of honor.

The Military Attache of the French Embassy and Countess de Chambrun have returned from a six weeks' trip to Mexico.

The Military Attache of the German Embassy and Frau Livius have gone to New York to sail next week for Europe.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 22 1910

SEMBRICH WITH BOSTONIANS

Coloratura Diva Sings Several Solos at Final Symphony Concert.

A representative gathering of music lovers filled the Academy of Music last night to greet Madame Sembrich and hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and last concert of its Philadelphia series for this season. The programme presented was of unusual interest, beginning with Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"—a nobly conceived and executed treatment of a noble theme; Schumann's first symphony in B-flat major, next in order, was followed by a double number for Madame Sembrich, consisting of a recitative and aria for Susanna from Mozart's "Figaro" and the aria "Singt dem Gottlichen Propheten," or, as it is known in the translation, "Lo! The heaven descended Prophet," from Graun's Passion Oratorio." Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" and a group of four songs by Brahms, Schumann, Fiedler and Strauss completed the evening's list.

The "Coriolanus" overture is really a tragic character sketch in music, and Mr. Fiedler's reading conveyed its full force. Although the Schumann symphony, which was one of the composer's earlier works, suffers somewhat by being placed in juxtaposition with the fully ripened art of the "Coriolanus" overture, its manifold excellences and passages of rare beauty were ably enunciated by the orchestra, which played with its wonted unanimity of intelligence and skill.

The Mozart aria is in itself a trifle dull and uninteresting, but the number from the Graun Passion Music is exactly the reverse, and Madame Sembrich sang it with exquisite taste and mastery of appreciation. It is unfortunately one of the least known oratorios, and though it has been occasionally rendered in America, it is hardly more than a name, and to many not even that. The work displays a curious blending of Italian influences with the German groundwork. The only thing to be regretted about last night's performance of the aria is that Madame Sembrich did not sing all of it. Of the songs, all of which she sang superbly, Fiedler's "Wiegenlied," perhaps, gave the keenest pleasure, and this she graciously repeated, summoning the composer forward to acknowledge the applause with her. After the Strauss song the audience was so demonstrative and so loath to depart, that she sang three encores. Even if she possessed but a mediocre voice, Madame Sembrich's consummate art and technical skill would captivate her hearers. Her magnetic personality alone exerts a powerful attraction, and there is always evident in her audiences a feeling of genuine affection toward her.

The "Symphonia Domestica," which has not been heard in Philadelphia for five years or more, was excellently interpreted, losing neither any of its bizarrerie nor its element of scattered melodic beauty in the rendering. It is not, however, as interesting as Strauss' later works.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date MAR 22 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ACADEMY

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at the Academy of Music. A brilliant assemblage filled the immense auditorium from orchestra to amphitheatre, attracted, no doubt by the re-appearance of Mme. Marcella Sembrich as soloist.

This was the diva's first appearance in Philadelphia since she bade farewell to the operatic stage as Susanna, in Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," January 26, 1909.

Last night Mme. Sembrich recalled pleasant memories to her old-time admirers by singing Susanna's aria, "Deh vieni," from the closing act of "Figaro." She also sang an aria from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu"—"Singt dem gottlichen Propheten," and four songs, with piano accompaniment, "Die Nachtigall" (Brahms), "Widmung" (Schaumann), "Wegenlied" (Fiedler), and Strauss's "Standchen."

Mme. Sembrich still sings creditably for a woman of her age (she is over sixty), but, of course, her best days have passed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is composed of ninety-eight talented musicians, opened the programme with the overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," written by Beethoven, and followed with Schumann's Spring Symphony in B-flat major, with that perfection of ensemble that has resulted from the training of the conductor, Max Fiedler.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its next season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 7, 1910, at 8.15. A series of five concerts will be given, as in past seasons. The dates of the following four are: December 5, 1910; January 9, February 20, and March 20, 1911.

Since Mahler has taken charge of the New York Philharmonic it surpasses the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler lacks Mahler's ability. He is too mechanical. It is said that this is his last season with the organization.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard for the Last Time This Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Orchestra was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience in its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the extraordinary program which had been prepared for the occasion included Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica" and songs with orchestra and piano by Mme. Sembrich.

This may be thought a somewhat formidable arrangement, but it proved more interesting than might be supposed. Schumann's "Spring" symphony is a composition of great melodic beauty and poetic charm, to which the "Domestica" affair was in striking and effective contrast. Both were brilliantly played, with knowledge and eloquence and power and a signal technical efficiency which imparted a measure of interest even to the Strauss conglomeration of commonplace themes and ingeniously contrived cacophonies. Mme. Sembrich, the assisting artist of the occasion, sang with her accustomed art the "Deh Vieni" aria from the "Marriage of Figaro," and an aria from Graun's "Tod Jesu," to the accompaniment of the orchestra and a group of songs to the piano.

It may be of interest to recall in this connection that the "Sinfonia Domestica" was performed, and well performed, for the first time in Philadelphia on February 10-11, 1905, by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel, and that this performance was really the first adequate interpretation of this excessively difficult work in America, as that given by the Wetzler Orchestra in New York under the composer's own direction on March 21, 1904, was notoriously inadequate. Indeed, the orchestra actually broke down.

In this, as in so many other things, Philadelphia led the way.

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 23 1910

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Distinguished Audience at Symphony Concert.

BALLINGERS HOSTS AT DINNER

Secretary of Interior and Wife Entertain Company at Rauscher's. Mrs. Longworth to Attend Funeral of Her Grandfather, Mr. George Cabot Lee—Social Notes.

Mrs. Taft, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Louis More, attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. They had with them in the Presidential box Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Oliver, wife of the Assistant Secretary of War, and Miss Biddle.

Mrs. Leiter had in her box the British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce and Dr. and Mrs. Buckner M. Randolph. Mrs. C. A. Williams had with her in her box the German Ambassador and his daughter, the Countess von Bernstorff, and Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had with her her daughter, Miss Mary Carlisle, and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, and Mrs. Walter Andrews.

Others in the audience were the Norwegian Minister and Mme. Gude, and their daughter, Miss Gude; Baroness Preuschen, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Senator and Mrs. Dixon, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, Mrs. Edson Bradley, Miss Horsey, Miss Moyt, Miss von Stumm, Mr. von Stumm, and Mr. Horstmann, Mr. and Mrs. Crowinshield, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Miss Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. T. T. Gaff, Dr. and Mrs. McKim, the Misses Randolph, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mr. Siebert, Miss Siebert, Mr. John Cabot Lodge, and Mrs. Livingston Hunt.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Concert Attended By Fashionable Audience.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater was attended by a large and fashionable audience.

Mrs. Taft, who occupied the Presidential box, had in her party her sister, Mrs. Louis More; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, wife of the Assistant Secretary of War, and Miss Lydia Biddle.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce and Mrs. Buckner Randolph were the guests of Mrs. L. Z. Leiter in her box. Mrs. C. A. Williams had as her guests, Mrs. Frederick Keep, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Robert Hitt, and Countes Luise Alexandra von Bernstorff.

Others occupying boxes were Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. I. T. Mann, and Mr. and Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell.

Among those in the house were the Minister from the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Naval Attache of the Austro-Hungarian Embassy and Baroness von Preuschen.

Mrs. Robert Owen, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Dolliver, Senator and Mrs. Dick, the Misses Kean, the Misses Harlan, Mrs. James Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Miss Hopkins, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Miss Gilmore, Miss Siebert, Mrs. Jack Story, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, the Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Foraker, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. Edson Bradley, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt, Miss Constance Hoyt, Fraulein von Stumm, Miss Hagner, Mrs. Francis Crowninshield, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Gaff, Mrs. Charles P. Stone, Mrs. Charles Fairfax, Mrs. Wallach, Justice White, Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence Townsend, Miss Ethel Robeson, Mrs. Herbert Parsons, Mrs. John Hay, and Mrs. Nicholas Anderson.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

HESS TO BE SOLOIST FOR FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Make Last Appearance.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The soloist will be Willy Hess. It has been several years since Mr. Hess has appeared here as soloist with the orchestra, but the impression he made previously is not worn away. He will play the "Third Concerto," by Max Bruch. This is not nearly so well known as the concerto in G minor, or the "Scotch Fantasia," by the same composer, and, in fact, Mr. Hess has been mainly instrumental in introducing it in Europe and this country.

The symphony will be "Schumann Major" in B flat, No. 1, commonly known as the "Spring" symphony. This was written at the most happy period of Schumann's life, just after his marriage to Clara Wieck.

The concert will begin with Beethoven's magnificent "Coriolanus" overature and end with Berlioz's brilliant overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 2 1910

LAST CONCERT GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Greeted with Applause.

APPEARANCE OF WILLY HESS

Violinist's Playing Distinguished by Finished Technique and Poetic Expression—Schumann's Symphony in B Flat Major by Orchestra Enthusiastically Commended.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at National Theater yesterday afternoon brought out the banner audience of the year, the house being filled with persons well known in official, social, and musical life of Washington.

So much has already been said about this organization in a critical way as to make it well-nigh impossible to construct any new phrases descriptive of its work. Those qualities which called forth glowing commendations in the past are still present, and seem to be potent in adding to a prestige which has grown steadily for more than a quarter of a century. The reputation of the present conductor, Max Fiedler, has also been of steady growth.

Has Finished Technique.

Turning to the programme of yesterday, the most notable feature was the appearance of Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master, who rendered Bruch's Concerto No. 3, for violin and orchestra. His playing is distinguished by a finished technique and poetic expression, the beautiful singing tone which characterizes the work of all great violinists being much in evidenced. His whole interpretation was delightful and he was repeatedly recalled.

The chief number given by the orchestra was Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, a famous composition, typifying the human feeling upon the approach of spring. It was splendidly rendered and enthusiastically commended. The programme follows:

Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Op. 62.....Beethoven

Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38—Schumann

I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.

II. Larghetto.

III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I: Molto piu vivace. Trio II.

IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Concerto No. 3, for violin and orchestra, Op. 58 Bruch

I. Allegro energico.

II. Adagio.

III. Finale: Allegro molto.

Overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23.....Berlioz

Soloist.....Mr. Willy Hess

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Mrs. Taft attended the Boston Symphony concert yesterday and had in the box with her Mrs. More, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Oliver and Miss Biddle. Mrs. Charles A. Williams had with her the German ambassador, Countess Luise Alexandra Bernstorff, Mrs. Hitt and Miss Boardman. Mrs. Leiter in the adjoining box had the British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce and Mrs. Buckner Randolph. Mrs. I. T. Mann had guests in her box, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell being in the party. Mrs. Caldron Carlisle had another and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had Mrs. Wright and other guests.

In the audience were the Netherlands minister, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. James Harlan, Misses Harlan, Mrs. Nathaniel Wilson, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Dolliver, Senator and Mrs. Dick, the Misses Kean, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. A. C. Barney Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Miss Hopkins, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Miss Gilmore, Miss Siebert, Mrs. Jack Story, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, the Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Miss Foraker, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Miss Irwin, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. Edson Bradley, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt, Miss Constance Hoyt, Fraulein von Stumm, Miss Hagner, Mrs. Crowninshield, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Gaff, Mrs. Charles P. Stone, Mrs. Cranford, Mrs. Charles Fairfax, Mrs. Wallach, Mr. Justice White, Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Ethel Robeson, Mrs. Herbert Parsons, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Henry E. Davis, Miss Davis, Maj. Perri Stevens and Miss Marie Stevens.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, and to wind up his second season in this city Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of unusual charm and richness. The soloist will be Willy Hess, of the orchestra, than whom there are very few greater violinists. It is now several years since Mr. Hess has appeared here as soloist with the orchestra, but the impression he made at former times is not worn off. He has chosen for his concerto the third by Max Bruch.

The symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat major, No. 1, commonly known as the "Spring" symphony. This was written at the most happy period of Schumann's life, just after his marriage to Clara Wieck.

The concert will begin with Beethoven's magnificent "Coriolanus" overture, and end with Berlioz's brilliant overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS ENGAGEMENT

Concert Meister Willy Hess Plays Concerto on Violin.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, played to an overflowing house yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater, the concert closing the orchestra's season in Washington.

Willy Hess, concertmeister of the organization, who came forward as soloist, played Max Bruch's third concerto for violin and orchestra with that purity of tone, breadth of treatment, feeling and poise which characterize the work of a thorough artist in the full maturity of his power.

Throughout a varied program the orchestra acquitted itself with that degree of excellence one expects in the work of America's oldest orchestral body. The symphony number, Schumann's entrancing work, B-flat major No. 1, was given with superb effect, its melodious tripping measures having as a striking contrast the characteristically dramatic overture to the opera "Benvenuto Celleni" (Hector Berlioz), which closed the program.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of unusual charm and richness. The soloist will be Mr. Willy Hess of the orchestra. It is now several years since Mr. Hess has appeared here as soloist with the orchestra. He has chosen for his concerto the third by Max Bruch. This is not nearly so well known as the concerto in G minor or the Scotch fantasia by the same composer, and, in fact, Mr. Hess has been mainly instrumental in introducing it in Europe and this country. It is winning steadily the popularity that is enjoyed by the other works.

The symphony will be Schumann's in B flat major, No. 1, commonly known as the "Spring" symphony. This was written at the most happy period of Schumann's life, just after his marriage to Clara Wieck, when the doubts and anxieties of the previous three or four years, caused chiefly by her father's opposition to the marriage, had disappeared.

January 25, 1841, his wife wrote as follows: "Today, Monday, Robert has nearly finished his symphony; it was composed chiefly at night—for some nights my poor Robert has not slept on account of it. He calls it the 'Spring Symphony.' * * * A spring poem gave him the first impulse toward composition."

The concert will begin with Beethoven's magnificent "Coriolanus" overture and end with Berlioz's brilliant

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season, Max Fielder, conductor, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, and to wind up his second season in this city Mr. Fielder has arranged a programme of unusual charm and richness. The soloist will be Mr. Willy Hess, of the orchestra, than whom there are very few greater violinists in the world. He has chosen for his concerto the Third, by Max Bruch. This is not nearly so well known as the Concerto in G minor or the "Scotch Fantasia," by the same composer, and, in fact, Mr. Hess has been mainly instrumental in introducing it in Europe and this country.

The symphony will be Schumann's, in B flat major, No. 1, commonly known as the "Spring" symphony. The concert will begin with Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and end with Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Attracts Record Audience to Hear Willy Hess.

The notable feature of the fifth and last concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon was the Bruch concerto No. 3 for violin and orchestra, with Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, as the soloist. Mr. Hess has never been heard in Washington to greater advantage than in his interpretation of this brilliant composition. In all three movements the violinist displayed his wonderful technical proficiency and skill in phrasing, but it was in the second (adagio) that he gave admirable evidence of genuine and lofty feeling. The tender melody was brought out with rare effect, and the audience was most responsive, calling him back to the stage many times to bow his appreciation of the merited applause.

The closing symphony for the season was Schumann's, No. 1, in B flat, a composition which is somewhat lacking in its direct appeal to the auditor. One of the Beethoven symphonies would have been more gratefully received as the final musical treat of the season. The great genius of Bonn was represented on the program, however, by the overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," which was given with splendid effect.

The program closed with another overture, that of Berlioz to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," which was interpreted by Conductor Fiedler with much spirit and [171]

...om EVE. STAR
...ldress Washington, D. C.
...te MAR 25 1910

AMUSEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Washington music lovers had their last chance of the season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater, yesterday afternoon. In addition to the interpretation of Beethoven's overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 38, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz. Bruch's brilliant concerto, No. 3, for violin and orchestra, opus 58, was given, with Willy Hess, concert master for the orchestra, as the soloist. Mr. Hess' technique, phrasing and sympathetic interpretation won him an ovation. The orchestra was directed by Max Fiedler in his characteristic manner, and he, too, was the recipient of much applause.

BOSTON POST
JUNE 21, 1910

MAYOR SOLOIST AT POPS

Sings "Sweet Adeline" and Is Cheered by 2500

Twenty-five hundred people went wild with enthusiasm last night and made Symphony Hall fairly rock with applause when Mayor John F. Fitzgerald, in response to a concerted demand on the part of the audience, sang in a rich voice the song that has been inseparably linked with his political career, "Sweet Adeline."

HALL WAS PACKED

Never has Boston witnessed such a scene as took place at the Clover Club Pop night last evening.

The great hall, packed as it has not been before this season, became a pandemonium when the Mayor at last yielded to the urging of the audience and left his seat to walk toward the stage.

Then, as he turned and faced the hundreds who were applauding him, it became hushed in an instant. Not a sound filled the auditorium but the rich tones of the Mayor's voice. Not a soul in the audience moved as he rendered the first verse of the song; and when the chorus was reached, the Clover Club glee club joined in the harmony.

As the last note of the chorus died away, the enthusiasm of the audience broke forth anew. Amid billows of applause, the Mayor bowed his way off the stage, and returned to his seat. Few men indeed can boast of such an ovation as was accorded John F. Fitzgerald last night, for as a personal triumph it was unique.

Last evening was the first Clover Club night at the Pops, and an immense crowd was on hand to witness the innovation. The club is for the most part made up of Boston business men, among its members being William F. Fitzgerald, N. M. Cuniffe and James L. Martin. There are, however, among the number, several city officials, including City Treasurer Slattery. Practically every member of the organization was present last night, together with a host of friends of the club and regular Pop night patrons.

Orchestra Plays It

Mayor Fitzgerald arrived at Symphony Hall with Mrs. Fitzgerald and his two daughters shortly before 9 o'clock, and entered the auditorium so quietly that at the time he attracted little attention. The regular programme for the evening comprised selections from Strube, Balfe, Rubinstein and others, and it was nearly 10 o'clock before anything out of the ordinary occurred.

Suddenly the orchestra struck up, very softly, the prelude to "Sweet Adeline," and at the sound of the familiar strains the big audience shifted its attention entirely upon the Mayor. A change came over the house in a moment. The big crowd, which had an instant before been an ordinarily happy, chattering Pop night gathering, became stirred to action and enthusiasm; from every part of the house simultaneously came shouts and cheers, and the Mayor, glowing with pleasure, rose and bowed in acknowledgment of the tribute paid him.

Demand He Sing

But this did not suffice to appease the audience. The shouts began anew; from every side the Mayor was called upon to sing. The orchestra played the entire song through, and started once more upthe prelude, while the demands of the crowd grew more and more insistent. "We won't let the programme go on until you sing!" shouted a man near the Mayor's party, and the throng indorsed his ultimatum with hearty cheers.

Not until then did the Mayor make a move toward the stage. As he walked upon the platform, the walls rang with applause that was almost deafening. It broke out spontaneously everywhere, in a volume that Symphony Hall has never known in its history, and that might better be compared with the cheering section at a Harvard-Yale game.

Then came a quick contrast. As the Mayor faced the thousands and began to sing, waiters stopped in their tracks; every pair of eyes was directed upon the Mayor, and every person in the building leaned forward to listen.

Mayor Fitzgerald has sung "Sweet Adeline" many times, but never with such effect as before the Clover Club and its friends last night. When he reached the chorus, the Clover Club glee club, which had massed behind him, took up the strain, their voices blending in perfect harmony. At the completion of the chorus, the Mayor bowed and left the stage, while the crowd let loose again.

Made Him Sing

The members of the glee club who took part in the chorus with Mayor Fitzgerald were led by Professor O'Shea. Among the number were William L. Hackett, Francis Weld, Frank O'Connor, William Flannigan, Frank Rogers, James Morrison, Thomas Hackett, Thomas O'Day and Thomas Hamlin.

"I couldn't help it," said Mayor Fitzgerald, after the performance. "They wouldn't let me off. I don't mind singing before a small crowd, but giving a solo before 2500 people is a new experience for me.

"They just yelled till I had to sing. I sang one verse and the chorus, and then they went on with the rest of the programme. I didn't intend to sing; they just made me do it."

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

North-American
Philadelphia
Oct 10, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, March 21.
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK
RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN

Season sale opens Saturday morning, October 16, at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. Mail applications must be accompanied with cheques to order of Miss H. Harris.
Prices $7, $5, $3.50.
Boxes $75, $63, $42

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From North-American
Address Philadelphia Pa
Date Oct 11, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Eve'g, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From North-American
Address Philadelphia Pa
Date Oct 13, 1909

ACADEMY O MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Eve'g, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Eve'g, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 16 1909

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75 $63, $42

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 17 19

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10,
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK,
Season tickets now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75 $63, $42

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 18 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 18 1909

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 2

ACADEMY OF MUS
Season 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHON ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21 Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEIN RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppes' Pia Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75 $63.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor

MON. NOV. 8 AT 8.15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Program — Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheater, 25 cts.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 22

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

HORTICULTURAL HALL,
Sat. Aft. at 2.30. Evg. at 8.30, Oct. 23.
ONLY APPEARANCE OF

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 3 - 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor

TONIGHT AT 8.15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program — Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheater, 25 cts.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 6 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor

MON., NOV. 8 AT 8.15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program — Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheater, 25 cts.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(First appearance here.)
Program—Granville Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony, No. 5, in E minor; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."
Tickets at Heppes' piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheater 25c

[illegible] Applauds Soloist and

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 8 19

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

This Evening, Nov. 8, at 8.15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program — Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute"; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte; Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st., $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheater, 25c.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 9 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Max Fiedler, Conductor

Academy of Music
Mon. evg., Dec. 6, at 8.15.
Soloist
Schumann-HEINK

Reserved Seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.
Amphitheater, 25c.

[illegible] of Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," which was the concluding number on the program.

M. Rachmaninoff is still in his thirties and is a youthful-looking artist of earnest, scholarly demeanor, and absolutely without pose. He was rather amusingly particular about the height of his piano stool when he first entered, and remedied the difficulty by sitting on some music that must have raised him, perhaps, an inch higher than before. There was, however, no hint of affection in this behavior.

Without being a work of thrilling inspiration, this Second Concerto is a decidedly interesting composition, rich in melodic thematic material and endowed with the spirit of rather somber romance that is commonly associated with Russian music. The adagio contained passages of melting loveliness, and was played by the composer with sympathetic appreciation of its content.

M. Rachmaninoff is a pianist of commandingly reassuring technique and a fine sincerity and certainty of method. To the ranks of emotional pianists he assuredly does not belong. His art is too sure and sound for any such alliance. There was a splendid vigor that suggested ample reserve power in his handling of spirited last movement of his concerto.

Throughout last evening's program the modern note in music was strikingly emphasized. The concert opened with a graceful and dainty, but not especially consequential, number by Granville Bantock, a contemporary English composer, who used to be a conductor of musical comedy.

It was entitled "The Pierrot of the Minute" and is described as a "comedy overture," and was inspired by an odd dramatic fantasy by the talented and lamented young English poet, Ernest Dowson.

The interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which followed, was a brilliant example of the resources of Mr. Fiedler's orchestra. This beautiful and impressive composition was read in a masterly fashion that rose to positive grandeur in the thrilling, triumphant finale. The audience applauded heartily and the whole orchestra exchanged courtesies by bowing.

The Strauss "Don Juan," suggested not by Mozart or De Molina's hero, but by the dramatic poem of Nicholas Lenau, brought a close to one of the most interesting concerts devoted exclusively to modern music that have been heard here in some time.

[175]

Record
Philadelphia
Oct 10, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians.)

MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, March 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23

Soloists:
Sembrich, Schumann-Heink,
Rachmaninoff, Elman

Season sale opens Saturday, October 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street. Mail applications must be accompanied with cheques to order of Miss H. Harris.

Prices, $7, $5, $3.50
Boxes, $75, $63, $42

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMAN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale, Sat. Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rms. 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 16

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season Tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season Tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 16 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season Tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 21 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season Tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 21 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

This Evening at 8.15. Solo
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25 cents

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 21 1909

1119 Chestnut st. Popular prices, Dec. and [illegible]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 22 1909

Weber Piano used. S. BEARNS, 1020 Chestnut

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
TO-NIGHT AT 8.15
Soloist
SergeRachmaninoff, Pianist

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

(First app. in Phila.)
Programme--Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute." (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone poem, "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cents Amp., 25c.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 6

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
MON., NOV. 8
AT 8.15.
Soloist:
SergeRachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute," (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cents Amp., 25c.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 4 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
MONDAY, NOV. 8th
Soloist
SergeRachmaninoff, Pianist

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

(First app. in Phila.)
Programme--Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute," (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone poem, "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cents Amp., 25c.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 8 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Academy of Music.
Mon. Eve., Dec. 6, 8.15
Soloist.
Schumann-Heink
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 7

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Monday Evening, November 8, at 8.15

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First Appearance Here.)

Programme:—Granville Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Richard Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan."

Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St., $2, $1.50, $1, 75cts. Ampitheatre, 25cts.

[176]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Evening Times
Philadelphia Pa
Oct 11, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH SCHUMANN-HEINK RACHMANINOFF ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 13 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH SCHUMANN-HEINK RACHMANINOFF ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 15 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Season sale opens Tomorrow, Oct. 16, at Heppes' Piano Warerooms, 1119 Chestnut St.

PRICES, $7, $5, $3.50. BOXES, $75, $63, $42.

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 16 19

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH SCHUMANN-HEINK RACHMANINOFF ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 18 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Eve'g, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH SCHUMANN-HEINK RACHMANINOFF ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 31 1909

The first of the regular Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8, with Max Fiedler conducting. The soloist will be the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who will on that night make his first appearance in America. The program will comprise Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which will be heard for the first time; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 4 1909

Seats now on sale for first two weeks.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAY FIEDLER Conductor

MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Straus' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheater 25c.

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA
NOV 3

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAY FIEDLER Conductor

MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Straus' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheater 25c.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER Conductor

This Evening, Nov. 8, at 8 15
Soloist
Serge Rachmaninoff Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme — Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.00, 75c. Amphitheater, 25c.

[177]

Evening Telegraph
Philadelphia, Pa.
Oct 11, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50.
Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 13 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50.
Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Eve'ngs: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale opens Tomorrow, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50
Boxes, $75, $63, $42

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 16 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 18

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 22 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 3 - 1

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

TONIGHT AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 8 - 1

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

THIS EVENING, NOV. 8, AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute"; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.
Intended for Boston Symp. 15. Orch.
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md. OCT 25 1909
Date

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
SOLOISTS:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, NOV. 10, DEC. 8, JAN. 12, MAR. 23,
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.
Season tickets on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
PRICES, $7 and $5.

884

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.
Intended for Boston Orch.
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES.
Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
Date OCT 21 1909 OCT 21 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.
Intended for
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News
Address Baltimore Md
Date Oct 10, 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

NOV 4 - 1

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

[178]

Evening Telegraph
Philadelphia, Pa.
Oct 11, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 13 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor.

Monday Eve'ngs: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale opens Tomorrow, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50 Boxes, $75, $63, $42

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 17 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 18 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIELDER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 8 -

AMUSEMENTS.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

TONIGHT AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

THIS EVENING, NOV. 8, AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture. "Pierrot of the Minute"; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 22 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 4

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, AT 8.15
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.
Intended for Boston Sym.
15 Oct.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us,
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md. OCT 25 190
Date OCT 25

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
884

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
SOLOISTS:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, NOV. 10, DEC. 8, JAN. 12, MAR. 23,
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.
Season tickets on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
PRICES, $7 and $5.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.
Intended for Boston Sym.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address
Date Oct. 5 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.
Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

The Bachelor's Baby

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21.
Wednesday Eve'g, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Today

[178]

PASTE OVER

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 15 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale, Sat., Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 16 19

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 17

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor.
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Ev'g, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Seats Now Selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7 $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75 $63 $42

Inquirer
Philadelphia Pa.
Oct 19, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Monday Evening: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, March 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
SOLOISTS:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale opens Saturday morning, October 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. Mail applications must be accompanied with cheques to order of Miss H. Harris.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50
Boxes, $75, $63, $42

Inquirer
Philadelphia Pa.
Oct 12, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Ev'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season sale, Sat., Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 24 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 31 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor
MON., NOV. 8
AT 8.15.
Soloist
Serge Rachmaninoff,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 6 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor
MON., NOV. 8
AT 8.15.
Soloist
Serge Rachmaninoff,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitea-re, 25 cts.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 8

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor
This Evening, Nov. 8.
AT 8.15.
Soloist
Serge Rachmaninoff,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute:" Tschaikowsky's Smyphony No 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.: Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphithea-tre, 25 cts.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 21 1909

AMUSEMENTS
ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. MAX FIEDLER Conductor.
Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Ev'g, Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF. ELMAN.
Seats Now Selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7 $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 3 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor.
TONIGHT AT 8.15.
Soloist
Serge Rachmaninoff,
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)
Program—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75cts. Amphithea-tre, 25cts.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 7 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 8, AT 8.15
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(First appearance here)
Programme:—Granville Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st., $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre 25 cts

INQUIRER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
ACADEMY of MUSIC
Mon. Eve., Dec. 6, at 8.15
SOLOIST:
Schumann-Heink
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

...delivery ...phony heard last night is endowed with a deeper significance and communicates a more faithful and expressive reflection of its composer's temperament and genius, and when it is rendered, as it was last evening, with the utmost beauty of tone, eloquence of accent, unity of statement and resounding sonority of utterance, no intelligently appreciative hearer can listen to it unmoved. Its performance pleased the audience so much that Mr. Fiedler was several times recalled and at last the players were obliged to rise and bow their acknowledgments. Other things on the program were Richard Strauss' well known poem of "Don Juan," and a comedy overture called "The Pierrot of the Minute," cleverly written in the manner of Mendelssohn by Mr. Granville Bantock, a young English composer, who has a long list of good things to his credit.

The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, Mr. Serge Rachmaninoff, who had not previously been heard in this country and who showed himself to be a thoughtful, refined and admirable artist by an extremely finished and delicate interpretation of his own second concerto for piano and Orchestra, Op. 18. This is not a great composition and at times it runs pretty thin, but it contains not a little thematic material of an ingratiating character and its construction shows a true sense of proportion and an admirable apprehension of tone values. Although written by a pianist, the function of the solo instrument is never exaggerated and the combination of the two forces is sustained in a way that is no more skillful than striking and meritorious.

Mr. Rachmaninoff noticeably refrained from any attempt at self-exploitation, either personally or musically, and he impressed the spectator as a true artist and a modest gentleman. It does not appear from anything heard last night that he can properly be placed in the very first rank of performers, but he is certainly an excellent pianist and a highly cultivated musician. He was much and deservedly applauded.

[179]

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Public-Ledger, Philadelphia, Pa
Address
Oct 10, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, March 21.
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.

Soloists:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN

Season sale opens Saturday morning, October 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Mail applications must be accompanied with cheques to order of Miss H. Harris.

Prices, $7, $5, $3.50.
Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

From PUBLIC LEDGER Philadelphia
Address

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evgs.: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH
SCHUMANN-HEINK
RACHMANINOFF
ELMAN
Season sale, Sat., Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 16

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
This Evening, Nov. 8, AT 8:15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Program—Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute"; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 24 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address
Date OCT 21

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 2 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
TONIGHT AT 8:15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF
Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor.

Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 4 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

MONDAY, NOV. 8, AT 8:15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)

Program—Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address
Date NOV 7

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
Monday Evening, November 8, at 8:15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First appearance here)

Programme: Granville Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St., $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 16 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
This Evening, Nov. 8, AT 8:15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Phila.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Program—Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute"; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evgs.: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH
SCHUMANN-HEINK
RACHMANINOFF
ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Season 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evgs.: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wednesday Evg., Feb. 23
Soloists: SEMBRICH
SCHUMANN-HEINK
RACHMANINOFF
ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

[180]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Evening Bulletin

Address Philadelphia

Date Oct 9 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Season 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21; Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

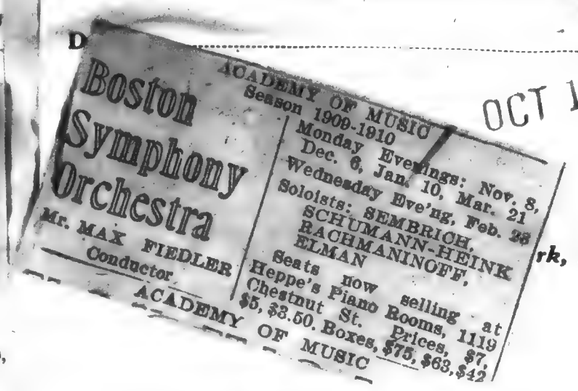
Season sale opens Saturday Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.

Prices, $7, $5, $3.50; Boxes, $75, $68, $42.

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

D



OCT 19 1909

rk, 1884

---

m EVENING BULLETIN

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

Date Oct 12 909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21

Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN—HEINK RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN

Season sale, Saturday, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

Monday Evening, November 8th, at 8.15.

Soloist,

Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist

(First app. in Phila.)

Programme—Banstock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

WALNUT

THE RIGHT OF WAY

TO-DAY. MATINEE

SIR GILBERT PARKER'S Great Canadian Romance.

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 15 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

SEASON 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN

Season sale opens To-morrow, Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street

Prices, $7, $5, $3.50—

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 16 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Season 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21

Wednesday Eve'ng, Feb. 23

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN—HEINK RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN

Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Sale $4, $3, $2.50 now (Closes Sat., Nov. 13)

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

This Evening, Nov. 8, at 8.15.

Soloist,

SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.

(First app. in Phila.)

Programme — Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 190

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

Monday Evening, November 8th, at 8.15.

Soloist,

Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist

(First app. in Phila.)

Programme—Banstock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

THE first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts this season will be given at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, November 8. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who on that occasion is to make his first appearance in America, playing his own Second Concerto for piano and orchestra. The orchestra's numbers will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which is to be heard for the first time; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E-minor, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

EVENING BULLETIN

s Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 190

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER

Conductor

Monday Evening, November 8th, at 8.15.

Soloist,

Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist

(First app. in Phila.)

Programme—Banstock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan."

Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25c.

Press
Philadelphia
Oct 12, 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Max Fiedler
Conductor

Mon. Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wed. Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists; SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Sat., Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 11 1909

The first of the regular Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8. The soloist will be the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who will on that night make his first appearance in America. The program will comprise Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which will be heard for the first time here; Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor, Rachmaninoff's second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan."

* * *

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 15 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Max Fiedler
Conductor

Mon. Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wed. Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists; SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Season sale, Sat., Oct. 16, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
MON., NOV. 8
AT 8.15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan." Reserved seats at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 16 1909

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Max Fiedler
Conductor

Mon. Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21
Wed. Eve'ng, Feb. 23
Soloists; SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN
Seats now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 17 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
$7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 3

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
TO-NIGHT AT 8.15.
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor

Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss's Tone Poem "Don Juan." Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 7

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Monday Evening, November 8, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First appearance here)

Programme:—Granville Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time here); Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St., $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 8 1909

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
SEASON 1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Monday Evenings: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Mar. 21. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 23.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street.
Prices, $7, $5, $3.50. Boxes, $75, $63, $42.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

This Evening, Nov. 8, at 8.15
Soloist:
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First app. in Phila.)
Programme—Bantock's Overture "Pierrot of the Minute;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pfte.; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Reserved Seats at Heppes', Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St. $2, $1.50, $1, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Monday Eve. Dec. 6 at 8.15
SOLOIST
Schuman-Heink
Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street. $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c
Amphitheatre 25 cts.

[182]

American
Baltimore = Md
Oct 10, 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

SOLOISTS:

Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff. Elman

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Season tickets on sale October 18 at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
American
Baltimore Md
Oct 11, 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 14

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 16 19

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 20

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,

Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 20

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 18 1909

Thursday Afternoon at 3.30
FRED NIBLO The American Illustrator.
Talks on Life in Distant Lands.
FRANCE FROM PARIS TO THE SEA.
Seats 25c., 50c., 75c. and $1.

THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 9 19

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,

Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 23 19

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,

Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 4

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 5 - 1909

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 31

THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 19

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,

Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 24

THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 3 1909

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 7

THE LYRIC
WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 10, AT 8:15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 performers)
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First appearance here)

PROGRAMME

WEBER	Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
BRAHMS	Symphony in D major, No. 2
RACHMANINOFF	Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra
RICHARD STRAUSS	Tone Poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 8 19

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 10 1909

THE LYRIC
TONIGHT AT 8:15 O'CLOCK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist
(First appearance here)

Programme—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz;" Brahm's Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra: Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

[183]

BLANK PAGE

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om Star
ddress Baltimore Md
Oct 9, 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

SOLOISTS:

Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff, Elman

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.

Season tickets on sale Oct. 18 at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Fayette and Charles Sts.

Prices, $7 and $5.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Star
Baltimore Md
Oct 11 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN STAR
ss Baltimore, Md.
OCT 13 19

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN STAR
ss Baltimore, Md.
OCT 14 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

om AMERICAN STAR
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate OCT 15 1909

THE LYRIC - 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings; Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles & Fayette Sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

AMERICAN STAR
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 18 1909

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN STAR
ess Baltimore, Md.
OCT 16

Next Week.

THE LYRIC

SEASON 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS: NOV. 10, DEC. 8, JAN. 12, MARCH 23
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.

Soloists:

Sembrich, Schumann-Heink
Rachmaninoff, Elman

Season sale opens Monday, October 18, at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Cor. Charles and Fayette Streets.

Prices, $7 and $5
Boxes, $60

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 21

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

rom AMERICAN STAR
ddress Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 22 191
Reserved Seats, 10c. Extra.

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

om AMERICAN STAR
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate Nov 1 - Oct 30 ON

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

1884

AMERICAN STAR
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 30 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the regular Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 10. The soloist will be Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer and pianist, who will then make his appearance in Baltimore for the first time. The program will comprise Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Brahm's Symphony in D Major No. 2, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 23

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

AMERICAN STAR
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 2 - 1909

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN STAR
s Baltimore, Md.
NOV 3 - 19

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN STAR
ss Baltimore, Md.
NOV 5

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

om AMERICAN STAR
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate NOV 6

THE LYRIC

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 10, AT 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(First appearance here.)

Programme — Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms's Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.

m AMERICAN STAR
lress Baltimore, Md.
te

The Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15.
Soloist,
Serge Rachmaninoff, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)
Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMERICAN STAR
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 18 1909

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 20

THE LYRIC -- 1909-1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN,
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Sts. Prices $7 and $5.

om AMERICAN STAR
ldress Baltimore, Md.
ate NOV 10

The Lyric.

THIS EVENING AT 8:15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(First app. in Baltimore)

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Programme — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms's Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

[185]

BLANK PAGE

From News
Address Baltimore Md
Oct 9 1909

THE LYRIC - - - 1909-1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloists:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMAN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS:
November 10, December 8, January 12, March 23.
TUESDAY EVENING, February 22.
Season tickets on sale October 18 at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
PRICES, $7 AND $5.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 19 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2

THE LYRIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(1st app. in Baltimore)
Program — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahm's Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
OCT 12 19

Author of "The Three Girls" ...

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
OCT 20 1

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2

THE LYRIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(1st app. in Baltimore)
Program — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahm's Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.

Author of "The Three Girls" ...

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date
Best Shoe Store OCT 21

AMUSEMENTS.

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 19

THE LYRIC,
Wednesday Eve., Nov. 10, 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 performers),
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF,
Pianist
(First appearance here).

PROGRAM:

Weber.....Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"

Brahms.....Symphony in D Major, No. 2

Rachmaninoff...Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

Richard Strauss.Tone Poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts., $1.50 and $1.00.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 14 19

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23. Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 22 1909

AMUSEMENTS.

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 8

THE LYRIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(1st app. in Baltimore)
Program — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 15 19

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18, at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

THE LYRIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(1st app. in Baltimore)
Program — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 30 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, NOV. 10, DEC. 8, JAN. 12, MAR. 23.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.
Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
PRICES, $7 and $5.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 16 1909

THE LYRIC - - - - 1909-1910

FIVE CONCERTS BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(98 Musicians)
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Wednesday Evenings: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, March 23.
Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22

SOLOISTS:

Mesdames
MARCELLA SEMBRICH
ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK

Messrs.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF
(His first appearance here)
MISCHA ELMAN

Subscription sale for the season opens at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets, Monday morning, October 18.
Prices for the Series, $7 and $5, according to location. Boxes, $60

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

THE LYRIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(1st app. in Baltimore)
Program — Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

THE LYRIC.
Tonight at 8.15 o'Clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY' ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist.
(First appearance here.)
Programme—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

[187]

BLANK PAGE

From SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 22 19

THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 22; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Sun
Baltimore Md.
Oct 10, 1909

THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23, TUESDAY EVENING, Feb. 22.
Season tickets on sale Oct. 18 at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Sun
Address Baltimore Md.
Date Oct 11, 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12 Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Sun
Address Baltimore Md.
Date Oct 12, 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Sun
Address Baltimore Md.
Date Oct 13, 1909

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
Oct 15-19

THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

From SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 15 19
THE GAY MASQUERADERS AND THE DASHING BONITA.
Next Week—RICE AND BARTON'S BIG SHOW.
THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 17

THE LYRIC
1909-1910
FIVE CONCERTS
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
(98 Musicians).
Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS
Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12
March 23
TUESDAY EVENING
February 22
SOLOISTS:
Mesdames
MARCELLA SEMBRICH
ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK
Messrs.
SERGE RACHMANINOFF
(His First Appearance Here.)
MISCHA ELMAN
Subscription sale for the season opens at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow, Monday morning, October 18.
Prices for the Series, $7 and $5
According to Location.
Boxes, $60

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 18 19
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloists SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 22, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
Prices: $7 and $5

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 19
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 20
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 23 1909
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 5 -
THE LYRIC.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

Oct 13
THE LYRIC. 1909-1910.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, March 23; Tuesday Evening, February 22.
Season tickets on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Fayette and Charles sts., Oct. 18.
Prices, $7 and $5.

Oct 16, 1909
THE SUN.
PUBLISHED DAILY AND SUNDAY
TERMS OF ADVERTISING:
ABELL COMPANY, PUBLISHED FROM THE SUN BUILDING, are to be made ore Street and Sun Square, BALTIMORE, MD. issed.
THE LYRIC—1909-1910.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets Oct. 18 at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts.
Prices, $7 and $5.

Oct 21
THE SUN.
PUBLISHED DAILY AND SU
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 23; Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Soloists: SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
Season tickets now selling at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette sts. Prices, $7 and $5.

Oct 24
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloists SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 22, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
Prices: $7 and $5

Oct 31
THE SUN.
THE LYRIC - - 1909-1910
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloists SEMBRICH, SCHUMANN-HEINK, RACHMANINOFF, ELMAN.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Mar. 22, Tuesday Evening, Feb. 22.
Season tickets now on sale at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets.
Prices: $7 and $5

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 - 1909
and 15c. will admit one in the evening.
THE LYRIC.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date
THE LYRIC.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 5
THE LYRIC.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6
THE LYRIC.
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss; Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 7 1909
Tuesday, Thursday evenings invited.
THE LYRIC
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10
At 8.15.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(98 PERFORMERS.)
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist
(First Appearance Here).
PROGRAM:
Weber.....Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz"
Brahms.....Symphony in D major, No. 2
Rachmaninoff.....Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Richard Strauss. Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.
LYRIC THEATRE.

[189]

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 8 1909

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15. Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore). Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 9

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15. Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore). Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

TONIGHT AT 8.15 O'CLOCK,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First Appearance Here.)

Program—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Orch.

10

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Tonight at 8.15

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st. $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. Amphitheatre 25c.

Estab

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date JAN 2 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Mon. Eve., Jan. 10, at 8.15

Soloist

MISCHA ELMAN

Violinist

Reserved seats at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st., $2, $1.50, $1, 75c. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

Estab

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

LYRIC THEATRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Wed. Eve., Mar. 23

At 8:15

SOLOIST

Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets,

$2 and $1.50

rk, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orch.

23

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Tuesday Afternoon, March 22, 4:30,

NATIONAL THEATER.

Soloist: Prof. WILLY HESS.

Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale Wilson ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

77

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 0 1910

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Monday Evening, March 21, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cts., Amphitheatre, 25 cts

Es

1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Orch.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 1 9 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Mon. Eve., Mar. 21, at 8.15

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.

$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.

Amphitheatre, 25c.

k, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 0 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Monday Evening, March 21, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

84

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Orch.

37

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

TO-NIGHT AT 8.15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

SOLOIST

Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.

$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.

Amphitheatre, 25c.

Estal

1884

[190]

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Tonight at 8.15
SOLOIST
Mme. SEMBRICH
Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.
Amphitheatre, 25c.

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

LYRIC THEATRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER
Conductor

Wed. Eve., Mar. 23
At 8:15
SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich
Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets,
$2 and $1.50

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Tuesday Afternoon, March 22, 4:30,
NATIONAL THEATER.
Soloist: Prof. WILLY HESS.
Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale Wilson ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 1 3 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Mon. Eve., Mar. 21, at 8.15
SOLOIST
Mme. SEMBRICH
Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.
$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.
Amphitheatre, 25c.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 0 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Monday Evening, March 21, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cts.
Amphitheatre, 25 cts.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Telephone 3923 Madison Sq.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
TO-NIGHT AT 8.15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich
Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut St.
$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.
Amphitheatre, 25c.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

SUN — Baltimore, Md.

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN — Baltimore, Md.

TONIGHT AT 8.15 O'CLOCK,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First Appearance Here.)

Program—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

AMUSEMENTS

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Monday Evening, March 21, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

SOLOIST

Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cts. Amphitheatre, 25 cts

---

[190]

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 8 1909

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 9

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

TONIGHT AT 8.15 O'CLOCK,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First Appearance Here.)

Program—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 19 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor,
TUESDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 22, 4:30,
NATIONAL THEATER.
Soloist, PROF. WILLY HESS.
Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale at Wilson's ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.
mh13-9t-10

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 21 1910

LYRIC THEATRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Wed. Eve., Mar. 23
At 8:15
SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets,
$2 and $1.50

Es..., 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 21 1910

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 22 1910

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 20 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Tonight at 8.15
SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
$2, $1.50, $1, 75c.
Amphitheater, 25c.

Es... 1884

LYRIC THEATRE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

WED. EVE., March 23, At 8.15.
Soloist,
Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets.
$2 and $1.50.

E... k, 1884

LYRIC THEATRE
WEDNESDAY EVG., MARCH 23, AT 8:15,
THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 PERFORMERS)
MAX FIEDLER, - - Conductor

SOLOIST,

Mme. Marcella Sembrich

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven..Overture, "Coriolanus," Op. 62
Haydn...Symphony in G major, "Oxford"
Mozart...a. Aria, "Deh Vieni" ("The Marriage of Figaro")
Graun...b. Aria, "Singt dem Gottlichen Propheten" ("Der Tod Jesu")
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....("Die Nachtigall")
Schumann.....("Widmung")
Fiedler.....("Wiegenlied")
Strauss.....("Standchen")

Tickets at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Streets, $2 and $1.50.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 2 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Tuesday Afternoon, March 22, 4:30,
NATIONAL THEATER.
Soloist: Prof. WILLY HESS.
Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale Wilson ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.

Es... 1884

[190]

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 8 1909

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15.
Soloist,
SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First App. in Baltimore).
Program: Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninoff, Second Concerto for pfte.; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

TONIGHT AT 8.15 O'CLOCK,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

Soloist, SERGE RACHMANINOFF, Pianist (First Appearance Here.)

Program—Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2; Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; Strauss' Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Seats at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Sts. $1.50 and $1.00.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 1 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor,
TUESDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 22, 4:30,
NATIONAL THEATER.
Soloist, PROF. WILLY HESS.
Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale at Wilson's ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.
mh13-9t-10

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

LYRIC THEATRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER Conductor

Wed. Eve., Mar. 23
At 8:15
SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets,
$2 and $1.50

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER Conductor.

Tonight at 8.15
SOLOIST
Mme. Sembrich

Tickets at Heppes' Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st.
$2, $1.50, $1, 75c.
Amphitheater, 25c.

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 2 3 1910

LYRIC THEATRE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

WED. EVE., March 23, At 8.15.
Soloist,
Mme. SEMBRICH

Tickets at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette Streets.
$2 and $1.50.

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR 2 0 1910

LYRIC THEATRE

WEDNESDAY EVG., MARCH 23, AT 8:15,
THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(98 PERFORMERS)
MAX FIEDLER, - - Conductor

SOLOIST,
Mme. Marcella Sembrich

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven..Overture, "Coriolanus," Op. 62
Haydn...Symphony in G major, "Oxford"
Mozart...a. Aria, "Deh Vieni" ("The Marriage of Figaro")
Graun...b. Aria, "Singt dem Gottlichen Propheten" ("Der Tod Jesu")
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....("Die Nachtigall")
Schumann.....("Widmung")
Fiedler.....("Wiegenlied")
Strauss.....("Standchen")

Tickets at Albaugh's, Charles and Fayette Streets, $2 and $1.50.

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 2 1 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.
Tuesday Afternoon, March 22, 4:30,
NATIONAL THEATER.
Soloist: Prof. WILLY HESS.
Prices, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c. On sale Wilson ticket office, in Droop's music store, 13th and G.

Established: London, 1881, New York, 1884

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND